NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 1—VOL. VIII. BALTIMORE, MARCH 2, 1833. [VOL. XLIV. WHOLE No. 1,119.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

At the commencement of a volume, we have often indulged ourselves in a little familiar chat with our readers "on things in general"—speaking of the past and speculating on the future—but the intense interest of the proceedings of congress, now exacting the most earnest attention of the people, has induced us to refrain for the present, and lay-too: for it seems that all sorts, or classes, of persons, whether Jackson men or Jackson-Van Buren men—national republicans or Clay men—anti-masons—proclamation-men or anti proclamation-men—nullifiers or anti nullifiers—state-rights men or constitutionalists—tariffites or anti-tariffites, &c. &c. have been so jostled that no party knows exactly where is its own present location!—Some "guess" that they are on the banks of New-found-land; but the fog is so thick, and the water so much disturbed, that neither the quadrant nor the lead-line renders accustomed service. Soon after the rising of congress, the fog will clear away, and parties will get observations of the sun, as well as soundings, and make a fresh start on their several courses. We cannot steer in any new direction; but whether we shall remain at sea, or seek a permanent harbor—refraining from every thing which may lead into controversy—will depend upon the probability of rendering service to those great interests which we have so long and earnestly supported. We shall take an early opportunity of expressing ourselves fully and freely, and independently, on this subject—simply saying, for the present, that our opinions remain unchanged. The question is—as to the utility of uttering them. Congress must rise to-morrow—the bustle of business will soon be over, and a calm review of all that has happened may speedily take place. Things seem so much interlocked with things, that, in all cases, it is not easy to separate them, and determine each by its own merits. This, however, we may promise—that the same industry which has for so long a time found favor with the public, shall be exerted to sustain the reputation of the REGISTER; and the total absence of controversial subjects from its pages, perhaps, will be more agreeable to the public than that course which "circumstances" imposed upon us. But still it is not by any means intended to abandon the discussion of general principles—though the late manner and direction of such discussions may be considerably modified. We have no personal allusion—referring only to things.

Mr. Clay's bill in the senate, for the regulation of the tariff, reached its third reading in that body, when serious doubts began to be entertained of the right of the senate to originate a revenue bill—for such, and such only, in our estimation, is Mr. Clay's project. The latter was then suddenly adopted by the house of representatives, in lieu of the mangled bill of the committee of ways and means, and very swiftly passed, 118 to 85, on Tuesday last. See the yeas and nays, page 12. It was immediately sent from the house to the senate, where it yet remained. And the opinion is given out that it will not pass the senate, unless the bill of the senate, further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, shall also pass the house.* And if the land-bill fails in the house, some also believe that the tariff bill will hardly pass the senate.

The latter, or tariff bill, as it passed the house, is the bill as reported by the select committee of the senate. The amendments made by the committee are wholesome—but our original objection to the bill remains unchanged.

WONDERFUL SAGACITY. The editor of the U. S. Telegraph has discovered, because we said that, "in the long run, the value of imports cannot exceed the value of the exportations," we have repudiated our error as to balances of trade! Mr. Green will next find out that, because all men will die, no man is living. If there is a trade between a white man and an Indian, whiskey for furs—the balance will be against the Indian, if he continues it, until he parts with the last piece that covered his nakedness—and then he can only obtain more whiskey as he obtains more skins: the quantity of whiskey consumed being strictly regulated by new acquisitions of skins. There is no longer a "balance of trade" against the Indian!—but he is without clothing and miserable.

And notwithstanding this discovery—we guess that Mr. Green will agree with us, that if an individual (or a nation), sells a greater value than he purchases, or expends, there is an undoubted "balance of trade" in that individual's favor! But it is not worth while to pursue the subject. The people will feel that there is a balance of trade against them, a few years hence—unless the present prospects of things are materially changed.

NEW YORK. We mentioned in our last, that some of the old bank-manufacturing-leaven had appeared at Albany. It appears that a certain Alvah Beebee had written threatening letters to certain members of the assembly, if they voted against the proposition to make a new bank at Ithaca, and that he had offered one member 10,000 dollars in the stock, and so forth. The sergeant-at-arms was sent to arrest him, and he was brought a prisoner to Albany. It seems that he admitted the charges, but justified them. "As to the threat to vote down other bills, he answered that 'it was in accordance with the legislation of the state,' and that if members who for themselves or their friends were interested in a bank, were voted down by others, justice and propriety required that these latter should be defeated; and he added 'that this was a means of obtaining justice, that, as he understood, had been long practised.' The offer of stock he also defended on the score of 'immemorial usage.' Members, he said, had been constantly in the habit of subscribing for stock in banks, which they had voted for; and he further charged that he had been induced to make this particular offer at the instance of 'the friends of the member'—who had named the precise amount of stock wanted! All which things, usages &c. the counsel for the accused is said to be ready to substantiate. If so, we shall probably have a precious exposition of the art, trade and mystery of lobbying."

For all which, after much debate, Mr. Beebee was brought to the bar, reprimanded by the speaker, and released from the custody of the sergeant-at-arms.

The "Albany Argus" gives the following account of the ceremony:

The respondent having been brought to the bar in the custody of the sergeant-at-arms, the speaker directed the following resolution to be read to him by the clerk:

Resolved, That Alvah Beebee has been guilty of a contempt and breach of the privileges of this House, and that he be brought to the bar of the house immediately, and that he be publicly reprimanded by the speaker, in the presence of the house.

The speaker then addressed the respondent as follows:

The resolution first read, clearly indicates the opinion of the house, of your conduct, as the author of a letter addressed to one of its members, offering improper inducements to support an application pending before the legislature. Your own admission establishes the fact, that you was the writer of such letter. The offence committed by you is one of no ordinary character, for which the statute imposes the heaviest penalties. Any attempt to corrupt the integrity of the members of this house, or to destroy the purity of legislation, deserves not only the severest reprobation, but the infliction of exemplary punishment. There are some circumstances calculated to palliate your offence:—these are your extreme youth and inexperience, to these, joined to your disclaimer of all wicked or corrupt intention, may be attributed the mildness of the decision of the house, which it is my duty to pronounce. In obedience to its order, I do therefore reprimand you for your conduct, and trust that this public admonition may prove a salutary lesson to yourself, and serve as a warning and example to all others.

The "Schenectady Cabinet" says:—The following resolution, introduced by Mr. Seward, on Saturday last, in the senate of this state, was defeated (by postponement,) by a vote of 19 to 9; all the "Jackson" members present voting against it except Messrs. Sherman, Sudam and Van Schaick:

Resolved, (if the assembly concur,) That the president of the United States, in his late proclamation, has advanced the true principles upon which only the constitution can be maintained and defended.

NEW JERSEY. Samuel L. Southard, at present governor of the state, has been elected a senator of the United States, after the 4th inst. in place of M. Dickerson, esq. whose period of service will then expire. For Mr. Southard 37, for capt. Stockton 23.

MARYLAND. The house of delegates of this state (51 to 15) have passed a liberal supplement to the act for making a rail road from Baltimore to Washington, and subscribing 500,000 dollars to the stock. The road is to be made by the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company.

VIRGINIA. The following is among the curiosities of the times:

In the legislature of Virginia, on Tuesday, last week, the following preamble and resolution was moved by Mr. Knox:

"Whereas a bill is now pending before the senate of the United States, which proposes to invest the president with the authority of employing at discretion the land and naval forces of the country, for the purpose of carrying into effect the revenue laws of the general government; and whereas, in the opinion of the general assembly of Virginia, there exists no necessity for clothing the president with such unlimited powers, Resolved, therefore, by the general assembly of Virginia, that John Tyler and William C. Rives, senators in the congress of the United States from the state of Virginia, be and they are hereby instructed to vote against the said bill, and to use their best exertions in order to defeat the passage of the same; and likewise request our representatives in congress to do likewise."

After some debate, and a refusal to defer the fate of the resolution, by laying it on the table, it was indefinitely postponed (rejected) by a vote of 75 to 51.

[On the matter of this resolution, the will of Virginia has been "nullified"—one of her senators constitutionally voting against the other constitutional senator.]

Colonization. In the house of delegates, on Saturday, the committee of finance, to whom had been referred the various petitions for legislative aid to the colonization society—made a report conformable thereto. A motion was made by Mr. Brodnax to lay the report on the table, which was, after much discussion, rejected.—Mr. Dade moved the indefinite postponement, which also, after considerable debate, was decided in the negative—ayes 57—noes 57. The house adjourned without disposing of the subject. On Monday, Mr. Ritchie moved to take up the report—several members desired that the vote on the taking up should be considered as a test vote. The question was then taken—the ayes and noes being called—and it was taken up—ayes 61—noes 59. It was then referred to a select committee consisting of Messrs. Gilmer, Brodnax, Campbell, Marshall, Faulkner, Pendleton, Carter (of P. W.,) McDowell, Cabell, McCamant and King.

SOUTH CAROLINA. We are happy to learn that the late affray in Barnwell district was a mere quarrel between four individuals—and tho' there was a pretty rough fight with dirks, &c. no one killed. A general battle was expected by the persons present, but the interference of influential gentlemen prevented it.

It will be seen that gen. Hamilton, president of the convention, has directed a meeting of that body at Columbia on the 11th inst.

CHARLESTON. A fire broke out in this city on the evening of the 16th ult. in a small wooden building situated on East Bay, a few doors south of Market street, and in its progress seemed to threaten a large part of the town with destruction—but, by the spirited exertions of the firemen, powerfully assisted by col. Bankhead and major Heilman, of the U. S. army, at the head of 100 men, and a strong detachment of seamen from the U. S. ship Natchez, under command of capt. Ringgold, the progress of the flames was arrested, after 30 or 40 buildings had been consumed, blown up, or pulled down. In general, they were of wood and not very valuable.

GEORGIA. Savannah, Feb. 13. Yesterday was the birth-day of colonial Georgia. On that day, 100 years ago, the British standard was planted on the bluff of this city, and the territory then occupied, declared an appendage of Great Britain. Its infancy was nurtured by Anglo-Saxon care and protection, until kindness was converted into the oppressions of a tyrannical step-mother, and then, her authority being thrown off, Georgia has grown up a healthy, vigorous and prolific nation 100 years old, and still capable under the care and auspices of republican self-government, of being as vigorous, healthy and prolific 100 years hence, as yesterday's anniversary found her. To enable her to attain that mature age, it is only necessary to keep her a member of the present and future confederacy of the United America—and above all beyond the mephitic exhalations of nullification.

The day was ushered in by "all the pomp and circumstance" of military parade, by our brilliant volunteer corps.

MISSISSIPPI. After eighteen ballots, the legislature of this state adjourned without electing a senator of the United States, after the 4th March next, Mr. Black having been appointed to fill the vacancy. The votes were divided between Messrs. Black (the sitting member), James C. Wilkins, and P. R. Pray.

FLORIDA. An act has been passed by the governor and council of this territory to incorporate the "Union bank of Florida," with a capital of 1,000,000, and a privilege of increasing it to 3,000,000 dollars.

STATE BANKS. We are glad to hear that the projects of state banks in Ohio, Kentucky and Indiana have failed—for the present; and hope the same result in Maryland.

INDIAN WAR. Louisville, Feb. 19. We received last evening the following letter, which contains information of considerable moment.

Cantonment Gibson, Jan. 12, 1838.

Dear friend: I take this opportunity of informing you of our situation. Capt. Ford's company of U. S. rangers left this place on the 5th instant, by order of col. Arbutckle, on an expedition against the Pawnees, but, to their surprise, they were attacked on the 9th, by a band of Camansha Indians, five hundred in number. They fought with great bravery for the space of an hour and a half, but they were surrounded and overpowered, and compelled to surrender themselves prisoners of war. I was at the fort when the express came in. One of the lieutenants made his escape, and brought information that the savages, at the time of his leaving them, were massacring their prisoners. It is supposed that all have been put to death. Five companies of regulars, on the receipt of the intelligence, immediately started to rescue such as might be still alive. There is every probability of a bloody war with the Camansha Indians.

JAMES SMITH, a ranger under capt. Boon.

QUESTION AND ANSWER! Mr. Clayton, of Delaware, in the course of his argument in favor of the revenue bill, in the senate, asked Mr. Tyler "if he would deny that he was a citizen of the United States?" To which Mr. Tyler responded that "he was not a citizen of the government of the United States."

Q.—If Mr. Tyler had been in many parts of Europe in troublesome times, he would not only have proudly called himself a "citizen of the United States," but also said that he was a "Yankee"—boasting of events

"Which gave to fame

The Yankee name."

"She is no Frenchman," said the boatswain of the Java, when carried below into the cock-pit severely wounded, "but a d—d Yankee. She fires three times to our two. We'll be prisoners, or on our voyage to —, in a few minutes."

IN EFFIGY! There have been sundry hangings and shootings of the president of the United States, in effigy, in parts of the south. Neither hurts much! The editor of the REGISTER has suffered such punishments many times—in that quarter.

INCREASE OF AMERICAN TONNAGE. We learn from good authority that there are now on the stocks in the United States, one hundred and thirty ships, averaging more than three hundred and fifty tons each. Of this number it is said that upwards of seventy are being built east of Boston.

This is a truly gratifying evidence of the prosperous state of our commercial interests, and promises a fair chance of promotion to the enterprising officers in our merchant service.

[Cour. & Eng.

[What better proof than the preceding would any man desire to have, that the "high" and "abominable" tariff of 1828, yet in operation, has destroyed navigation and commerce?]

FUEL IN NEW YORK. From a statement published in the New York Daily Advertiser, it appears that the cost of fuel in that city for one year, is one million three hundred and sixty-nine thousand, five hundred and seven dollars and eighty cents, which, calculating the population at two hundred and twenty thousand, is a fraction over six dollars to each individual. The statement only embraces the quantity of wood and American coal sold to citizens for consumption; and does not include the large quantity of Liverpool, Sidney, Picton, and other foreign coal used by the citizens and for manufactures; nor does it include the pine wood used for steam boats.

POSTMASTERS. An old subscriber in New York, who is strongly opposed to nullification by South Carolina—requests that the postmaster general may be informed of the necessity of certain nullifying acts on the line of the road between Baltimore and western New York.

SIX CENTS DAMAGE. Two persons at New York, one a shop-keeper and the other a whiskered dandy, have each obtained the handsome sum of six cents damages, on account of certain cowhiddings which they received—the one from a brother, and the other from the father, of young ladies whom they had insulted.

CASE OF MR. FILLEBROWN. The National Intelligencer of Feb. 23, says—The supreme court delivered its opinion yesterday in the case of the United States vs. Thomas Fillebrown, affirming the judgment of the circuit court of the District of Columbia in favor of the defendant. As this is one of the cases originating in the political persecutions of the memorable year 1829, we shall take an early opportunity of recurring to the opinion of the supreme court, and presenting to our readers a more particular account of it.

THE MEDICAL PROFESSION. In the medical class of the university of Pennsylvania, for the session of 1832-3 there were 368 students—of these 120 were from Pennsylvania, 103 from Virginia, 30 North Carolina, 15 South Carolina, 14 Georgia, 19 New Jersey, New England 10, New York 10, Maryland 9, Alabama and District of Columbia 7 each, Louisiana and Delaware 5 each, Kentucky and Mississippi 4 each, Tennessee, Canada and West Indies 2 each.

The whole number of students was 823—collegiate 105, medical 368, academical 186, charity (English) schools 164.

UNITED STATES MINT. The report of the director of this establishment for the year just ended, shows the coinage, during the year, of the sum of $3,401,055—consisting of 157,457 half eagles—4,400 quarter do.—4,797,000 half dollars—320,000 quarter do.—522,500 dimes—965,000 half do.—and 2,352,000 cents. Of the gold coined, $80,000 were from Mexico, South America and the West Indies, $28,000 from Africa; $678,000 from the gold region in our own country; and about $12,000 from sources not ascertained. Of the gold produced in the United States $34,000 came from Virginia; 458,000 from North Carolina; 45,000 from South Carolina; 140,000 from Georgia; and 1,000 from Tennessee. The quantity produced in South Carolina was more than doubled within the last year; in North Carolina nearly doubled; in Virginia increased 30 per cent. in Georgia diminished 20 per cent.

BEAUTIES OF THE PRESS. From the New Hampshire Patriot, of Feb 25. It will be seen that Mr. Blair has been defeated as printer to the next congress, and Messrs. Gales & Seaton elected. Thus it is, the editor of the Globe, who has stood forth the champion of the people and the administration, and who has done more than almost any other man in exposing the corruptions of the bank and the false and deceptive course of the opposition, has been forced to give place to the editors of the Intelligencer, a leading and bitter opposition print. And this too, has been done by members of congress elected by the people to sustain the administration. When will these things cease? Government patronage enough has been bestowed upon the profligate Englishman, Gales, to make fifty prudent men rich, and now another job has been given him, for their services to the bank and the federal party.

From the same. §5. Mr. Clay's land bill seems to be hung up in congress. We wish the house would pass it, only to see how quick old Hickory would veto it.

BRITISH REVENUE. From late London papers we lay before our readers an abstract of the amount of the revenue for the years and quarters ended 5th January, 1833.

It will be seen that the total ordinary revenue for the year ended 5th January, 1833, is £43,379,339. The total revenue for the year ended 5th January, 1832, was £42,833,170. The increase on the year is £546,169.

The total revenue for the quarter ended 5th January, 1833, is £11,705,301. The total revenue for the quarter ended 5th January, 1832, was £11,743,536. The decrease on the quarter is £23,473.

On the year, the customs have increased £233,167; on the quarter £358,583. On the year, the excise has increased £326,346; on the quarter it has decreased £299,086. The taxes have increased in the year £79,543. The post office has decreased in the year no less than £68,006; on the quarter, however, it has increased £10,000.

BRITISH WEST INDIES. By the brig Mary, captain Green, in 16 days from Montego Bay, we have Jamaica papers as late as the 26th ultimo, which are mostly occupied with the subject which has so long distracted that island, and rendered it justly obnoxious to the charge of religious persecution. The Jamaica Courant, a paper of considerable influence, seems to be devoted to the destruction of certain religious sects, on the ground that they have instigated the slaves to rebellion. To such an extent has the public mind been excited against the Baptist and Methodist clergymen, that they have been assailed and mobbed, while in the performance of their religious duties, and, in many instances, have narrowly escaped with their lives. To protect these classes of citizens from violence, and to preserve the public peace, a proclamation had been issued by his majesty William the 4th, which reached Jamaica on the 26th; it forbids all civil and military officers, under the government, connecting themselves with the clubs which have been organizing to oppose public preaching, and calls upon them to use every exertion in their power to bring the offenders to justice. The Courant speaks in terms of defiance of the proclamation, and remarks: "His majesty appears to imagine we are all slaves! and that we are to be governed at a distance of four thousand miles, by a proclamation, in defiance of laws which have been sanctioned by his predecessors; by these laws we shall be governed, however we may incur the high displeasure of his most gracious majesty!" If the Courant speaks the language of the great mass of the people, we cannot predict what may be the result of this disturbing question, or where it will end.

So far the New York Advocate: and the N. Y. American says—A gentleman who has an intimate acquaintance with local property in the island of Jamaica, on looking over our files received by the last vessels, observed that sales have been attempted of the following estates: Temple Hall, with two hundred and forty negroes, which cost a few years since, fifty thousand pounds, was bid in, eight thousand only having been offered for it; Pleasant Hill, a coffee estate with two hundred and sixty nine negroes, cost, a few years since, one hundred thousand pounds, was bid in, only ten thousand offered. These are said to be fair specimens of the depreciation of the value of estates in the island; and as they were brought to the hammer, the mortgage having been sued up, would not have brought much more than sufficient to pay the costs of court.

FOREIGN NEWS.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

A great fire had taken place in Liverpool, in which 10 to 12,000 bales of cotton were consumed. The total damage said to be 300,000 pounds sterling.

The splendid and extensive premises at Leith were destroyed by fire early in January. It included steam mills, grain lofts, baths and spirit cellars, and extended from the head of Broad Wynd to the shore, and along the front of shore to Bernard street—loss estimated at $178,000.

The mail from Exeter to London, a distance of 173 miles, is carried in eighteen hours, while the mail from Calais to Paris, the same distance, is allowed 30 hours, and that is now thought rapid travelling.

Troops were leaving England—for Ireland and the West Indies.

A good many cases of cholera have recently appeared in England and Ireland.

The renewal of the charter of the bank of England is an absorbing topic.

A story is current in Chichester of a dignitary of the church complaining to his bishop that he could not live upon his income, (nearly £1,000 a year.) His lordship is reported to have said, "You had better be quiet; it is possible you will be compelled ere long, to live upon a much smaller sum."

PORTUGAL.

Don Pedro was still confined in Oporto, which Miguel's troops had bombarded, and considerably damaged. The fleet of Sartorius was expected at Oporto, from Vigo.

FRANCE.

The authorities are much embarrassed how to dispose of the duchess of Berri. They will neither bring her to trial, nor discharge her.

The king has reviewed the army in the north, as it was returning from Antwerp, and liberally bestowed rewards and praises.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

The state of affairs has not materially changed. The king of Holland had not swerved from his purposes.

We need only cite one proof of the enthusiasm which animates this extraordinary people. On the very day that the news of the surrender of the citadel at Antwerp arrived in Holland, the concourse of subscribers for the loan was immense, and all the funds necessary for the national defence against a most cruel oppression, were furnished with the greatest eagerness, and even rivalry. ITALY.

The following from Naples is of December 22: "For two days the eruption of Vesuvius has assumed an alarming character; the flanks of the mountain are furrowed in every direction by vast torrents of lava. We can perceive three small craters that have formed themselves in the centre of the great crater, the edge of which is in several places rent by crevices 30 or 40 feet wide, and 15 or 20 deep. A new stream of lava, which formed itself in the night of the 20th, has taken the direction of Portici."

GREECE

Is becoming more settled. It is said that the French troops were to be speedily withdrawn.

COLOMBIA.

We are glad to hear, generally, that present peace prevails in this long war-wexed land, though we do not understand how many "sovereign" states have been made for the rule of the several chiefdoms. There seems to be not less than three of them—Venezuela, New Granada and "Escudor." The latter is called a "republic," but we don't know it by its name.

TURKEY AND EGYPT.

A letter from Paris, of January 12th, gives the following as the latest and most authentic information from Constantinople:—

The progress of the pacha's troops in Asia Minor is rapid; insurrection is fast spreading every where. The sultan has no money and but few troops. He cannot rely either on the courage or fidelity of the latter; and it may be regarded as certain, that on their first encounter with Ibrahim, they will be defeated and dispersed, if not induced to join his triumphant banner. All the best letters from Constantinople, dated the 10th ult. and received by the last post, say that Ibrahim was only a few days' march from the capital, and express the fullest conviction that nothing but foreign interference could check his progress. It is evident that the court of Russia is anxiously desirous to prevent his going too far, and it is probable that it will take means to prevent him, if the danger becomes too imminent to allow of any time being lost in consultations with other European powers on what ought to be done.

The Egyptian fleet of 25 sail had appeared in the Archipelago, seeking the Turkish of 40 sail, which was at anchor at the mouth of the Dardanelles. It was reported that 70,000 men of the Turkish army had joined the Egyptians. If all that is stated is true, the sultan must yield to his pacha, unless saved by the interposition of the European governments.

The plague was raging at Constantinople, and had carried off 17,000 persons.

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

To all to whom these presents may come:

Know ye, that by virtue of the authority vested in me by the convention of the people of South Carolina, I do hereby call together, and by these presents I have convoked the members of the said convention to re-assemble at Columbia, in the state aforesaid, at meridian, on the second Monday in March next, which will be on the 11th day thereof, to deliberate on such matters touching the interests and welfare of the good people aforesaid, as may be then and there presented for their consideration.

And I hereby call upon the said members to be punctual in their attendance, at the time and place herein specified.

Given under my hand and seal, in the parish of St. Peter's, South Carolina, this 13th day of February, in the year of [L. s.] our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, and in the fifty-seventh year of American independence.

A large number of counterfeit bills of the bank of the United States have been circulated in New Brunswick, and especially at Fredericksburg.

The Rival, which sailed from Grenock for Oporto, on the 22d of November, with a crew of 37 men and 428 passengers for the service of Don Pedro, was totally lost on the 4th of December, near Galway, and every soul on board perished. The vessel was commanded by Mr. William Wallace, and the men for Portugal were under the charge of capt. Bygraves. The passengers were chiefly mechanics; journeymen operatives, weavers, and laborers, from almost every town and village in the west of Scotland, but principally from Galway.

The superintendent of salt springs, in the county of Onondaga, New York, reports the whole number of bushels of salt inspected during the year 1832, was one million six hundred and fifty-two thousand nine hundred and eighty-five, of which one hundred eighty-seven thousand six hundred and fifty-three was coarse salt.

The United States express, between Washington and Charleston, has performed some great exploits. The journey between Petersburg and Laurenceville, 49 miles, (one of the worst of roads at this season of the year) was lately made in two hours and 30 minutes—and 71 miles on the line travelled in 3 hours and 50 minutes. There is no need of such hurry, we suppose, just now, and we hope that there will not be—but the organization is proper, and its efficiency should be ascertained and kept up—pro tem.

TWENTY-SECOND CONGRESS—SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

The following is a copy of Mr. Clay's compromise tariff bill, as it was reported by the select committee.

Strike out the parts within [brackets] and insert the parts in italics.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That upon and after the 30th day of December, 1833, in all cases, where duties are imposed on foreign imports, by the act of July 14, 1832, entitled "an act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," or by any other act, shall exceed 20 per centum on the value thereof, one-tenth part thereof shall be deducted; from and after the 30th day of September, 1835, another tenth part thereof shall be deducted; from and after the 30th day of September, 1837, another tenth part thereof shall be deducted; from and after the 30th day of September, 1839, another tenth part thereof shall be deducted; from and after the 30th day of September, 1841, one-half of the residue of such excess shall be deducted; and from and after the 30th day of September, 1842, the other half shall be deducted.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the second section of the act of the 14th of July aforesaid, as fixes the rate of duty on all milled and fulling cloth, known by the name of plains, kerseys, or Kendal cottons, of which wool is only the material, the value whereof does not exceed 35 cents a square yard, at 5 per centum ad valorem, shall be, and the same is hereby repealed. And the said articles shall be subject to the same duty of 50 per centum as is provided by the said second section for other manufactures of wool, which duty shall be liable to the same reductions as are prescribed by the first section of this act.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That until the 30th day of September, 1842, the duties imposed by existing laws as modified by this act shall remain, and continue to be collected. [And he collected in ready money; and laid for the purpose of collecting such revenue, as may be necessary to an economical admininistration of the government, and, for that purpose, shall be equal upon all articles according to their value, which are not, by this act, declared to be entitled to entry subsequent to the said 30th September, 1842, free of duty, and until otherwise directed by law from and after the said 30th day of September, 1842, such duties shall be at the rate of 20 per cent. ad valorem; and from and after that day, all credits now allowed by law, in the payment of duties, shall be, and hereby are, abolished—Provided, That nothing herein contained, shall be construed to prevent the passage of any law in the event of war with any foreign power, for imposing such duties as may be deemed by congress necessary to the prosecution of such war.] And from and after the day last aforesaid, all duties on imports shall be collected in ready money, and all credits now allowed by law, to the payment of duties, shall be, and hereby are, abolished, and such duties shall be laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the government; and from and after the day last aforesaid, the duties required to be paid by law on goods, wares and merchandise, shall be assessed upon the value thereof at the port where the same shall be entered, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the articles now exempted by the existing laws from the payment of duties, the following articles imported from and after the 30th day of September, 1833, and until the 30th day of September, 1842, shall also be admitted to entry, free from duty, to wit: bleached and unbleached linens, table linens, linen napkins, and linen cambrics, manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be the component material of chief value, coming from this side of the Cape of Good Hope, excepting sewing silk, and worsted stuff, goods, shawls, and other manufactures of silk and worsted.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That from and after the said 30th day of September, 1842, the following articles shall be admitted to entry, free from duty, to wit: [unmanufactured cotton] indigo, quicksilver, sulphur, crude saltpetre, steel, grind stones, refined borax, emery, opium, tin in plates or sheets, gum arabic, gum senegal, lac dye, madders, madder root, nuts and berries used in dyeing, saffron, tumeric, wood or pastel, aloes, ambergris, Burgundy pitch, cochineal, canomile flowers, coriander seed, catnip, chalk, coeulus indicus, horn plate for lanterns, ox horns, other horns and tips, India rubber, unmanufactured ivory, juniper berries, musk, nuts of all kinds, oil of juniper, unmanufactured rattans and reeds, tortoise shell, tin foil, shellac, all vegetables used principally in dyeing and composing dyes, woad and all articles employed chiefly for dyeing, except alum, copperas, bichromate of potash, prussiate of potash, chromate of potash, and nitrate of lead, aqua fortis, and tartaric acids, [and all other dyeing drugs and materials for composing dyes,] and all imports on which the first section of this act may operate, and all articles now admitted to entry, free from duty or paying a less rate of duty than 20 per centum ad valorem before the said 30th day of September, 1842, from and after that day may be admitted to entry subject to such duty not exceeding 20 per centum ad valorem, as shall be provided for by law.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act of the 14th day of July, 1833, or of any other act as is inconsistent with this act shall be, and the same is hereby repealed. Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the passage, prior, or subsequent to the said 30th day of September, 1842, of any act or acts, from time to time, that may be necessary to defect, prevent or punish evasions of the duties on imports imposed by law; nor to prevent the passage of any act prior to the 30th day of September, 1842, in the contingency either of excess or deficiency of revenue, altering the rate of duties on articles which by the aforesaid act of 14th day of July, 1833, are subject to a less rate of duty than 20 per centum ad valorem, in such manner as not to exceed that rate, and so to adjust the revenue to either of the said contingencies.

February 22. Mr. Benton presented two memorials from Missouri, one against the passage of the bill relating to the proceeds of the public lands, and the other against rechartering the United States bank; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Frelinghuysen, presented a memorial from certain manufacturers of copper, which was laid on the table.

The various bills lying on the table, waiting for their third reading, were taken up, and a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Forsyth, the senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

When the doors were reopened—

The senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to modify the acts imposing duties on imports.

After a considerable debate, the question being upon Mr. Clay's motion to amend the bill (so as to require a home instead of a foreign valuation, after the year 1842).

Mr. Calhoun said that he regretted that this amendment had been offered, but, as he had to choose between it and the failure of the bill, he had determined to vote for it. He voted for it, however, expressly on the ground, and with the declaration, first, that it should not be so construed as to require that the value should be ascertained by adding the amount of the duty to the value of the goods; and, second, that it should not be so applied as to violate that principle of the constitution which requires that all taxes and imposts shall be uniform throughout the United States.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hill, Holmes, Johnston, King, Knight, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Sprague, Tomlinson, Tyler, Wilkins—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Forsyth, Grundy, Kane, Robinson, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, Waggaman, Webster, White, Wright—16.

So the amendment was agreed to.

On the suggestion of Mr. Tyler—

Mr. Smith moved to amend the bill in the second section, by striking out the words at the close of the section, constituting the last paragraph.

The section reads as follows, and the part moved to be stricken out is enclosed in brackets:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the second section of the act of the 14th of July aforesaid, as fixes the rate of duty on all milled and fulled cloth, known by the name of plains, kerseys, or Kendal cottons, of which wool is the only material, the value whereof does not exceed thirty-five cents a square yard, at five per cent. ad valorem, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed. [And the said articles shall be subject to the same duty of fifty per cent. as is provided by the said second section for other manufactures of wool, which duty shall be liable to the same deductions as are prescribed by the first section of this act.]"

Mr. Clay expressed a hope that the amendment would not be pressed.

Mr. Forsyth advocated the proposition to amend.

Some further remarks were made by Messrs. Webster, Clayton, Clay, Foot and Miller, when the bill was, on motion of Mr. Dudley, laid on the table, in consequence of a message from the house, announcing the death of the hon. James Leut, a representative from New York, and inviting the senate to attend the funeral to-morrow, at 11 o'clock.

The usual resolution was then adopted, and, on motion of Mr. Clay, it was Ordered, That when the senate adjourns, it adjourn to meet to-morrow, at one o'clock. The senate then adjourned.

February 23. After attending the funeral of Mr. Leut, of the house of representatives—

At half past one o'clock, the senate was called to order.

The chair communicated a report from the department of state, containing a statement of passengers and seamen who have arrived in passenger ships.

Mr. Dallas presented a memorial from the manufacturers of worsted yarn; which was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. Clay, the bill to modify the acts imposing duties on imports, was taken up.

The question being on the motion of Mr. Smith, to amend the second section, some discussion took place, in which Messrs. Wright, Foot, Clay, Forsyth, Buckner, Bell, Holmes, Smith, Sprague, Chambers, Benton, Dickerson, Silsbee, Frelinghuysen and Bibb took part.

Mr. Smith having modified his motion so as to strike out the whole of the second section, (which goes to replace plains, kerseys, &c. where they stood before the act of July, 1832) the yeas and nays were ordered on that question.

Before any question was taken, Mr. Wilkins moved that the senate do now adjourn.

Mr. Clay asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the question being taken it was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Hill, Knight, Robinson, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, Tipton, Webster, Wilkins—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Kane, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Sprague, Tomlinson, Troup, Tyler, White, Wright—31.

So the senate refused to adjourn.

The question then recurred on the motion to strike out the second section.

Some discussion took place between Messrs. Webster, Clay, Chambers and Clayton, and the question was about to be taken; when

Mr. Chambers moved that the senate do now adjourn.

The yeas and nays being ordered, the question was taken and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Chambers, Dallas, Dickerson, Hendricks, Kane, Knight, Prentiss, Robinson, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, Webster, Wilkins—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Holmes, Johnston, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Rives, Robbins, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Troup, Tyler, White, Wright—28.

After some remarks from Mr. Webster and Mr. Clay, the question was then taken on the motion to strike out the second section of the bill, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Dallas, Dudley, Forsyth, Grundy, Kane, King, Robinson, Silsbee, Smith, Webster, White, Wright—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Dickerson, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Seymour, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Troup, Tyler, Wilkins—29.

So the senate refused to strike out the second section.

Mr. Kane then moved to amend the bill by adding another section, which provided that nothing contained in this act should be construed to extend to the present duties on lead in pigs, bars, or sheets, leaden shot, red or white lead, dry or ground in oil, sugar of lead, &c. &c.

Mr. Smith moved to amend the amendment by adding the words "bar iron and castings of iron, gunpowder, cannon, mortars, howitzers, cannon balls, shells for guns and howitzers," &c. Mr. S. said this proposition was to carry out the views of the secretary of the treasury in reference to the protection of munitions of war.

After a few words from Mr. Clay in opposition to the last proposition, and in favor of it from Mr. Smith and Dickerson, the yeas and nays were ordered, and the question being taken, was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Hendricks, Kane, Robinson, Smith, Tipton, Webster, Wilkins, Wright—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Grundy, Holmes, Johnston, King, Knight, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Rives, Robbins, Seymour, Sprague, Tomlinson, Troup, White—25.

So the amendment to the amendment was negatived.

The question was then taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. Kane, the yeas and nays being ordered, and it was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Dickerson, Dudley, Hendricks, Kane, Robinson, Silsbee, Smith, Tipton, Wilkins, Wright—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Dallas, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Grundy, Holmes, Johnston, King, Knight, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Rives, Robbins, Seymour, Sprague, Tomlinson, Troup, Tyler, Webster, White—27.

So the motion to amend was rejected.

Mr. Forsyth then moved to strike out the 3d and 6th sections of the bill, which attempt to bind all future congresses until the year 1842.

Mr. Webster made one or two observations on the motion.

The yeas and nays were then ordered, and the question being taken, was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Forsyth, Kane, Knight, Robinson, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, Webster—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Grundy, Holmes, Johnston, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Troup, Tyler, White, Wilkins, Wright—28.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. Benton then moved to amend the bill by adding a new section, the object of which was to make a reduction of the drawbacks allowed on the exportation of articles manufactured in the United States from foreign materials subject to duty, in the same proportion as the reduction made in the duties by this bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered on this motion.

After a few words from Messrs. Benton, Calhoun, Smith, Poindexter, Foot and Miller,

The question was taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Calhoun, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Forsyth, Johnston, Kane, King, Rives, Robinson, Seymour, Tomlinson, Webster, White, Wilkins, Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Grundy, Hendricks, Holmes, Knight, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Sprague, Tipton, Troup, Tyler—24.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. Wright then moved to amend the bill by adding a section to restore the duties on coarse wool to the rates established by the bill of 1838.

On this question the yeas and nays were ordered, and after an explanation from Mr. Wright, that his object was merely to place coarse wool as it was placed in 1838, in consequence of the adoption by this bill of a duty of 5 per cent. on coarse wools, the question was taken and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Dudley, Hendricks, Seymour, Silsbee, Tipton, Webster, Wright—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Buckner, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Grundy, Holmes, Johnston, King, Knight, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Smith, Tomlinson, Troup, Tyler, White, Wilkins—32.

So the motion was negatived.

Mr. Silsbee moved to strike out the words "coming from this side of the cape of Good Hope," in reference to the discrimination made in the places from which silks are imported.

The motion was negatived without a division.

The bill was then reported as amended.

Mr. Dallas then moved to amend the amendment made as in committee of the whole, in the third section, by striking out the words which suggest the point to which the duties shall be ultimately reduced, to be the "revenue necessary to an economical administration of the government."

A discussion took place on this motion, in which it was contended by Messrs. Webster, Dallas, Dickerson and Buckner, that these words, although not so intended, might be construed by southern gentlemen, in the year 1842, as an abandonment of the protective principle, and a design on the part of those who had introduced this bill, to make revenue alone the standard of all future duties on imports.

Mr. Clayton and Mr. Clay regarded the language as authorizing no such construction, and denied that any one would be justified in inferring that there was to be any abandonment of the system of protection. It was insisted by Mr. Clayton that the government could not be kept together if the principle of protection were to be discarded in our policy, and declared that he would pause before he surrendered that principle, even to save the union.

Mr. Forsyth regarded the clause as an absurdity, on which an argument either for or against protection might be erected; but as it was the only absurdity which was agreeable to him, among the many absurdities contained in the bill, he would vote for it.

Mr. Holmes said a few words to restore the senate to good humor, quoting the juvenile ballad:

Let dogs delight to bark and bite,
For God has made them so;
Let bears and tigers growl and fight,
For 'tis their nature, too.
But brethren you should never let Such angry passions rise,
Your pretty hands were never made
To tear each others' eyes.

The question was taken, the yeas and nays being ordered, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Knight, Prentiss, Robbins, Seymour, Silsbee, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, Wilkins, Wright—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Grundy, Holmes, Johnston, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Rives, Troup, Tyler, White—22.

So the amendment was rejected.

The amendment made in committee by inserting "steel" among the free articles, was not concurred in.

The other amendments were concurred in.

Mr. Webster then stated his intention to oppose the bill, on its general principles; but if the senate would take the question on the engrossment without calling the yeas and nays, he would postpone what he had to urge until the question should come up on its final passage.

The question was then put, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

On motion of Mr. Clay, the bill, as amended, was ordered to be printed, and 500 copies were ordered.

Mr. Calhoun then said, that as the whole of Monday would probably be occupied in this debate, he would postpone the consideration of his resolutions, which stood as the special order for Monday, until Tuesday.

At 9 o'clock the senate adjourned.

February 25. Mr. Robbins, from the committee on the library, reported a joint resolution authorising an extension of the subscription of congress to the continuation of the compilation of documents publishing by Gales & Seaton; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. Smith, the previous orders were postponed, and the senate proceeded to consider the bill making appropriations for the military service; which was considered, and ordered to a third reading.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

Mr. King moved to suspend for two days the order which excludes all persons from the floor.

The chair stated that it would be impossible to preserve order, if the rule should be suspended. He understood that when the gallery fronting the chair was erected, it was intended that the first seats should be reserved for ladies; and although it was now filled with persons who undoubtedly had a right to occupy it, he was certain that it would be only necessary to make the suggestion, to induce every gentleman to retire from that position for the purpose of accommodating female visitors. At the same time, he signified his entire willingness to conform to the present motion, if such should be the unanimous wish of the senate.

No objection being made, the order was suspended.

The bill to modify the act of the 14th day of July, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties on imports, was read a third time, and the question being on its passage,

The yeas and nays were ordered on this question, on the call of Mr. King,

Mr. Webster then rose, and gave his sentiments in opposition to the bill. He paid, in the commencement, a tribute to the purity, zeal and ability of the senator from Kentucky, for whom he had so long entertained a high respect, and to elevate whom to a situation where his talents might be still more beneficial to his country, he had zealously labored. He also complimented the talents and services of the senator from South Carolina, with whom he had so often acted, and for whom he had always felt a sincere regard. He briefly reviewed his own course, when the former bills on the subject of the tariff were under consideration, and the conviction which was forced on the east, and other portions of the country, that the protective system was to be the settled policy of the government. New England had resisted, in the first instance, the establishment of a high protective policy; but when that was determined on, the eastern states turned all their natural advantages, and their capital of wealth and industry, into the new channel thus marked out for them. The bill of 1826 was to carry out the promises made by the bill of 1824. He disliked the bill of 1828, yet he had voted for it on account of that feature in it which gave the woolens the protection which the government had pledged itself to give by the law of 1824. That bill decided the policy of the country, unless it was to be kept in a state of perpetual fluctuation and uncertainty.

After passing the law of last session, a law containing some features of concession and compromise, when the country was not prepared for any change, the present bill, professing to be a bill of peace, of arrangement and of compromise, is brought forward by the distinguished senator from Kentucky, who professes to have renounced none of his former opinions as to the constitutionality and expediency of protection. The bill is also supported by a gentleman whose opinions are directly the reverse of those entertained by the senator from Kentucky. When it was supported by such opposite feelings, it was important to look into the provisions of the bill. He stated the various considerations which ought to weigh with those who, as friends of the protective system, voted for this bill.

He did not object to the prospective and biennial reductions made by the bill up to 1841, but he objected to the clauses which did, in effect, prohibit the repealing action of any subsequent congress upon this bill until 1842. He also objected to the proviso in the sixth section, which was a restriction on the power of congress. He put it to the senator from Tennessee, (Mr. Grundy), who had introduced the clause, to say if he did not intend that it should show that congress was to be considered as bound by the bill, as far as this congress could bind the future legislation of the country.

The protected articles may, by this bill, be reduced below 20 per cent. ad valorem, but cannot be raised above 20 per cent.

He opposed the bill because it imposed a restriction on the future legislation of congress. He also opposed it, because it seemed to yield the constitutional power of protection. Various arguments were advanced by him to show that the southern politicians would, if this bill were passed, tell every one of their constituents, that they had gained some concession to the opinions of the south. He said that he approved the significant silence of the southern gentlemen. They would not suffer themselves to be provoked by friend or enemy to speak before the time should come when they ought to speak. They were masters of the game, and they knew it. He commended their policy, but he wished them to see that he understood it. In giving up specific duties, and substituting ad valorem, the bill had abandoned the policy of all wise governments, and the policy of our own government, and the policy always advocated by the senator from Kentucky. He viewed the bill as a surrender of the interests of the smaller capitalists, and a concession in favor of overgrown monopolies. He pointed out the effects of this surrender on our own condition, and the handle which it would give to satirists, and foreign writers, and the poets laureate of all the monarchies of Europe, to turn our institutions and our pretensions into ridicule. If this principle were carried into our navigation, he stated that it would be immediately counterbalanced by Great Britain. By limiting our countervailing power, and leaving the countervailing power of Europe free, we put in her hands weapons to destroy us, and cast our weapons of defence at her feet. Under a colonial system, our manufacturers would not be more completely snatched than they will be by this bill.

He referred to the four powers by which the senator from Kentucky had said that our protective system could be preserved. 1st, prohibition. 2dly, the free list. 3dly, incidental protection—all of which would be found inadequate,—and the 4th, discrimination, or specific duties, was the only one which would avail. Discriminating and specific duties were the last resource, and if that were to be given up, there could be no longer any hope for the protective system, in war or in peace. He insisted, that not being owners of the property, but merely agents or administrators, we had no right to fetter a future congress. He regarded this bill as the last will and testament of this congress, which would be set aside by the people, but not on the ground of want of sanity in those principally engaged in making it, for he never saw gentlemen more fully in possession of that sagacity, nor on account of any undue influence, although he could not help thinking that panic had something to do with it, and that if the South Carolina ordinance and repeal law had not appeared, this bill would never have appeared in the senate.

In reference to the practical effect of the bill, he stated that he saw obstacles to the carrying this bill into effect, which appeared to him to be insurmountable. He thought that it would be difficult to ascertain the legal value of cotton. He took a view of the different values attached to cotton, and of the professional constructions to which the clause concerning cotton would be subjected. In relation to iron also, he thought that the difficulties in ascertaining the value would be such as to render the provision concerning that article inoperative. The duties on iron having hitherto been specific, no principle of valuation had been laid down. He considered that there was no legislative provision by which the value on iron could be assessed. The same remarks were applicable to sugar; and he stated a case to show the difficulty which exists in reaching a proper and fixed value as a basis for duty. He supposed the answer would be, that if difficulties arise, the secretary must get through them as well as he can; and if he cannot he must come to congress.

As a measure of finance, he had no idea that the bill would be an efficient measure. He had not heard the assertion that the bill would at all reduce the revenue. He denied that the reduction of duties on boots and shoes and clothing would reduce the revenue. The bill would, in these branches, reduce thousands of mechanics to ruin, and by this operation would increase the revenue. In this point, the bill aims a deadly blow on the poor, the young, the enterprising; on the labor and the ingenuity of the country. By the introduction of foreign alcohol, at a reduced rate of duty, the revenue would be increased; but he thought gentlemen should pause before they sanctioned this change. The entire breaking up of the printing establishments for printing calicoes would be one of the consequences of the passage of the bill; and in proof he read some extracts from a memorial of the Lowell manufacturers. These institutions might survive the three first reductions, but the fourth would be fatal to them. On the spinning and weaving, the effect, if not so disastrous, would scarcely be less objectionable. The large capitalists in that branch would be able to make money by breaking down all young and enterprising establishments. In reference to woolens, with a duty of 20 per cent. on woolens, and 20 per cent. on wool, it is impossible that they can stand. The depreciation of property would be the first consequence, and the depreciation of credit the next; and, by the surrender of their interests, long before this beneficent home valuation can come to their relief, their eyes will be sealed in death. As to iron, English iron or Wales costs 26 dollars a ton, and the supply is inexhaustible. Iron in Russia and Sweden costs 40 dollars a ton. English iron has been taxed 30 dollars, and Baltic iron 18 dollars a ton. The change from specific to ad valorem duty will work an injurious change. He believed that this surrender once made, we could never return to the present state of things, without such a struggle as would shake the country much more than any thing has yet shaken it.

He might be wrong. There might be no pledge, no constitutional objection; but if so, why this bill? The people will not expect the passage of this bill. There was no expectation at the commencement of this short session that such a bill would be passed. The senate had not had time to know the pleasure of their masters. No opportunity had been offered for obtaining a knowledge of either the course of public opinion, or the effect of this measure on the public interests. It was said the next congress would pass this bill if it was not passed now. He did not fear the next congress; but if that body should choose to undo what was now done, it would have the power so to do.

If it was true, as the senator from Kentucky believed, that the intention of South Carolina was merely to enter into a law suit with the United States, then there was no necessity for this sacrifice of great interests. He believed that if this bill should become a law, there will be an action on the part of the people at the next session to overthrow it. It will not be all requiem and lullaby when this bill shall be passed. On the contrary, he believed there would be discord and discontent. He had already expressed his views as to reduction in his resolutions. He believed there ought to be a reduction to the point of necessary revenue; and that, as soon as that point could be ascertained, any congress would be able to make a tariff which would suit the country. The estimates of the secretary of the treasury as to the point of revenue, vary materially from those of others, but if the true point could be ascertained, he thought congress might at once proceed to an adjustment of the tariff with a prospect of success.

As he had commenced with doing justice to the motives of the gentleman on the other side, he asked that equal justice might be done to him in the opposition which he was compelled to make to a measure which had been ushered in with so much profession of peace and harmony. He would do as much to satisfy South Carolina as any man. He would take this tariff and cut it down to the bone; but he did not wish to rush into untried systems. He believed that his constituents would excuse him for surrendering their interests, but they would not forgive him for a violation of the constitution.

Mr. Clay replied to the senator from Massachusetts. He paid a high tribute to the patriotism and purity of that gentleman, and said that he felt a deep and lasting regret that he had now to differ with him. He was happy, however, to find himself connected with his friend from Maine, with whom he had acted in the final adjustment of the Missouri question. He suggested that if the senator from Massachusetts could not make some appeal to a future congress for forbearance, he must be opposed to all compromise. He repudiated any share in bringing the existing evils on the country, and declared that when he saw the torch applied to a favorite system, he would rush to save it, and to restore security and peace. The honorable member had seen nothing within the last six months, calculated to shew that the tariff was not in danger. Had that gentleman not witnessed the results of the recent elections? Had he not heard the message which had been received from the president? Did he not know that a majority of the friends of the administration were opposed to the tariff? He wished to put the system on a permanent foundation for nine or ten years, that the manufacturer may go to his pillow at night without a fear that the system would be overthrown before morning. If he should have been able to convert a set of politicians, who had heretofore been steadily opposed to the protective system, into high tariff men, he should rejoice that he had been so successful in making proselytes. He maintained that the act of 1824 resorted to the policy of making a tariff without regard to revenue. He (Mr. C.) wished to be clearly understood as to the points which he had relied on for the protection of the industry of the country. He had named, 1st, prohibition—2dly, the imposition of high duties without regard to the amount of revenue—3dly, a limitation of the revenue affording protection as far as he could—and 4thly, by encouraging the manufacturers by letting in articles free of duty. He might have added a 5th mode, by regulating sales by auction, an important object which the manufacturers had solicited congress to accomplish, but which had not yet been done.

He expressed his willingness to have the effect of his bill to be decided by the opinions of the manufacturers themselves, a large number of whom are now assembled in Washington, and whose almost unanimous voice would be in favor of his bill. He referred to correspondence to prove that the bill before the house would be ruinous to their interests, while the bill before the senate would remove all fear of ruin. In reference to iron, he reminded the senator from Massachusetts, that, by a new process called coking, iron would soon be manufactured in this country at as low a rate as in England. His whole objection to the argument of the senator was, that he bounded forward to the argument, and undertook to prophesy what would be the state of things at that period. He would as soon rely on the forecast of the senator from Massachusetts as on any member of the senate, or of the community; but he could not believe that the senator could see results which would be found to be dependent on so many contingencies. An American statesman will look abroad upon all the interests of the country, and would comprehend in one view all its condition. He was as insensible to fear as any one, and therefore the imputation that this measure was introduced under the influence of a panic, could not affect him. But he could not be insensible to the change which had taken place in the situation of things, even since the commencement of the session. At that time South Carolina stood alone; but, since then, Virginia had sent a commissioner, or a minister, to South Carolina, to induce her to delay her operations of hostility. If South Carolina should accede to her request, will not Virginia go with her in her ulterior measures, in case her grievances should not be redressed? Civil war might be the result. He was not willing to apply the sword to reduce the south to obedience. Not that circumstances might not arise, which would render it necessary to resort to force. But in reference to a foreign power, there was always a reluctance to engage in war, until every effort at negotiation had failed; and, if there was this unwillingness to engage in foreign war, how much more reluctance ought there to be to engage in a war at home, in a contest in which he who commands in chief might not be willing to stop until he should have placed himself on a throne. He did not fear any misconstruction of the pledge contained in the bill; and he hoped that the manufacturers would go on and prosper, confident that the abandonment of protection was never intended, and looking to more favorable times for a renewal of a more efficient tariff.

He saw no difficulty in putting an estimate on the value of cotton. Congress lays down the principle, and it will remain for the secretary of the treasury, under the direction of the president, to carry the law into effect. The rule is prescribed, and he could not anticipate any difficulty in acting upon it. He went somewhat at large into statements and arguments to sustain his position in reference to cotton. In the worst form of construction which could be put on the law by the secretary of the treasury, the cotton interest would enjoy a sufficient protection until the year 1841. He shewed what would be his own construction, which would leave that interest in a still better condition. It would be competent, however, for congress, who would again be in session before this law could go into effect, to correct any errors which might be made. In reference to the powers of the secretary to cause a proper appraisement to be made, he quoted from the act of 1833; but repeated that any difficulty in this matter could be obviated by congress at its next session. He referred to the reductions which would be effected by this bill in the article of silks, and in other items. But even if the reductions should be down to the revenue point, there was a reservation to augment or diminish the revenue in circumstances might require. He stated that the last series of gradations in 1841 would leave the duties on woollens at 33 per cent. There were, he said, two classes of manufacturers, the political and the business manufacturers. The political manufacturers were unwilling to give up any thing; but there was not a business manufacturer within his knowledge who was not satisfied with the present bill. He explained his bill as going on the broad principle of looking to the interests of all, and embracing the safety and security of all, and the conciliation of the country. He asked if the senator from Massachusetts was not willing that opposite interests should unite for the purpose of bringing about harmony and good feeling. The south had given up her constitutional objections, and had also yielded the home valuation, and it could not be said, therefore, that there had been no sacrifice of her interests. There had been, therefore, no abandonment of principle, but all parts of this great family had come together prepared to make mutual concessions for the purpose of restoring harmony.

[It being near 4 o'clock, a motion was made by Mr. Wilkins and Mr. Ewing, in succession, to take a recess for two hours, but on some opposition made by Mr. Calhoun and others, Mr. Clay said he was willing to hobble on, and the motion was withdrawn.]

Mr. Clay then resumed, and stated that the manufacturers of iron would more readily be satisfied by this bill than other proposition which had been offered. There were some who had said, let the tariff go down, if the next congress chooses, there will be a reaction afterwards, but he thought that these gentlemen took counsel of passions above which it was the duty of statesmen to elevate themselves. He was for encountering no certain danger for the purpose of providing some uncertain good. He wished to compromise all interests, and it was with this same policy, that he had proposed another great measure, which had twice received the sanction of a majority of the senate. He would not acquiesce in the views of those who relied on reaction. Similar was the expectation, at the last session, but there had been no beneficial result. He was for conciliating all interests, let whomsoever might fail, and whomsoever might succeed. He regretted that the bill, in select committee, had been injured by striking out the clause making cotton free, and stated that this was not done by his vote, or by that of his friend from Delaware. Still it was a measure calculated to promote the great object for which it was introduced. He was not disposed to throw himself forward to 1832, but he did not think that there was any cause for apprehension as to the provisions which look to that period.

The opponents of the bill would send out a flaming sword: the friends of the bill would send out a flaming sword, accompanied by the olive branch. The gentleman from Massachusetts had thought proper to say that he (Mr. Clay) would have voted for the revenue collection bill. It was true he would have voted for it, but he felt no new born zeal prompting him to make speeches on the subject.

He thought of the administration as he always had thought, and he had determined to leave it to the friends of the executive to bear themselves out in defence of the bill. He would have voted for it, but it would have been with reluctance, because of the consequences which may result from the measure. He stated that, with some exceptions, as to the high-toned doctrines which were to be found in the document, he approved of the general tone of the proclamation of the president, and of his message to the senate on the subject of South Carolina.

The opponents of this bill rely on force; its friends cry out force and affection. One side cries out—power! power! power! The other side cries out power, but desires to see it restrained and tempered by discretion and mercy, and not to create a conflagration from one end of the union to the other. He believed the gentlemen who opposed the bill did not wish for civil war, but the defeat of the bill would lead to consequences to be deplored. And he would not wish to see sacked cities, desolated fields, and streams of American blood shed by American citizens.

He had been accused of ambition in introducing this measure. He despised the grovelling spirits from which the charge came, and dismissed the accusation to the winds. If congress would pass this bill, he would willingly retire to his home, to the groves of Ashland, where he could find a fidelity and an affection which he had not always found in public life.

Mr. Smith said this bill did not reduce the revenue one dollar. There will be no reduction, but the importations would be restricted.

After speaking for a few minutes, Mr. Smith gave way at half past 4, and

Mr. Silsbee moved that the senate take a recess till 6 o'clock—ayes 17, noes 19. So the motion was negatived.

Mr. Smith then resumed, and went into a review of the various sections of the bill. He agreed with the senator from Massachusetts that this bill repeals the whole of the ground on which our revenue system was built.

Mr. Robbins then moved that the senate take a recess till 6 o'clock—ayes 17, noes 17.

The chair voting in the affirmative, it was ordered that the senate take a recess till 6 o'clock.

Evening session.

At 6 o'clock the senate re-assembled its session, and resumed the consideration of the tariff bill; when

Mr. Smith said a few words against the bill.

Mr. Bell spoke briefly in favor of the bill.

Mr. Dickerson, after some remarks, moved to recommit the bill to the committee from which it was reported, with instructions so to amend it that the gradual reductions of duties shall not be more unfavorable to those articles which are subject to a specific duty than to such as are subject to ad valorem duties.

Mr. Grundy asked the yeas and nays on the motion; which were ordered.

Mr. Sprague made a few remarks in favor of the bill.

Mr. Dickerson made some observations.

Mr. Clay then rose, and said that as it was understood that a similar bill had been ordered to be engrossed for a third reading in the other house, he would move that the senate now adjourn. The senate then adjourned.

February 26. The following resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Bibb, was taken up and agreed to:

Resolved, That the secretary of state be directed to lay before the senate, as soon as his duties will permit, a statement, showing the increase per centum of the white population of each state and territory of the United States, at the several decimal periods from the year 1790 to 1830 exclusive. Also the per centum of increase of slaves and free persons of color, showing the relative proportion which such increase may bear to the white population; also, the increase per centum of aliens within the same period, and the proportion that increase may bear to native and naturalized citizens. Also the increase per centum of the militia force of the United States, together with such other statistical information bearing on the same, as the secretary may deem useful and expedient.

On motion of Mr. Hendricks, the senate proceeded to consider the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road, in the states of Indiana and Illinois.

Mr. Hendricks moved to amend the bill, by inserting an additional appropriation of 125,000 dollars, for repairing the Cumberland road east of the Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to; as well as another to authorize a change in the location of a certain part of the road, and the bill ordered to be read a third time.

Mr. Grundy, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the president and vice president elect, made the following report:

"The joint committee appointed to wait on the president and vice president elect, and to notify them of their election, report that they have performed that duty in part, and have waited on Andrew Jackson, of Tennessee, and informed him of his election to the office of president of the United States, for four years, commencing on the 4th of March next, and received from him, in answer to the communication made by us, that he felt grateful for this manifestation of the continued public confidence and favor, and would endeavor to merit a continuance of the approbation of his fellow citizens, by constant efforts, so to discharge his duties, as to promote the welfare of our common country."

The chair laid before the senate a report from the secretary of war, communicating a statement of arms manufactured at the national armories, and expenditures there, which was ordered to be printed.

The resolutions offered sometime since by Mr. Calhoun were taken up; and Mr. Calhoun, at considerable length, took an opportunity to reply to Mr. Webster on certain points made in the debate on the bill further to enforce the collection of duties on imports, and Mr. Webster rejoined. Messrs. Sprague and Forsyth also made a few remarks. After which Mr. Calhoun consented that his resolutions should be laid on the table, without an intention to call them up again.

The bill from the house to modify the act of the 14th of July, and other acts imposing duties on imports, was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.*

The bill of the senate on the same subject was then laid on the table. The senate then adjourned.

[Mr. Calhoun's constitutional argument this day, and Mr. Webster's reply were very interesting, and shall be preserved. In the course of his remarks, Mr. C. seemed to imply that Mr. W. wished to win favor in a certain quarter—(with the administration), which Mr. C. explained and said he had not imputed such motives—Mr. Webster saying he had no new born zeal, nor had he, in any way, altered his views concerning the administration, &c. Mr. Calhoun alluded to a "particular population in the south." Mr. Webster said that no northern gentleman desired to produce evil out of it—and so Mr. C. said that he believed—but the "inevitable current of things" was to disturb this population.]

February 27. The bill to modify the act of the 14th July, and other acts imposing duties on imports, was read a second time.

The bill being then considered as in committee of the whole, Mr. Clay then moved that the bill be reported to the senate.

Mr. Grundy inquired, if the senator from Kentucky had examined the bill to ascertain if it was the same as the bill which had been before the senate.

Mr. Clay replied in the affirmative; and said, that he believed it corresponded word for word with the other bill.

Mr. Dickerson moved to amend the bill by adding a provision, that the rule by which the graduation of duties shall be made, shall be the annual report of the state of commerce and navigation, for the last year.

Mr. Clay opposed the amendment, because he thought that it was founded on a total misapprehension of the bill. There would be now no difficulty in executing the law, if the secretary of the treasury should take it up in the spirit in which it will be passed. At the next session there will be a month before the bill will go into operation, while there are but three days left of this session, and any amendment made now must hazard the measure. He would take the example of the framers of the constitution and follow it. They said, make the constitution, and let it be amended afterwards, and not now hazard the measure.

Mr. Webster said, that although he thought that some amendments were indispensably necessary, yet if the bill were to pass, it ought to pass at once, and he hoped his friend, from New Jersey, would withdraw his amendment, and leave the matter to stand over until next session.

Mr. Smith, referring to the state of another bill, said that he would now give notice that he should to-morrow move to lay this bill on the table, until the ensuing bill shall have passed.

Mr. Clayton said, that although he was in favor of the principle of the amendment, he should vote against it, because he thought that it would, at this period of the session, hazard the passage of the measure.

Mr. Robbins expressed a wish to state his objections to the bill, but on the suggestion of

Mr. Clay, who said he would not press the third reading to-day,

Mr. Robbins gave way until the question on the third reading should come up.

The bill was then reported without amendment, and ordered to be read a third time.

Mr. Chambers moved to postpone the preceding orders, for the purpose of taking up the joint resolution extending the subscription made to the compilation of documents, now in progress by Gales & Seaton, to the continuation of the same; which was agreed to.

The resolution was then read a second time, and considered as in committee of the whole.

Mr. Hill asked what was the cost of the documents already printed. Mr. Robbins said he was not prepared to answer.

The resolution was then reported without amendment. The question being on the third reading of the resolution, Mr. Hill asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

After a few words from Mr. Chambers and Mr. Robbins, the question was taken and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Black, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Kane, Knight, Naudain, Poindexter, Robbins, Robinson, Seymour, Silsbee, Tipton, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Webster—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Dallas, Dickerson, Grundy, Hill, King, Moore, White—8.

So the resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. Foot moved to reconsider the vote of yesterday, by which the resolution offered by Mr. Buckner was agreed to. It was his object to refer the resolution to the committee on the library. He said that he was not aware of the extent to which the resolution went, until he saw it in the papers.

The motion was laid on the table.

A great deal of other business was attended to, and variously forwarded for final action—all which will fully appear in the list of acts, &c.

The senate took a recess till 5 o'clock.

In the evening session, a large number of private bills were ordered to a third reading.

February 28. The following resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Chambers, (because of the abandonment of all hope of acting on the subject at the present session) was taken up and agreed to—

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate cause to be published during the recess of congress, six hundred copies of the system of civil and criminal laws, reported by the joint committee appointed for that purpose; and also cause an index to the same to be made, one copy whereof shall be delivered to each member of the next congress, and the residue to such persons as may be designated by the said joint committee.

The senate made extra allowances to the door keepers, messengers, &c. and then, spending some time in executive business, took a recess till evening. We have no account of the proceedings of the evening session.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, Feb. 20. Mr. Washington, by leave, presented a remonstrance and memorial of a committee appointed at a large and highly respectable meeting of the citizens of Washington, in general town meeting assembled, on behalf of all the citizens of said city, against the memorial of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, which was presented to the house on the 18th inst., which remonstrance and memorial was referred to the committee on roads and canals.

Mr. Root offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the clerk of this house procure for the use of the members two thousand copies of the manual on silk, published by J. H. Cobb, of Dedham, in the state of Massachusetts, provided the cost shall not exceed one thousand dollars.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. Arnold demanded the yeas and nays—which being taken stood as follows: yeas 61, nays 74—so the house refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. Root then delivered a very animated speech in its support; in which he commented, with some severity, on Mr. Clay's attempt to defeat the measure before a word could be heard in its favor.

Mr. Clay rose to reply, when

Mr. Hoffman rose and announced to the house the decease of James Lent, jr. a member of the house of representatives from the state of New York. After some appropriate remarks, Mr. H. submitted the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

1. Resolved, That the members of this house, will testify their respect for the memory of James Lent, deceased, late a member of this house from the state of New York, by wearing crape on the left arm for the remainder of the present session of congress.

2. Resolved, That this house will attend the funeral of the late James Lent, to-morrow, at 11 o'clock, A.M. and that a committee be appointed to take order for, and to superintend, the said funeral.

3. Resolved, That a message be sent to the senate to notify that body of the death of James Lent, late a member of this house, and that his funeral will take place to-morrow, at 11 o'clock.

The house then adjourned.

Saturday, Feb. 23. After attending the funeral of the deceased member, Mr. Lent, the house pursuant to adjournment, assembled.

*This is Mr. Clay's bill, adopted by the house of representatives and passed, in lieu of Mr. Verplanck's—for the reason assigned in page 1.

bled at 2 o'clock, but no quorum appearing, a motion for adjournment prevailed, and the house adjourned.

The following were the observations made by Mr. Hoffman, of New York, in announcing to the house the death of his late colleague:

Mr. Speaker: It becomes my melancholy duty to announce to the house the death of my friend and colleague, the hon. James Lent. After a short illness, but exceedingly severe, he died last evening at a late hour.

I do not intend to detain the house by a detail of his private virtues. As a son he was dutiful to his parents; as a husband, most affectionate to his wife; as a parent, kind and indulgent, but prudent to his children; and their tears and afflictions which I have in part witnessed, are the best testimonials of his private worth.

In early life, destined to the mercantile profession, that spirit of enterprise which characterises our people, led him to visit the farther East—India and China. There, he had an opportunity of observing the manners, morals, religion, and political institutions of those remote and distant nations, and of comparing them with the manners, morals, religion, and political institutions of his native country. That comparison led him to a strong conclusion in favor of our religion and political institutions over those of the most civilised nations of the east—a preference decided and manifest in his whole after life.

As a citizen, he was liberal without ostentation. With a mild and amiable heart, practising the kindest condescension of manner, he was in all things inflexible in his devotion to duty. Instructed by experience, he was always useful and always honest. If he did not, from the modest diffidence of his temper, mingle publicly in our discussions here, with a correct knowledge of trade and business, he frequently aided by his own the judgment of others.

I have known him well. In an intimate acquaintance of several years while we have been members of this house, in every thing public and private, I have found him eminently distinguished for purity of heart, uprightness of intention, and justness of design. If others here have won my esteem, and many have; none has deserved or acquired a stronger hold on my best affections. As the deceased intimated no wish as to the disposition of his remains, I move you these three resolutions expressive of that respect I feel for him, and in which the house will concur.

Monday, Feb. 25. After the morning business, which resulted only in laying certain bills on the table—

Mr. Wickliffe moved that the house proceed to the special order of the day, (which is the tariff bill).

Mr. Bell hoped the house would not do so until it had first disposed of the bill from the senate.

Mr. Bouldin moved a call of the house.

Mr. Wickliffe said that if the house proceeded to the order of the day, he hoped they would dispose of the amendments to the bill before it, when he should offer another bill to reduce the tariff, such as he hoped would unite the votes of a majority of the house.

Mr. Bouldin withdrew his motion for a call.

Mr. Wickliffe then said, that as Mr. Bell opposed the execution of the special order, he would ask the yeas and nays upon his motion to execute it. They were ordered by the house, and being taken, stood as follows: yeas 80, nays 106.

So the house refused to proceed to the orders of the day.

Mr. Vance moved to go into committee of the whole on the state of the union and take up the bill from the senate on the subject of disposing of the proceeds of the public lands for a limited time.

The chair decided that such a motion could not be made until the house had reached the orders of the day.

Mr. Vance took an appeal.

The speaker explained his decision, and Mr. Vance the grounds of his appeal.

Mr. Wickliffe then suggested that the vote taken by yeas and nays, refusing to execute the special order of the day, was insufficient to prevent the taking up of that order, inasmuch as the rule to go into the special order every day at one o'clock, had been passed by two-thirds, it would require two-thirds to prevent it.

The speaker said it was too late to make this question now, as other business was before the house.

Mr. Daniel said he should insist on the same ground, and would take an appeal.

The chair said there was already an appeal before the house. Mr. Vance, in order to have the question tried, withdrew his appeal.

Mr. Daniel then appealed, and insisted that the special order should be executed.

The question of order was argued by Messrs. Wickliffe, Carson, Taylor, Thompson, of Geo. Daniel, Sutherland and Dearborn; after which

Mr. Daniel withdrew his appeal.

Mr. Williams now moved to postpone all the orders of the day which precede the bill from the senate on disposing of the proceeds of the public lands.

Mr. Carson inquired whether the tariff bill was included in the orders?

The chair replied in the negative.

Mr. Carson appealed from this decision.

The speaker said no appeal could lie, as the motion was to postpone all the orders, whatever they might be.

Mr. Williams inquired whether two-thirds were necessary to postpone all the orders?

The chair replied in the affirmative.

Mr. Williams then moved the postponement of each particular bill as they were announced in succession.

On postponing a bill in relation to the territory of Michigan, Mr. Plummer delivered a long and earnest remonstrance—but the bill was postponed.

On postponing the Virginia military land warrant bill Mr. Lewis demanded the yeas and nays, but the house refused to order them.

The house at length arrived at the senate's bill further to enforce the collection of the revenue.

The bill was read a first time.

Mr. Whitlesey moved that it now have its second reading.

Mr. Lewis moved to postpone the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. Williams moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. Boon asked the yeas and nays on the motion. They were ordered and taken—and stood as follows: yeas 58, nays 125.

The bill then had its second reading.

Mr. Carson moved to refer the bill to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

After some discussion on this motion—

Mr. Bell moved to postpone the bill to to-morrow.

The debate continuing with great animation—

Mr. Wickliffe moved a postponement till Thursday.

The debate continued with increasing earnestness until 5 o'clock, when the question was decided by yeas and nays as follows—yeas 77, nays 108.

Mr. Bates, of Maine, moved to postpone till Wednesday; which, after a short discussion, was also negatively by yeas and nays—yeas 84, nays 99.

Mr. Wickliffe immediately moved that the house proceed to execute the special order, by taking up the tariff bill.

The motion prevailed, and on motion of Mr. Letcher, the house went into committee of the whole, under instructions to strike out the body of Mr. Verplanck's bill, and insert that of Mr. Clay, from the senate. This was done. The bill was reported to the house, and after a brief debate it was ordered to its third reading—yeas 105, nays 71. The house adjourned at half past 8 o'clock.

Tuesday, Feb. 26. Mr. Hogan moved to refer the report of the naval committee, in regard to alleged abuses in the navy, together with the accompanying papers, to the secretary of the navy.

Mr. Watmough made a spirited opposition to the motion, and in vindication of the officers of the navy, concluded by moving to lay the subject upon the table.

Which motion was agreed to.

The other morning business will sufficiently appear in its progress. The house proceeded to the orders of the day.

The tariff bill, as amended, by inserting the whole bill of Mr. Clay, in the shape in which it has been ordered to a third reading in the senate, was read a third time, and the question being on its passage—

Mr. Huntington, after a few remarks on the great importance of this question, moved a call of the house.

The house was called accordingly.

It appeared that 201 members were present.

Mr. Burges moved to suspend further proceedings on the call, but the motion failed—aye 69, noes 78.

The doors were then closed, and the excuses of absentees received. Proceedings were then suspended, and the doors of the hall again opened.

Mr. Burges remonstrated very warmly against the passage of the bill; and in the course of his remarks adverted with some severity to the agency of Mr. Clay, in originating the measure.

Mr. Jenifer replied with warmth to this part of the speech, and vindicated the purity of Mr. Clay's motives and purposes.

Mr. Foster said his constitutional objections to the bill had been removed by a closer examination of its provisions. Still he did not like the bill, but was willing to take it as an experiment.

Mr. Denny delivered, at considerable length, the reasons that would induce him to vote against the bill.

Mr. Daniel replied to the remarks of Mr. Burges in respect to Mr. Clay, and vindicated the general objects of the bill. He demanded the previous question; but withdrew his motion at request of Mr. Burges, who briefly, but very severely rejoined.

Mr. Sutherland then made a highly animated speech in opposition to the bill.

Mr. Carson demanded the previous question; but the motion failed, only 65 rising to second it.

Mr. Bates, of Maine, then gave the reasons why he should vote for the bill; and

Mr. Pendleton stated the grounds upon which he should vote against it.

Mr. McDuffie, though not believing the bill proposed to make to the south all the concession to which they were justly entitled, yet he believed, such as it was, it would give peace to the country, and therefore would vote for it.

Mr. Speight moved the previous question, but immediately withdrew the motion.

Mr. Huntington asked for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, which were ordered.

Mr. Bates, of Mass. made his protest against the bill, as a total surrender of the principle of protection.

Mr. Williams now moved for the previous question.

The motion was seconded—yeas 93, noes 65.

Mr. Dickson called for the yeas and nays on the previous question, and they were ordered by the house.

The previous question was then put as follows:

Shall the main question be now put?

The yeas and nays being taken, stood—yeas 108, nays 85.

The main question, viz: shall this bill pass? was then put, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adair, Alexander, Chilton, Allan, R. Allen, Anderson, Angel, Archer, Armstrong, Arnold, J. S. Barbour, Barnwell, Barringer, James Bates, Bell, Bergen, Bethune, James Blair, John Blair, Boon, Bouck, Bouldin, Branch, John Brodhead, Bullard, Cambreleng, Carr, Carson, Chinn, Claiborne, Clay, Clayton, Coke, Connor, Corwin, Conlier, Craig, Creighton, Daniel, Davenport, W. R. Davis, Doubleday, Drayton, Draper, Duncan, Felder, Findlay, Fitzgerald, Foster, Gaither, Gilmore, Gordon, Griffin, Thomas Hall, William Hall, Harper, Hawes, Hawkins, Hoffman, Holland, Horn, Howard, Hubbard, Irvin, Isaacs, Jarvis, Jenifer, Richard M. Johnson, Cave Johnson, J. Johnson, Kavanagh, Kerr, Lamar, Lausing, Lecompte, Letcher, Lewis, Lyon, Mardis, Mason, Marshall, Maxwell, Wm. McCoy, McDuffie, McIntire, McKay, Mitchell, Newnan, Newton, Nuckolls, Patton, Plummer, Polk, Rencher, Roane, Root, Semmes, Sewell, Wm. B. Shepard, Aug. H. Shepperd, Smith, Speight, Spence, Stanberry, Standifer, F. Thomas, P. Thomas, Wiley Thompson, John Thomson, Tompkins, Verplanck, Ward, Washington, Wayne, Weeks, Elisha Whittlesey, Camp, P. White, Edward D. White, Wickliffe, Williams, Worthington—118.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, H. Allen, Allison, Appleton, Ashley, Babcock, Banks, N. Barber, Barstow, I. C. Bates, Beardsley, Briggs, John C. Brodhead, Bucher, Burd, Burges, Cahoon, Chandler, Choate, Collier, L. Condict, S. Condict, E. Cooke, Bates Cooke, Cooper, Crane, Crawford, J. Davis, Dyan, Dearborn, Denny, Dewart, Dickson, Ellsworth, Geo. Evans, Joshua Evans, Edward Everett, Horace Everett, Ford, Greunell, Hiland Hall, Heister, Hodges, Hogan, Hughes, Huntington, Ihrie, Ingersoll, Kendall, Kennon, Adam King, John King, Henry King, Leavitt, Mann, McCarty, Robt. McKim, McKean, Mercer, Milligan, Mullenburg, Nelson, Pearce, Pendleton, Pierson Pitcher, Potts, Randolph, J. Reed, Edward C. Reed, Russell, Slade, Southard, Stephens, Storrs, Sutherland, Taylor, Vinton, Wardwell, Watmough, Wilkin, Wheeler, Fred'k Whittlesey, Young—84.

So the bill was passed, and sent to the senate for concurrence. Mr. Williams now moved to postpone all the orders of the day, both general and special, which precede the senate's bill for the disposition of the proceeds of the public lands. He, however, consented to withdraw this general motion, and allow the orders to be called separately.

They were so called; and when the house had reached the bill for allowing the heirs of Winter to sue the United States to try their title,

Mr. Plummer made an effort to induce the house to discuss that bill; but the house refused; and, on motion of Mr. Irvin, it was laid upon the table.

The house having at length arrived at the bill further to provide for the collection of duties on imports—

Mr. Williams moved to postpone this bill until to-morrow.

Mr. Irvin demanded the yeas and nays on the motion. They were taken, and stood as follows: yeas 81, nays 105.

So the house refused to postpone the bill.

Mr. Daniel now moved to lay the bill on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays on that motion. They were ordered by the house. He, however, consented to withdraw the motion at the request of Mr. Arnold, who promised to renew the same motion.

Mr. Arnold then said he should change his course in relation to this bill, in consequence of the house having passed the bill reducing the tariff. Mr. A. was going into some remarks on the mockery of passing such a bill now, when he was called to order by the chair. After trying several motions, with the view of having it in order to proceed in his remarks, Mr. A. relinquished his design, and, according to promise, moved to lay the bill on the table.

The yeas and nays were demanded on this motion, and being taken, they stood as follows: yeas 58, nays 132.

So the house refused to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. Mardis moved that the house now take a recess until 6 o'clock, and demanded the yeas and nays, but withdrew his motion; when

Mr. Dearborn moved the previous question on the bill.

The chair was ascertaining whether the motion was seconded, when

Mr. McDuffie rose and asked leave to address an appeal to the house.

The speaker was proceeding in the count, when

Mr. McDuffie insisted on being heard.

Great confusion arose: but amidst cries of "order" and "count," Mr. McDuffie's voice was heard, saying that all he asked was fair discussion. If gentlemen were disposed to hear the opponents of the bill, he was ready to meet them, but if not, and if he could get forty men to stand by him, he would continue to move adjournments and call for yeas and nays until the end of the session.

Mr. Carson exclaimed "I will support you, sir"—several other voices cried out in a similar manner.

The speaker called to order.

Mr. Bell rose and began to speak, but his words were inaudible from the noise.

Mr. McDuffie moved repeatedly to adjourn.

The speaker called him to order, and admonished him that a member was on the floor.

As soon as the reporter could hear any thing distinctly,

Mr. Bell was saying, that he had no wish to cut off discussion, if that was what the opponents of the bill desired; and if they were ready to discuss its merits, and not to put it by, he should not sustain the motion for the previous question.

Mr. McDuffie moved that the house adjourn.

The chair decided the motion to be out of order, the house having previously resolved, that it would at a certain hour take a recess, and meet at 6 o'clock.

Mr. Wayne believed the bill to be right in itself—but yet, circumstances might be such as to induce those who thought so to vote against it.

Mr. W. said he should vote for the bill; but, if his friends, by cutting off debate, should refuse to him and others, the opportunity of expressing their sentiments, and vindicating their own course before the people, he should not vote against it; and there were twenty more that would do the same.

Mr. Bell made some remark not heard by the reporter, which led to an explanation between him and Mr. Wayne—who concluded by moving a recess until 6 o'clock.

A desultory debate on the question of order now arose, on an appeal taken by Mr. Carson, on the speaker's decision, that a motion to adjourn was out of order, which ended in Mr. Carson's withdrawing his appeal.

Mr. Dearborn explained his reasons for having moved the previous question—which was not to prevent fair discussion, but to prevent a circumventive course, calculated to get rid of or defeat the bill.

Mr. Daniel and Mr. Dearborn had some further, rather colloquial, discussion; when the hour of four having arrived, the house took a recess till 6 o'clock.

Evening session.

The house met at 6 o'clock, and proceeded in committee of the whole, Mr. Taylor in the chair, to the consideration of District business, on which it was still engaged at 8 o'clock, at which time the following bills had been considered and laid by, to be reported to the house, viz:

A bill to incorporate the Georgetown orphan asylum and free school.

A bill to improve the navigation of the Potomac river, between Georgetown and Alexandria.

A bill in addition to an act vesting in the corporation of Washington all the rights of the Washington canal company. [To take back the Mall lots, and allow in lieu thereof, to the city, $150,000.]

A bill concerning a penitentiary for the District.

A bill granting certain lots to the president and directors of Georgetown college.

A bill in relation to the Potomac bridge.

Wednesday, Feb. 27. After some private or local business had been disposed of Mr. Adams moved to discharge the committee on manufactures from the consideration of so much of the president's message as relates to the protection of domestic manufactures, and from all other matters referred to them; and asked leave to present a report from the minority of the committee on the matters in the message.

At the suggestion of Mr. Hoffman, the motion was divided, and the question first taken on discharging the committee, and agreed to.

Mr. Hoffman then said that if leave should be given to present the report of the minority, he would ask for its reading, at least in part.

The report was then presented, and the reading of it commenced, and continued until 12 o'clock, when the house proceeded to the orders of the day.

Certain bills relating to the affairs of the District of Columbia were read a third time and passed.

The senate's bill further to provide for the collection of the revenue (the enforcing bill), coming up in order,

Mr. Verplanck moved to postpone its consideration until to-morrow, with a view to take up the appropriation bills.

Mr. Wickliffe gave notice of his purpose to make a question of order whether this bill could be discussed in the house before it was discussed in committee of the whole.

On the question of postponement a very animated and somewhat desultory debate arose, in which it was very difficult to avoid running into the merits of the bill.

The gentlemen who participated in the debate were Messrs. Cambreleng, Bell, Sutherland, Howard, Wickliffe, Dearborn, Verplanck, Wayne, Daniel, Hoffman, McDuffie, Blair, of South Carolina, Beardsley, Clayton, Burges and Hawes.

When the question was at length taken, and decided by yeas and nays as follows: yeas 70, nays 127.

So the house refused to postpone.

Mr. Carson now rose to address the house, and had proceeded some time, when

Mr. Wickliffe rose to make the question of order, to which he had before alluded, whereupon a very confused scene ensued—the particulars of which, together with the other details of the debate, we must for the present defer. The result was that the decision of the chair was sustained by the house, and Mr. Cass was permitted to proceed: he thereupon resumed, and continued to occupy the house in opposition to the bill until near 4 o'clock, when, on motion of Mr. Clayton, the house took a recess till 6 o'clock.

Among the proceedings of this day, we have the following: On the bill further to provide for the collection of duties on imports—

Mr. McDuffie said—A bill which might be regarded as the olive branch had been passed and sent to the senate—he would put it to the justice and magnanimity of the house whether the olive branch should be followed by the sword of blood. There was no necessity for this bill. The other bill would be found to carry healing efficacy with it. If any thing could convert it into a curse it would be the present bill.

Mr. Blair, of South Carolina, said his colleague had expressed an opinion that the tariff bill which had been sent to the senate was the olive branch of peace—that might be his opinion as an individual. It was not in the power of that or any other gentleman here to express the sentiments of the convention of S. Carolina which had solemnly declared, that unless the whole protective system be overthrown, the revenue laws should not be executed. The house had no right to presume that the convention would recall this declaration in consequence of the passage of a bill which contained protection throughout all its provisions.

For himself, he was indifferent on the subject; but it should be remembered, that unless some effectual measures were adopted, a large part of the population of South Carolina were exposed to confiscation and punishment for paying obedience to your laws.

Mr. Burges said it would not be suspected of him that he was a friend to the present administration. He was a friend to the laws of the land, and to ensure their execution, it was altogether essential that this bill should pass. Is it necessary, before we provide for obedience to the laws, that we should be informed whether South Carolina intends further to resist them? He was willing to admit that gentlemen, intimately connected with the recent course taken by that state—with what degree of credit to themselves history will inform the world—had expressed opinions that the bill sent to the senate would be satisfactory to the people of that state. Where then is the harm of passing this bill? If they intend to obey the laws, no provision in this bill could touch them. The objection on the part of that state could only arise from a determination to resist the execution of the laws which had been nullified, which formed the basis of the bill sent to the senate. Without this bill that measure was only throwing a volume of paper upon the burning flues.

Evening session. The house, at 6 o'clock, resumed its sitting—when Mr. Clayton, of Georgia, who had the floor, delivered a very animated speech in opposition to the revenue collection bill.

Mr. Isacks replied ably, and insisted on the necessity of passing the bill to vindicate the authority and honor of the government.

Mr. Blair, of South Carolina, followed on the same side, and made some pretty severe animadversions on nullification and secession, &c.

Mr. Root delivered an animated speech against the bill.

Mr. McDuffie expressed his desire of being heard before the bill should pass, and moved that the house adjourn. The house then adjourned [at about 10 o'clock].

Thursday, Feb. 23. After various resolutions, &c.

The speaker laid before the house sundry communications, viz. 1. A letter from the secretary of war, transmitting a statement of the expenditures incurred, and of arms manufactured at the national armories in the year 1832; which letter and statement were laid on the table.

2. A letter from the secretary of state, transmitting an abstract of all the returns made to the department of state, by collectors of the different ports, for the year 1832. And, also, an abstract of all the passengers which arrived in the United States, during the year ending September 30, 1832; which letter and abstracts were laid on the table.

3. A letter from the first comptroller of the treasury, transmitting a list received from the register of the treasury, of the balances standing on the books of the revenue, which have remained unsettled by collectors of the customs, and others, or appear to have been due more than three years prior to the 30th of September last; which letter and list were laid on the table.

4. A letter from the postmaster general, transmitting a list of the names of the persons employed as clerks in his department during the year 1832, with the salary of each; which letter and list were laid on the table.

Mr. Adams moved that the further reading of the report made by him from the minority of the committee on manufactures be dispensed with, and that it be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. Hoffman demanded a division of the question. It was divided accordingly.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

On the question of printing, Mr. Hoffman addressed the house in opposition to it; and went into a statement of facts in relation to the report. He said it had never been submitted to the committee in time for its action. It purported to be a counter report, or report of the minority; but where was any report from the majority? It was new to ask a majority to agree to the report of a minority, which they had never had an opportunity even to hear. Mr. H. dwelt on the mischievous tendency of such a practice, if sanctioned by the house. He insisted there was nothing either in the substance or manner of the paper, which ought to induce the house to print it. It was neither a report or counter report, but a speech—an argument of an individual. Mr. H. was proceeding to enter on the subject-matter of the paper, when Mr. Bell called for the orders of the day.

The house then resumed the consideration of the bill further to provide for the collection of the revenue.

Mr. McDuffie rose and addressed the house with much animation, in opposition to the bill.

Mr. Wayne, of Georgia, next obtained the floor; but, before he began, a motion was made for a recess till five o'clock, and carried.

The evening session. An account of the proceedings has not been received—but the debate was going on at a late hour, with an avowed determination to press the question before the adjournment.

The National Intelligencer says—In our report of the debate in the house of representatives upon the bill to make a loan to the city of Washington, we are now apprised that a material part of the amendment submitted by Mr. Howard was omitted. The persons proposed to be appointed by the president were, in addition to other duties, "to pronounce what ought to be performed by either or both, (the canal and rail road companies), on principles of law, justice, equity and a true regard to the public good."

MR. CLAY'S BILL—YEAS AND NAYS.

We were about preparing a view of the vote on this bill, in the house of representatives, by states—when the following, from the Baltimore "American" of Thursday last presented itself.

The vote on the passage of the new tariff bill, in the house of representatives, is of so much general interest that we have thought that a table of the votes arranged according to the states represented would not be unacceptable to our readers. We have taken the report of the Intelligencer of yesterday morning, in which there appears however to be an error of addition. We make the number, as in the table below, 120 yeas, to 84 noes,—instead of 118 to 85 noes.

MAINE. Yeas—Anderson, James Bates, McIntire, Holland, Kavanagh, Jarvis. Nays—Evans.

NEW HAMPSHIRE. Yeas—Brodhed, Harper, Hubbard, Weeks. Nays—Chandler. Absent—Hammons.

MR. CLAY'S TARIFF BILL.

Having freely expressed our own opinion of this bill, we present another view of it from the New York Advocate.

The following letter is from an intimate, highly respected and intelligent friend, whom we know to be what he professes, no party man, and an undoubted friend to the protective policy. His reasonings are therefore entitled to great respect and consideration; and we give them to our readers with the more pleasure, because they present the subject in a point of view which may not strike many who are ignorant of the motives with which Mr. Clay has been actuated.

Washington, 14th Feb. 1833.

DEAR SIR: You have, before this reaches you, read Mr. Clay's bill, Mr. Webster's resolutions, and learned from your private correspondent, and the papers, the effect that has been produced. Standing in the relation which Mr. Clay does before the union, to the protective system, the introduction of this bill is perhaps one of the most important measures, whether viewed in relation to its operation on himself individually, or in its probable effect on the industry of the country, that he has ever offered for the consideration of congress. By his enemies he will be charged, and many of his former supporters will, doubtless, respond to the accusation, that he has sacrificed his principles on the altar of his ambition, and bargained away, for southern votes and southern support, the great interest which were to his care especially committed. You know that I am no party man; that measures, not men, is my motto, and that I am an unyielding advocate both from interest and principle, of the American system. In saying, then, that such criminations are groundless, I trust that you will believe me, at least so far as to give me credit for sincerity. To form a correct opinion on this subject, it is necessary to be fully acquainted with the aspect of affairs here previous to Mr. Clay's motion, and to have since heard Cambreleng, in the house, declare that he never would vote for a bill which he a few days before openly avowed his anxiety to see passed; and Benton, in the senate, state, in debate, that woollens never ought to receive less protection than 30 per cent. Mr. Forsyth, in his remarks in opposition to leave being granted to offer the bill, fully expressed the views and feelings entertained by our enemies previous to that time. They considered us as defeated and in their power, and were only hesitating as to the form and degree of punishment they should inflict. The administration expressing, as they stated, the public will, which had been distinctly manifested by the election of general Jackson to the presidency, in the bill reported by the committee of ways and means, and to which they lent their whole support, left no alternative for Mr. Clay but either form an arrangement with the enemies of Van Buren, at the south, by which time could be gained, trusting that at the expiration of eight or nine years, the protective policy would become universally popular, or silently witness the entire destruction of a system, of which it is his highest ambition to be considered the founder. To be sure, there was a chance of its being again renewed and sustained by a reaction of public sentiment which must have unquestionably followed the distress that would have ensued from its destruction, but the remedy was too powerful to be resorted to, if a palliation could be found. The south, finding themselves in an unpleasant dilemma, were willing to unite on any measure which would furnish them the opportunity of an apparently honorable escape. All they claimed was liberty to say to their constituents, that their principles had triumphed; they were willing to defer for ten years the exhibition of their effects. Time, and the prospect of protection for at least eight years, was the consideration on one side; on the other the satisfaction of proclaiming a triumph, without any practical benefit from the victory claimed. It will be said by many, I am aware, that Mr. Clay has by this bill relinquished forever the principle of discriminating duties. But I would ask, can an arrangement, which obviously contains in its very provisions the principles of its own destruction, be considered as permanent by its framers? If not, the fact on which this charge must rest, to wit, that at the end of ten years all duties are fixed at twenty per cent.—sufficient, when taken in connection with another, that cotton is then to be free—to satisfy any mind that a new law will then be unanimously called for from every section of the union. The south has now a specific duty of three cents a pound on her cotton; will she be able ten years hence to sustain herself against the competition of Texas and Brazil? Is it not more than probable, is it not certain, that she will require even a higher protection than she now enjoys? All the slave states are so fully sensible of the benefits they derive from cultivation of sugar in Louisiana, in the market it affords for their surplus negroes, and the employment of capital that would otherwise be directed to the growing of cotton, that, were it not for appearances, they would offer, even now, no objection to the present duty on sugar. No one presumes to suppose that twenty per cent. will ever be even the shadow of protection for sugar. May we not reasonably conclude that the southern politicians are aware that they shall need protection at that time, and expect to claim it—and may we not also infer that it is with a view to obtain assistance from other interests in effecting this, that they insist on placing all on the same level of twenty per cent. If the tariff of 1832 was taken as the basis, and the various duties were reduced in ten years to the revenue standard, retaining the same proportional difference to each other which they do at present, would they not have reason to apprehend that some important interests might find themselves sufficiently protected, and be unwilling to unite in an effort to obtain an increase of duties. I must say that the subject has struck me in this light, and the conclusion has forced itself upon me, that the bill was not intended by Mr. Clay, nor by the southern gentlemen who are understood to be its friends, to present a plan for the permanent adjustment of the tariff. That its only object is to allay the excitement which unfortunately exists at the present time, remove the subject from the operation and influence of party politics, and afford an opportunity to adjust, and fix on a permanent basis the industry of the country, which even the southern politicians admit it is necessary to sustain. Yours, &c.

THE CAPE DE VERDS.

We have been favored with the following letter from a clergyman who went passenger in one of the vessels sent from this port, by the liberality of our citizens, with provisions for the relief of the Cape de Verd sufferers. The description it gives of the distress and mortality which the famine in those islands had occasioned, and the frantic joy with which the starving inhabitants hailed the arrival of these unexpected succors, will be read with thrilling interest. Surely no man of common sensibility, after perusing this object, can regret the humble offerings which he made for an object so worthy of his charity—worthy, at least, on account of the urgent nature of the call, if not for any particular merit in the recipients of his bounty. [Journal of Commerce.]

Port of Mayo, (Cape de Verds), January 5, 1833.

We arrived at this port on the last day of December, having left the principal part of the provisions for the islanders, at Bonavista. We are now loaded with salt for South America, and expect to sail within two or three days. At this island, and at Bonavista, there has been less suffering from the protracted famine, than at the other islands. From information received from individuals who have visited, and profess to be well acquainted with the condition of the islands, the suffering, wretchedness and desolation, has been beyond the conception of those who live in the midst of plenty and prosperity. I am not able to state the whole population of the islands, from the absence of statistical documents;—but the estimate of the number of deaths, from actual starvation, in all the islands, within about a year, is placed by those best acquainted with the circumstances, at between 30,000 and 40,000.* The items which go to make up this amount in the bill of mortality, are as follows: In St. Antonio, among a population of 26,000, 11,000 have died from starvation alone; i. e. Fogo, 12,000 deaths from the same cause; in Bravo, 7,000; in St. Nicholas, 3,000, and in St. Jago the number is considerable, although not stated definitively. Captain Hays, of the brig Emma, of Philadelphia, with a full cargo of provisions for the suffering islanders, assured me that the scene of wretchedness and desolation at St. Antonio, where he touched long enough to discharge 500 barrels of provisions, was beyond the power of tongue or pen to describe. The miserable inhabitants looked more like moving skeletons, than living beings—their flesh was gone, their muscles seemed dried up, and they presented the appearance of only the naked frames of men, which could scarcely be kept together. The inhabitants had despaired of obtaining relief from any of the ordinary resources; and as no vessel had touched at the island for several months, on account of the difficulty and danger resulting from the fact that there is no safe harbor for vessels, a pilot was despatched

*Add speaker, who did not vote of course.

*The population of the Cape de Verds is stated in the Gazetteer to be about 100,000. It seems almost incredible that the mortality should have been as great as here stated; though we must say that the writer is a gentleman of intelligence, and not more likely than others to adopt exaggerated reports.

in a boat with some half a dozen skeleton beings, to hail the first vessel that could be seen, and beg of it to stop and sell them something to keep them alive for a few days longer; when the Emma hove in sight, and was hailed, and, as soon as possible, the mournful tale of wretchedness was told, and the entreaty pressed to stop and sell them something to eat. Captain H. replied that he had nothing to sell—but that his vessel was loaded with provisions to give away; and that he had come for the express purpose of affording relief to any of the islanders who needed the gratuity. They seemed incredulous at first, but when satisfied of the fact, they raised their hands in astonishment toward heaven, intimating that he must have been despatched from thence, on such an errand of mercy. After landing, capt. H. soon found from what he there saw and heard, that the account of their deplorable, suffering condition had not been over-stated. He discharged 500 worth of provisions, and left them, after receiving every demonstration of gratitude from the sufferers which they were able to give. They even followed him to the water's edge, and there, in attempting to give three cheers with all the little energy which they possessed, they made a noise which seemed more like a sepulchral groan, than the voice of the living.

Captain H. was assured that almost every morning the dying and the dead could be seen in almost every direction from the door of his informant, and that but a short time before, a boy was seen cutting a piece of flesh from the carcase of a fellow creature, to lengthen out his own miserable existence, but was found soon after, dead, with the piece of flesh in his hand, having crawled only a few paces from the place where he obtained it. This was represented as only a specimen of what may often be witnessed, in its substantial features. Bonavista and Mayo have suffered less than the other islands, which has prevented us from being eye-witnesses of such heart-sickening scenes of wretchedness, as have been witnessed by others. Captain H. assured me that he felt amply compensated for all the expense which he had incurred, in coming out gratuitously to be almoner of the charity of Americans to those distant and desolate islands, in the consciousness of the real benefit which had been conferred. Our own country has not only been first, but alone, in this work of substantial sympathy and charity. Not a farthing has been sent by the people of any other nation—as charity, which speaks volumes in favor of our citizens. Even the Portuguese nation has left these poor creatures to starve by thousands, when the king derives not a little of his wealth from their toils and sufferings. The islanders supposed at first that the supplies received from our country had come from the government of the United States—and when assured that the government had nothing to do with it—that it was from the public and private contributions of men, women and children, as the spontaneous expression of their own feelings of kindness and sympathy, as soon as their suffering condition was made known—they seemed utterly at a loss to comprehend how it could be! I have often heard them say—"Americans kinder than our own country—we have two kings, but they no send provisions to keep us from starving—they fight one another to see who shall govern—they care nothing about us." &c. The rains have begun to fall in the islands—and vegetation is coming forward rapidly, and the hope is cherished that something, in a few months, may be obtained from the fruits of the earth, to supply the wants of the people.

P. S. You judged right in supposing that little of interest would be found here, relating to the vegetable kingdom. It is the most desolate, barren portion of the earth which I ever beheld. There was scarcely any appearance of vegetation on some of the islands by which we passed, although on some of them in the interior, it is said that there are trees, &c. There is scarcely a tree on Bonavista, except those that have been planted—or even on this island. On some of the islands there are fruits of several different kinds, and the land is under some degree of cultivation, but we have not been able to visit them. I have obtained the seeds of two kinds of trees from St. Antonio—one the purga, from which all the oil used on the island is made, and is an emetic as well as cathartic—the other called at the Island pinia; and chery moilla, which produces a fruit somewhat resembling the pine-apple, but entirely different. I hope to meet with better success in South America.

A letter from licut. McIntosh, commanding the U. States schooner Porpoise, to the secretary of the navy, dated Port Praya, island of St. Jago, January 3, 1835, says—"The very many reports which have reached the United States as regard the sufferings of the inhabitants of these islands have not been at all exaggerated; although at present there are no deaths on this island, in consequence of the relief which has been extended to them by the citizens of the United States, yet the many walking skeletons and objects of misery which continually present themselves to your view while on shore, but too plainly assure you what recently has been the dreadful situation of the island of St. Antonio, from a population of twenty-four, only eleven thousand are remaining, on the small island of Fogo four thousand now remain from a population of fourteen, and several of the other islands have suffered equally, and what is still more painful, their sad sufferings are by no means at an end. Another year they must exist, if they exist at all, from the charity of others; for these three years previous to the present, scarcely a drop of rain fell from the heavens; although they have had abundance during the present year, it has been so unseasonable as rather to be an injury than an advantage to cultivation. I have been astonished, however, while witnessing the misery of the inhabitants, to view the hills covered with cattle of various kinds, and have asked in vain for an explanation of the fact, or what law could restrain starving thousands from supplying, partially at all events, their necessities."

EXTRAORDINARY SUICIDES.

Boston, Feb. 19. Yesterday morning, a most remarkable and melancholy event was disclosed in this city. The dead bodies of Mr. John Carter, aged about 33, and Miss Mary Bradlee, aged 20, were found suspended by their necks, in the first chamber of her father's (Mr. Samuel Bradlee's) store on Washington street. Through a loop, attached to a hook in the ceiling, and secured by a black silk neckerchief, a couple of handkerchiefs tied together, had been passed, and these unfortunate persons were found fastened and suspended to each end of these handkerchiefs. Two chairs had been placed together, and Miss Bradlee, being not so tall as Mr. Carter, a box had been placed on one of the chairs so as to elevate her head to the height of his. Having stood in this position facing each other, the chairs were thrown from under them, and they were left suspended. When discovered, their arms hung down by their sides.

Mr. Carter had served his apprenticeship with Mr. Bradlee, and had left him about two years ago, for New Orleans, where he entered into business. Last summer, Mr. B. having lost a son, who was connected with him in business, wrote to Mr. C. to return, and enter his store, as a partner, on favorable terms. Carter had, for several years, been on intimate terms with Miss B. and it was generally supposed that they were engaged to be married to each other. On his return, he was recognized in such relation, and he was permitted to accompany her. Mr. Carter entered into a negotiation to purchase into Mr. Bradlee's business establishment, with a view to immediate marriage, and as Mr. Bradlee wished to retire from business. But in this attempt being unsuccessful, he designed to return to New Orleans. Miss B. wishing to go to New Orleans with him, the consent of her parents was withheld. The parents, however, did not object to their being married at some future period. The lovers were, however, rendered unhappy, and in an evil hour, committed the rash deed above related.

They left Mr. Bradlee's house on Sunday morning, at bell-ringing, proposing to go to Trinity church. They were seen, however, when the bells were nearly done tolling, below Summer street, coming down Washington street, towards Mr. B's store. This was the last that was seen of them together. Mr. Carter, however, went into the apothecary's shop, a few doors below Mr. B's store, on Sunday afternoon. No alarm was felt at the absence of Miss B. because she was in the habit of accompanying Mr. Carter to his father's house, and often remained there over night with his sister. As the walking was very bad, it was supposed she had staid there on Sunday night.

When the lad whose duty it was to open the store, went there yesterday morning, he found that by inserting his own key, he had knocked on the other, which was on the inside. On entering the store, he found Mr. Carter's cloak on the counter, and thought all was not right, but did not go up in the chamber where the bodies were found, until some time after. Mr. Carter left two letters in the store, one directed to his father and the other to Mr. Bradlee, in which he stated that he had been unfortunate, that he was tired of the world and took this mode of leaving it; that he wished his friends would forgive him and her, and that it was his request that both might be buried together in Mr. B's tomb under Trinity church. In Miss Bradlee's trunk at home was also found a letter in her own hand writing, in which she thanked her parents for all their kindness and asked forgiveness of them for this last act of leaving them in this manner. Mr. Bradlee is truly a bereaved man. About a year ago, he lost a promising son, about 11 years old, who was killed instantly by a fragment of the wheel of a coach in which he was riding, and another son, who was his partner in business, died of consumption within a year.

The above is a correct account of this unhappy occurrence, so far as we have heard. Within a few weeks, Carter received 3,500 dollars on some real estate which he owned, and he immediately lost it, as he said, in Boston in some speculation, which he had declined giving any account of to Mr. Bradlee or to any of his friends, although he acknowledged that he had lost it, and was requested to state in what manner.

THE CHEROKEES.

From the National Intelligencer.

The Cherokee Phoenix takes exception, without sufficient reason, to our having copied from a Georgia paper (the only checked) an account of alleged murder of whites by certain Cherokees. We are against all sorts of murder or manslaughter, and must condemn it under whatever color it comes. We are glad to be assured that the Cherokees are in this case innocent of it. The following is the Cherokee account of the affair referred to:

New Echota, Feb. 2.

A white family of four persons resided at Saloquoah, ten miles distant from this place. Lawson Bowman, wife, child and mother-in-law. Bowman was a young man brought up partly in the nation, and lived 3 or 4 miles from any house. The week preceding Christmas, two Indian boys passing his place, found that the house had burned to the ground with the occupants of it. The boys made it known, and many Cherokees proceeded to the place to make some discovery whether this painful loss of lives was occasioned by murder or otherwise. It appearing the house had been burned four or five days previous, and a heavy rain; no circumstance appeared which would justify the conclusion that it was a case of murder. Nothing could be found of the remains of the persons but small pieces of cin- ders. An out-house contained some property undisturbed. In the meantime, Bowman's relations had charged the perpetration of this crime to the Cherokees, and the guard were sent for, to arrest them. The writer of this article advised the Indians to submit. They did so. The Georgia guard rushed to the Indian settlement with the spirit of Sampson, when he went down to Askelon, or like a lawless storm, frightened the poor women and children from their homes in the cold days of Christmas, and chained fast to one another 8 or 10 Cherokees. They were kept in this condition for several days; we saw some driven along the muddy roads to some magistrates for examination, but, in the absence of any testimony whatever against these men, they were all released. This is the only case that has occurred where the loss of lives has been charged to the Cherokees, and so far they have proved unfounded. [Phœnix.]

NAVY OF THE UNITED STATES.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 29, 1833.

Mr. Wilmouth, from the committee on naval affairs, made the following report:—

The committee on naval affairs, to whom was referred the several resolutions presented on the 17th instant, by the hon. Mr. Hogan, of this house, with the view to inquire into and prevent certain abuses alleged therein to exist in the naval service of the United States, report:

That they have duly and maturely considered the same; and having referred the resolutions, with the documents appended thereto, to the navy department, and received from the secretary the annexed letter, dated January 28th, 1833, containing his views on the subject, they beg leave respectfully to submit the same to the house, as follows:

Navy department, January 28th, 1833.

SIR: I have received your letters of the 25th instant, in relation to the resolutions of the house of representatives, passed the 17th instant, on the proper measures to be adopted to prevent certain supposed abuses among the officers of the navy.

My opinion is not asked on the existence of those abuses at this or at any former period, whether practised by the officer designated in the specifications, or by any other officers in the service; but only, whether any "further legislation is necessary to correct the abuses supposed by said resolution to exist in the service."

In reply to this last inquiry, I can only say, that if such abuses have ever occurred, or should occur hereafter, it appears to me no further legislation is necessary to correct them; but that the past and present authority of the department, through courts of inquiry and courts martial, is ample for the correction of them; and, it is presumed, no period has existed when that authority would not have been exercised, on due complaint being made for the purpose, supported by such probable evidence of guilt as would justify calling on the officer implicated for official explanation; and if not given satisfactorily, ordering on him such judicial proceedings as the circumstances appeared to require. The papers enclosed, are herewith returned. I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY.

The hon. John Anderson, chairman of the naval committee of house of representatives.

Your committee avail themselves of the occasion to express their hearty concurrence in these views, expressed by the secretary of the navy, and, entering, as they now do, their protest against any such future proceeding through the medium of this house, against either the naval or military officers of the government, they respectfully ask to be discharged from all further consideration of the subject.

COLLECTION OF REVENUE AT CHARLESTON.

Treasury instructions to the collector of the port of Charleston.

[CONFIDENTIAL.]

Treasury department, November 6, 1832.

SIR: The act of the legislature of South Carolina, passed at their recent special session, and the anticipation of measures which may be apprehended from the convention called by that act for the avowed purpose of opposing and preventing the execution of the laws of the United States, imposing duties on foreign goods, wares and merchandise, make it proper immediately to draw your attention to the subject, and especially to some of the provisions of the existing acts of congress for the collection and security of the revenue.

It is difficult, and indeed impossible, to foresee in detail the precise measures which may be adopted by the convention; and the instructions now given must be more or less hypothetical, and the particular acts you may be called, in the discharge of your duty, to perform, must be, in a great degree, regulated by the character of the emergency, as it may arise. It is sufficiently obvious, however, that all the means which ingenuity can devise will be adopted to elude, or render null and inoperative within the state of South Carolina, the laws of the union imposing duties on foreign merchandise, and that a corresponding energy and vigilance in the performance of their duties, will be required from those charged with the execution.

You will require no observation from me to impress you with the delicacy and importance of the crisis in which you may soon be called to act, or with the indispensable necessity of unshrinking firmness and fidelity in the discharge of your duties. The crisis may involve no less than the safety of our inextinguishable union, and the self-approbation and public gratitude attendant upon all honorable exertions for the preservation of that precious palladium of our happiness, will insure, on your part, all that the government can expect.

It is greatly to be apprehended that the measures of the convention may be such as not to be effectually counteracted without further legislation on the part of congress, which, of course, cannot be had in season for a prompt application of the remedy which their wisdom may devise: but I entertain a confident hope that, with a vigilant, faithful and fearless exercise of the authority conferred by the existing laws, aided by the moral support of the patriotic and unprejudiced portion of the community, much of the meditated evil may be for the present averted, if not altogether prevented.

Without a better knowledge than can now be had of the means of resistance to which the convention may resort, it is supposed that authority sufficient, for the present, is conferred by the constitution, which makes it the duty of the president to execute the laws; by the act vesting in the department of the treasury, the special power to superintend the collection of the revenue, which may fairly be supposed to give all power not contrary to the laws, and necessary to their execution; and by the several provisions of the act entitled "an act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," passed the 2d of March, 1799, to which last act it is my intention, at present, to ask your particular attention.

It will be perceived by the 13th section of that act, that each of the collection districts, established in South Carolina, and the whole and every part of each district, is constituted a port of entry; and though the collector, naval officer and surveyor, are directed to reside at Charleston, and a collector at each of the other ports, it cannot be questioned that a vessel may lawfully discharge her cargo, and, if directed, make entry at any other point within the port of entry; and it appears also certain, that whenever, from physical or moral necessity, the laws shall be suspended at the residence of the collector, and he be prevented by a superior and unlawful force from the exercise of his authority at the usual place, it may be competent to place his officers to receive and compel the legal entry at some other safe and convenient place within the port of entry, as described by law.

You are already aware that, by the provisions of the same act, no goods, wares or merchandise, can be "brought into the U. States" from any foreign port or place, in any ship or vessel, without having on board a proper manifest; that, within twenty-four hours, after the arrival of any ship or vessel from any foreign port or place, at any port in the United States, established by law, at which an officer of the customs resides, or within any harbor, inlet or creek thereof, the master must repair to the custom house, and make report of her arrival; and, within forty-eight hours after such arrival, he must make a further report in writing, accompanied by his manifest; and that, within fifteen days, and by the act of the 3d March, 1821, in case of vessels of more than three hundred tons, within twenty days), after such report by the master, the owner or consignee of the merchandise on board, must make entry thereof, in writing, with the said collector; and that, in default thereof, the collector is authorised to take possession of said goods, wares and merchandise, in the manner particularly described in the 56th section. At the time of making an entry, the tonnage duties, (if any), must be paid; and previously thereto, the register, or other document in lieu thereof, together with the clearance and other papers, must be produced to the collector, and must remain in his office until returned to the master, or the clearance of the vessel for any other port; which clearance cannot be granted, and consequently the delivery of the papers cannot be made until all the formalities in regard to the vessel on her arrival shall have been complied with, and, (by the 93d section), until receipts for all the legal fees which shall have accrued on the vessel, shall have been produced to the collector. By the 29th section, a vessel which shall have arrived from a foreign port, and shall attempt to depart without having been reported, or entered by the master, is liable to be arrested and brought back by the officers of the customs. The entry of the merchandise, by the owner or consignee, already adverted to, consists, besides the other proceedings and formalities particularly required, in paying or securing, according to law, the duties which shall be ascertained by the collector and naval officer. Where the duties are to be secured, it is by bond or bonds, which shall include one or more covenants, to the satisfaction of the collector; who shall be satisfied not merely of the solvency of the surety, but of his sufficiency in other respects, and would not be expected or authorised to accept, as surety, any individual who should be understood to have formed a determination not to pay the bond, or comply with his obligation.

You will perceive, moreover, by the 50th section of the act, no goods, wares or merchandise, brought in any ship or vessel, from any foreign port or place, shall be unladen or delivered, but in open day, except by special license, nor at any time, without a permit from the collector, under severe penalties, including the forfeiture of the goods; and by the 63d section, no permit shall be granted for landing the same, until all duties thereon shall have been paid, or secured to be paid, according to law.

By the 53d section, the collector of any district at which any ship or vessel may arrive, and immediately on her first coming within such district, is directed to put and keep on board such ship or vessel, whilst remaining in the district, or in going from one district to another, one or more inspectors to examine the cargo, and to superintend the delivery thereof, and to perform such other duties according to law, as they shall be directed by the collector to perform for the better securing the collection of the duties; and it is expressly made the duty of said inspectors to suffer no goods, wares or merchandise, of any nature or kind whatever, to be landed from such ship or vessel without a permit in writing from the collector of the port, and naval officer, where any, first had and granted for the purpose.

It may be proper, also, to observe, that after twenty-four hours from the time of her arrival, a vessel cannot proceed from one port to another without a clearance in the manner particularly pointed out. By the 21st section of the act referred to, and by the second section of the act of the same date, "establishing the compensation of the officers employed in the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage," the collectors are authorised to employ, with the approbation of the secretary of the treasury, such inspectors as the public service may require; and by the 97th, 98th, 99th, 100th and 101st sections of the act first referred to, ample authority is given to provide the requisite number of cutters and boats for the better securing the collection of the duties. The officers of such boats are subject to the direction of the collectors, and are, moreover, empowered and directed to go on board all ships and vessels which shall arrive within the United States, or four leagues of the coast thereof, if bound to the United States; and among other duties, to affix and put proper fastenings on the hatches and other communications with the hold, and to remain on board the said vessels until their arrival at the port of their destination. They are likewise to execute and perform such other duties for the collection and security of the revenue, as, from time to time, shall be enjoined and directed by the secretary of the treasury, not contrary to law and the provisions of said act; and they are further authorised to fire at or into any vessel liable to examination which shall not bring to, on being required or chased by any cutter or boat, as described in the 102d section.

Neither the validity of these provisions of the act of the 2d March, 1799, to which I have adverted thus particularly, that the further observations which my duty requires me to make may be more intelligible, nor of the act itself, has ever heretofore been questioned; and it is not altogether clear that the purposes of the convention, to assemble in South Carolina, as defined by the recent act of the legislature of that state, would extend to acts of a collector merely in execution of these provisions. However this may be, they are now, and always have been applicable to every district and every part of the union; they are now, and have uniformly been, in daily and strict observance in each of them; they are not merely of universal application every where, but embrace almost every imaginable case, and if, as has been sometimes publicly professed, the mediated resistance to the laws of the union is to assume the form of legal redress, and avoid a resort to open force or violence, it is believed they will be found, when properly enforced, to be fully equal to every emergency likely to arise.

In this view, it is presumed, your own official conduct has been and is now in strict conformity with the provisions of the act of 1799, and that, in observing these instructions, you will be merely executing your duties with, perhaps, greater vigilance than ordinary, and adapting existing regulations, of daily use and application, to new circumstances of greater emergency, as they may arise. It is the more important that you should keep this view of the subject constantly in mind, as it is the wish of the president, and of this department, to take no step, nor employ any means calculated to provoke or excite to force those who are now threatening resistance, but to defeat their operations by the moral force of the laws and the constitution, and to execute the former in the manner therein prescribed, and to employ force only when it shall be clearly authorised, and be found unavoidable in the discharge of your duty, and indispensably necessary to resist its employment by those who shall have resorted to it for the subversion of the laws.

It may be sufficient, therefore, in the first place, to call your particular attention to legal provisions already adverted to, and to the duties which they enjoin, and to direct that, in every case to which they are applicable, you will conform to their provisions by all the means which they place in your power.

But as there are some contingencies inseparable from the measures of the convention about to assemble which cannot be overlooked, it is proper that, in regard to these, you should be now advised.

Upon the supposition, therefore, that the measures of the convention, or the acts of the legislature may consist, in part, at least, in declaring the laws of the United States imposing duties unconstitutional and null and void, and in forbidding their execution, and the collection of the duties within the state of South Carolina, you will, immediately after it shall be formally announced, resort to all the means provided by the laws, and particularly by the act of the 2d of March, 1799, to counteract the measures which may be adopted to give effect to that declaration.

For this purpose, you will consider yourself authorised to employ the revenue cutters which may be within your district, and provide as many boats, and employ as many inspectors, as may be necessary for the execution of the law, and for the purposes of the act already referred to. You will, moreover, cause a sufficient number of officers of cutters and inspectors to be placed on board, and in charge of every vessel arriving from a foreign port or place, with goods, wares, or merchandise, as soon as practicable after her first coming within your district, and direct them to anchor her in some safe place within the harbor, where she may be secure from any act of violence, and from any unauthorised attempt to discharge her cargo before a compliance with the laws; and they will remain on board of her at such place until the reports and entries required by law shall be made, both of vessel and cargo, and the duties paid, or secured to be paid by your satisfaction, and until the regular permit shall be granted for landing the cargo; and it will be your duty, against any forcible attempt, to retain and defend the custody of the said vessel, by the aid of the officers of the customs, inspectors, and officers of the cutters, until the requisitions of the law shall be fully complied with; and in case of any attempt to remove her or her cargo from the custody of the officers of the customs by the form of legal process from state tribunals you will not yield the custody to such attempt, but will consult the law officer of the district, and employ such means as, under the particular circumstances, you may legally do, to resist such process, and prevent the removal of the vessel and cargo.

Should the entry of such vessel and cargo not be completed, and the duties paid, or secured to be paid, by bond or bonds, with sureties to your satisfaction, within the time limited by law, you will, at the expiration of that time, take possession of the cargo, and land and store the same at Castle Pinckney, or some other safe place, and in due time, if the duties are not paid, sell the same according to the direction of the 56th section of the act of the 2d of March, 1799; and you are authorised to provide such stores as may be necessary for that purpose.

It may be hoped that the foregoing precautions, and the prompt prosecution, in all cases, of those who may violate the law or resist the officers of the customs in its execution, will be sufficient for the present, and as long as you may find it practicable to perform your official duties, and as long as the rights of your person, and those of the other officers of your district shall be secure, and property respected, the custom house may be continued at Charleston. But, should the measures of the convention, or those of the legislature, expose your person, or the persons of the other officers, to outrage, or to arrest and imprisonment, and, by force or other necessity, render the execution of the laws of the United States impracticable, you may remove the custom house to Castle Pinckney, or to some other secure place within the port of entry, where you may take and receive the entries of vessels and their cargoes, and perform other duties necessary by law to be performed at the custom house.

You will, moreover, cause the officers of the cutters under your direction, to board all vessels departing from the port of Charleston, and in case any shall be found without having been regularly entered and cleared in the manner required by law, to seize and detain the same, to be prosecuted according to law.

It will be proper, in every case of doubt and difficulty, to consult the law officer of the district, and, on all occasions, where these instructions do not afford an adequate guide, to follow his advice.

It is expected that you will promptly inform the department of any difficulty that may occur in your district, and keep it regularly advised of all the measures that may be adopted by any person or persons for obstructing the execution of the laws, and also of the means which you may deem it your duty to adopt, and that, in every case of importance, where the time will admit of it, you will, previously to taking any unusual or important step on your part, apply to the department for further instructions. For this purpose, you are authorised to despatch a special messenger, whenever, in your opinion, it may be necessary either for safety or expedition.

To enable you to execute the laws, and to fulfil these instructions, the revenue cutter Alert has been ordered to proceed to Charleston. On her arrival there will be two cutters on that station, and you will place them where you may think best.

You will treat these instructions as confidential, until it shall become necessary to act; but, in the mean time, you will exhibit them confidentially to the district attorney, naval officer and surveyor, that you may have the benefit of their counsels, and that you may all be better prepared to act together when occasion shall require. I am very respectfully, your ob't serv't.

L. McLANE, secretary of the treasury.

To James K. Pringle, esq. collector of the customs, Charleston.

[Similar letters were addressed to the collector at Georgetown, and the collector at Beaufort, differing only in the following particulars, viz: the reference to Castle Pinckney was omitted, and, in lieu of the last two paragraphs, the following was substituted: "To enable you the better to execute the laws, and fulfil these instructions, a revenue cutter will be placed under your direction, and you will assign her to such station, and give such instructions from time to time to her commander, as you may deem best adapted to those objects. The cutter for your district will be despatched in a few days."

"You will treat these instructions as confidential until it shall become time to act."]

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 2—VOL. VIII. BALTIMORE, MARCH 9, 1833. [VOL. XLIV. WHOLE No. 1,120.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

¶ We are now pretty nearly through the hurry of the business of congress; but many very valuable articles are lying-over, which shall be inserted with all convenient despatch. Our first purpose is to present and preserve important public papers—and, relieved of the notice of passing events in congress, our means are extensive. But the mass of interesting matter on hand, and about to be received, is uncommonly large.

¶ The 22nd congress adjourned at an early hour on Sunday morning—Saturday's sitting being continued. We give a very full report of the proceedings of the last days of the session. No small degree of confusion and excitement appeared on several occasions, and especially in the house of representatives—but much feeling was expected, because of the various important subjects before that body; and, perhaps, they were disposed of with as good temper as could have been hoped for. It will be seen that the evening session of Thursday, the 28th Feb. extended to $\frac{1}{2}$ past one o'clock on Friday morning, the 1st March—by which the bill further to provide for the collection of duties on imports was so placed by the previous question, that it was promptly passed by yeas and nays at the next sitting—149 to 48. The details are full of interest.

It will also be seen that Mr. Clay's tariff bill, which had been adopted and passed by the house and sent to the senate, passed the latter—29 to 16.

¶ In the proceedings of the house of representatives of the 1st instant, is inserted a report from the committee of ways and means concerning the bank of the United States; that of the minority of the committee, on the same subject, is laid off for our next. It is pretty clear, we think, that the safety of the public money is not endangered by being deposited in that institution—notwithstanding the repeated assaults which have been made on its responsibility to meet its engagements! We suppose that the bank will now be suffered to reach its period—undisturbed. The people are deeply interested, that the bank should be rather assisted than embarrassed, in winding up its affairs. It entirely possesses the public confidence, and so may even yet materially subserve the public interests.

¶ We shall soon have the proceedings of the convention of South Carolina, re-assembled by the proclamation of "major general Hamilton, commanding the state troops of South Carolina, in Charleston," (as "Randolph of Roanoke," has it)—and suppose that "the ordinance" will be triumphantly suspended, and with "a flourish of trumpets," and of "the shrill file and spirit-stirring drum," with the fullness of glory to the "brave volunteers"—although and notwithstanding "the ordinance" has been resisted, as it ought, by the congress of the United States, and its conditions have not been complied with, in most essential respects—the act of 1832 being yet in force, though to be modified hereafter, commencing on the 31st December next, but still not to be repealed, as was imperiously demanded by the "sovereign" state.

¶ The U. S. Telegraph of the 4th inst. appeared in mourning—not because of "the inauguration of Andrew Jackson," but for the reason that the "bloody bill," the act "further to provide for the collection of duties on imports," had become a law—saying "here lies the mortal remains of state rights;" and "it is for this we mourn," &c. We shall next week publish this law.

THE MAILS. The "summer arrangement" of the mails, which was put into operation about the 20th Feb. was "nullified" by a severe snow-storm and frost which commenced on the 1st of March; and from Saturday until Wednesday night, we had no mail from the east—and, at the last date mentioned, we received only two of the four that were then behind. The steam boat which was to have brought the Sunday mail, was embargoed by the ice in the Elk river; and, at the time of putting this sheet to press, had not arrived.

In consequence of the resumption of their regular trips, by the steam boats,—the lines of stages which carried the mail or passengers on the proper post road to Philadelphia, had been withdrawn; and the indirect route through York and Lancaster only remained for the public accommodation: hence many members of congress, and others, returning from Washington, were compelled to remain at Baltimore during the whole week, and all our extensive hotels were so filled, that a large number of persons had to seek private lodgings. The "frost king" however, has eased his icy fingers—and, in a day or two more, will probably depart—for the present.

THE CLOSE OF THE SESSION. We have given up a large portion of the present sheet to a detailed account of the proceedings of the last session of the 22nd congress, just now closed; and they are very important. A list of the acts, &c. is added.

It will be seen that, contrary to almost universal belief three weeks ago, that the three great bills—further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, Mr. Clay's bill to modify the tariff, and his bill concerning the proceeds of the public lands, all passed both houses of congress by large and extraordinary majorities. The latter, however,—though the vote in the senate was 23 for, and five against it, and in the house ninety-six to forty, being unsigned by the president, has not become a law! If it had passed in time—so that the president must have approved, or have placed his formal veto upon this bill,—it is believed that it would have become a law against the will of the executive; and this, we think, may be easily supposed from the meagre minorities which supported the administration in its projects for selling the stock of the bank of the United States, and withdrawing the public deposits from it. But the "force of circumstances," assisted, perhaps, by the thing called "management," shielded the president from this unpleasant condition, and enabled him to cause the bill to die an unnatural death, without the possibility of a re-action of the representatives of the people in its favor. We intend to give a pretty full congressional history of this bill, and make some free remarks on various proceedings had concerning it—some of which are esteemed as about the meanest ever practised by persons—who ought to have seats in the senate! And the refusal of the president to sign a bill so much desired by a very large majority of the people, as shewn by the votes of the senate and of the house, is unparalleled in the history of constitutional governments. It is an exertion of authority which neither the king of Great Britain, nor the king of France, would venture to practice. The high self-will of the chief magistrate is thus made sufficient to defeat the most wholesome measures of the legislature—fresh from the people, and fairly presumed to obey the "sovereign." We speak not as party politicians—but are influenced by the same principles which led us to support the bill "further to provide for the collection of duties on imports"—the principle that the ascertained wishes of the majority of the people may not be set aside, either by a president of the United States, or a governor of the state of South Carolina: and, hereafter, it may become necessary to form and pass bills with strange titles—for examples,—"to enforce the collection of the revenue on imports, and distribute the proceeds of the public lands;"—"to defray the expenses of the civil list, and improve certain harbors;"—"for the pay and subsistence of the navy, and to appropriate money for the Rockville road," &c. that one man's legislative power may not become absolute, as to the passage of laws!

The new tariff bill has become a law. We stand decidedly opposed to that bill—there are parts of it wholly irreconcilable to our deliberately formed and long cherished opinions, as we intend to shew on a future occasion;* but we would not have had that bill rendered waste paper by the action of the president, or the refusal of his signature. In England, or France, if an administration has a clear majority against it in the legislative bodies, the ministers resign, as they ought, and the king yields himself up to the people's will. But what is the present condition of things in the United States? The administration was rendered dependent on its old and avowed opponents for the only favorite measure adopted in congress! In one leading case only was the wish of the executive gratified—and that by the support of its most resolute political enemies, because they thought that measure was a just one. A strange state of affairs exists. Gen. Jackson has been re-elected by a mighty majority—and yet so much are things mixed with things, and parties confounded with parties, that even the official organ of government could not obtain the vote of either house for the office of printer; and the bank of the United States was sustained by a vote of more than two to one against the executive direction of influence and power. But we are not politicians. We have had but little to do with them, in the REGISTER, and shall have yet less; notwithstanding, facts shall be still stated, and principles discussed and sustained.

The following paragraphs give summary notices of some of the chief things that have happened.

From the National Intelligencer, of March 4. The winter's tale is almost wound up. Much of the details of business of the two past days will be found in our columns to-day; but the important business of the session, from which it takes rank and character, may be summed up in three lines, as follows:

Congress have passed

1. A bill to modify the tariff;
2. A bill to enforce its collection; and

3. A bill to appropriate among the several states the revenue from public lands.

These bills have passed in a manner pari passu, and almost concurrently. The majorities by which they have passed are large, and, whatever misgivings may exist in the minds of our friends as to the operation of one or the other of them, we have no doubt that they will as a whole meet the approbation of the great body of the people.

We will not exult at the vote in the house on the subject of the bank of the United States; but it would be affectation in us to say, that we are not gratified in finding ourselves so triumphantly sustained by the representatives of the people, in the ground we have occupied on this subject. The house would not even leave it doubtful what its opinion was. It has most distinctly and emphatically declared it to the world.

From the same, of March 5. The reader will find in the preceding columns a complete list of the acts passed at the session of congress which has just terminated. [See page 31.] From this list the results of the session may be ascertained, and at this moment from no other source.

An unusually small number of bills failed this session, in transitu between the two houses. The most important of these was the Light-house bill, which was rejected by the opposition of a single senator to its passage, which, though according to the rule of the senate, seems to be the fruit of an anomaly in legislation.

The only bill which failed from the refusal of the president of the United States to sign it, was the important bill (Mr. Clay's great bill) to appropriate for a limited term the proceeds of the sales of the public lands of the United States, and for granting land to certain states.

Among the acts, of which a list is published, is one, reported by Mr. Verplanck, which passed in the night of Saturday, and which seems to us of sufficient importance to the importing merchants, as well as to the revenue officers, to justify a special reference to it. By the operation of the general act of July, 1832, unintentionally, probably, on the part of congress and of those who framed it, the duties imposed on many kinds of hardware were nearly doubled, and other inconveniences interposed in the way of importers. These are removed by the act just passed; in which also the inconveniences from the duties on copper, brass plates, and copper for sheathing vessels, are also remedied, by restoring the duties on all these articles to their former footing, except copper sheathing, which is hereafter to be admitted free of duty.

The amount appropriated at the late session of congress for the continuation of the Cumberland road on westward, is nearly half a million of dollars.

From the same, of March 6. Before the close of the session of congress, our readers are already aware, the house of representatives declared, by a vote of considerably more than two to one, upon the recommendation of the committee of ways and means, their confidence in the bank of the United States. A still stronger testimony in favor of that institution, however, was borne by the senate, upon the recommendation of the committee of finance, of that body, seconded again by the house of representatives, and sanctioned even by the president of the United States, in the following manner:

The claimants for indemnity under the treaty with France, unwilling that the amount which is eventually to be divided amongst them should lie idle in the treasury, petitioned congress to cause the same to be invested so as to bear interest, until its distribution is awarded by the commissioners. In compliance with this petition, a provision was introduced, in the senate, into the general appropriation bill, and has become a law, requiring the secretary of the treasury to cause the money accruing under the treaty, to be invested in the stock of the bank of the United States, or loaned to individuals or trusts, upon pledges of stock of the United States, or of the bank of the United States, and upon no other security whatever. We here find all branches of the government in accord in placing the credit of the United States and that of the bank of the United States upon precisely the same footing, as entitled to higher confidence than any other mode of investment. The action of congress on this subject fully accords, we have no doubt, with the general wish of the claimants.

By one of the acts of the last session of congress, an office is established, entitled commissioner of pensions (to superintend the execution of the whole pension system) with a salary of 2,500 dollars per annum. It gives us pleasure to state that, with the advice and consent of the senate, James L. Edwards, who has long and faithfully discharged the same duties, has been appointed to fill the new office.

The finest haunch of mutton that has ever been seen in this city, was yesterday exhibited in the Centre market. It weighed 120 pounds, and was raised by Mr. John Bradley, of Chester county, Pennsylvania, and was sent here as a present to the president of the United States, (though the donor is no Jackson man). Thus it is in this case, as we have seen in other cases of greater consequence, the president's political adversaries treat him better than his professing friends.

From the same, of March 8. Among the miscellaneous appropriations contained in the general appropriation act for the present year, it gives us pleasure to find the following for the accommodation of the mercantile community, and the government agents connected with them, viz:

For the erection of a custom house at New York, three hundred thousand dollars.

For the purchase of a site and the erection of a public warehouse, in the city of Baltimore, fifty thousand dollars.

For do. do. in Newburyport, in Massachusetts, fifteen thousand dollars.

* We specially allude to the want of discriminations in the amount of duties, after 1812, which we regard as a concession of the principle of protection: as to the operation of the law until that period, concerning those articles which now pay specific duties or according to a minimum, we are entirely in the dark; and have unsuccessfully sought information as to the manner in which the amount of duties payable on such goods is to be determined. On articles now paying simple ad valorem duties, the modus operandi is plain enough; but further than this, we find great doubts existing as to the effects of the law; the process by which the "excess" over 30 per cent. is to be ascertained, (with regard to other articles), does not seem clearly understood by any one individual that we have had the pleasure to meet with.

For do. at Middletown, in Connecticut, four thousand eight hundred dollars.

For completing the custom house at New London, (Conn.) four thousand dollars.

For the purchase of custom house ground at Key West, four thousand dollars.

By a clause in the general appropriation act, the privilege of franking letters is given to members of congress from 60 days before each member takes his seat, [or ought to take his seat,] to the end of the term for which he is elected, and to the meeting of the congress following.

U. S. BANK STOCK. Upwards of 600 shares were sold at New York on Saturday last, at 105 a 103½. On the 4th of March, it had advanced to 109.

"COMBINATIONS!" By turning to the 33d vol. of the REGISTER, page 114, it will be seen that certain letters from Mr. Floyd, (now governor of Virginia), were read in the house of delegates of that state, in which he said that, "combinations [not coalitions!] for effecting the election of general Jackson were nearly complete, and that he wished to remain in congress until they were complete." Mr. F. had been the friend of Mr. Crawford. The following shews "how the land lies" at present:

A letter to the editors of the National Intelligencer, from a correspondent at Richmond, under date of 24th ult. says:

"I gave you an item of intelligence which possibly you may not receive from any other quarter; one going fully to demonstrate, I think, the low ebb of nullification in the capital of this state. The governor of Virginia, I understand, had at some trouble and expense, caused a superb state flag to be prepared and painted, with the intention of having it hoisted at the quarters of the state guard, on Friday morning last, the 22d instant. Knowledge of its existence, and of his intention, somehow or other, was obtained on Thursday the 21st, and a good deal of excitement manifested itself among the representatives and the people. Either dissuaded by his party friends, or prompted by his own fears of the consequences that would issue from displaying the flag, his excellency determined to let it remain snug in the painter's shop; and fortunate it was that he did so—for had the banner been unfurled to the breeze, and exposed to public gaze, it would unquestionably have been torn down and prostrated by the people, and in all probability with some bloodshed. Scarce a voice was heard in favor of raising it; and numbers were heard to express their determination, to rally under the star-spangled banner of the union. It was supposed by some, that had the state flag been hoisted on the day, the flag of the union would not have been, at least by order of the commanding chief. As it was, the union flag, fixed on a pole, was poked out of a hole in the southern end of the capitol loft, and in this half erect and awkward situation, flapping on the end of the ridge of the building, and repeatedly hooked on the point of one of the lightning rods, it was torn in many places, and pieces thereof were flying in every direction over the heads of the military and citizens assembled on the public square."

LOTTERIES. A "dead set" is making at the lottery system in several of the states, and we think that it will not be permitted to endure much longer.

NAVAL. The U. S. sloop of war Vincennes, at Portsmouth, N. H. is said to be fitting for sea with all possible expedition, and the Boston, Erie and frigate Constitution, at the navy yard, Charlestown, are ordered to be put in readiness for sea.

BALTIMORE AND WASHINGTON. The following highly interesting article is from the Maryland Republican of Saturday last:

The supplement to the bill authorizing the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, to construct a rail road to the city of Washington, passed the house of delegates on Wednesday, by a vote of 55 to 15, and will no doubt pass the senate—as it is in accordance with the propositions of the rail road company, there is no doubt of the project progressing without delay—and we may look for its accomplishment at an early period. The state subscribes one-third of the capital, and books are to be opened for individual subscriptions for the balance. The rail road company are authorised to take what stock may not be subscribed within thirty days after the opening of the books, and may borrow funds to a certain amount on the faith of the state, the payment of the principal and interest of which funds is secured by a pledge of the rail road itself. The maximum price for transporting passengers is fixed at $2 50, one fifth of which is to be paid into the state treasury, as a bonus for the charter. This will probably produce a revenue to the state, derived, too, principally from "birds of passage," of forty or fifty thousand dollars per annum; and increasing as the travel on that great thoroughfare, between the north and south, shall increase.

PUBLIC LANDS. The following resolution was passed by the house of delegates of the state of Maryland, on the 21st ult. by a vote of 48 to 23, after several attempts to amend it.

Be it resolved, by the general assembly of Maryland, That the recommendation by the president of the United States in his last annual message to congress, to cede the public lands to the new states in which they are located, is impolitic, unjust and highly injurious to the fair and legitimate claims of Maryland; and that it is our duty to those whom we represent, solemnly to protest against the adoption of such a policy, and at the same time earnestly to request our representatives in congress to give a zealous support to the passage of the bill, from the senate, providing for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands amongst the several states and territories of this union, now pending in the house of representatives of the United States.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, comptroller's office, Feb. 16, 1833.—Circular to collectors of the revenue:

Sir:—As the law allows fifteen working days for unloading vessels of 300 tons and under, and twenty days in the case of vessels exceeding 300 tons, and it will be impracticable in many cases to land the goods and have them deposited in the custom house stores between it and the 3d of March next; you will be pleased to adopt this as a general rule, that where the vessels are placed in the custody, and under the locks and keys of an inspector, in such manner as to prevent any imposition on the revenue, the cargoes of such vessels may be considered to have been deposited in the custom house stores within contemplation of law, so as to be entitled to the benefit of the 18th section of the new tariff act of the 14th July, 1832—and entered as importation made after the 3d March, 1833.

The credits for the duties, however, are to commence to run from the dates of the arrival of the vessels respectively.

It is proper to add, this arrangement has the approbation of the secretary of the treasury. Respectfully, (Signed) Jos. ANDERSON, comptroller.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 6th, 1833. Congress having by an act passed on the 2d inst. authorised the secretary of the treasury, to "lend on interest the instalments under the treaty of indemnity concluded at Paris on the fourth of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one, between the United States of America, and his majesty, the king of the French, upon a pledge of the stock of the United States, or of the bank of the United States, or to the bank of the United States, subject nevertheless to be repaid to the public treasury, whenever the commissioners appointed under the said treaty shall, by their award, direct to whom the said fund with the accumulated interest, shall be distributed:

In pursuance thereof, Notice is now given, That proposals will be received from the bank of the United States or other incorporated institutions, or from individuals, until the 20th inst. for borrowing the same. If from the bank of the United States, without any pledge of stock, and if from others upon a pledge of stock of the bank of the United States at par, to an amount equal to the sum borrowed, for the entire net proceeds of the first instalment under the said treaty, amounting to $961,340 30, or for any part thereof, not less than $100,000, to be repaid agreeably to the provisions of the said act.

LOUIS McLANE, Secretary of the Treasury.

THE INDIANS. The article which we copied into the last REGISTER, page 2, as to the defeat of and capture of a company of U. S. rangers, by the Camanasha Indians, is set down as an arrant falsehood, imposed on the editor of the Louisville Journal.

The "Galeian" of Jan. 23, says—We learn that the statement in the last Galeian, of an attack by the Sac and Fox Indians on the Menominees and Winnebagoes, was erroneous. The Winnebagoes got into a drunken frolic, and had a riot among themselves, in which two or three lives were lost, which gave rise to the whole report.

ORDER IN THE GALLERIES. Upon two or three recent occasions the spectators in the lobbies and galleries of the senate have evinced their approbation of remarks made, by applauding. We hope never to see this allowed in the presence of legislative or judicial bodies in this country; and we are glad to find that the president of the senate has determined, upon every such violation of order, to clear the galleries. If applause is once permitted, we shall next have hissing, and finally tumult and confusion. The rule of perfect silence on the part of the audience ought hereafter to be most rigidly enforced. [Alex. Gaz.]

CASE OF TORIAS WATKINS. From the National Intelligencer of March 2. The chief justice announced yesterday, that the court being divided on the application for a habeas corpus in the case ex parte Watkins, the motion was, therefore, refused. The point or points upon which the difference of opinion occurred were not intimated from the bench, so that we do not know what further is to be done in the case. We learn, however, that it is probable that some further steps will be taken in the case by the counsel of Mr. Watkins.

NEW JERSEY. Chas. P. Seeley, president of the council, has been elected governor of New Jersey, for the remainder of the year, in place of Mr. Southard, elected a senator of the United States; and John Moore White has been elected attorney general of the state. The Jackson party voted for C. L. Hardenburg as governor, and G. D. Wall as attorney general.

PENNSYLVANIA. An act has passed the legislature of this state for the entire abolition of lotteries after the 31st December next.

VIRGINIA. A bill has passed the Virginia house of delegates, appropriating $18,000 annually, for five years, for the purpose of colonising in Africa, the free people of color in that state.

SOUTH CAROLINA. Mr. John C. West, who was recently elected sheriff, in Kershaw district, South Carolina, has been required by governor Hayne to take the nullification test oath before any of his acts will be considered "legal." He refused to do it, and has published an address to his constituents giving his reasons for refusal at length. He assigns, among other constitutional and conscientious objections, that he cannot swear "to enforce laws which an irresponsible association has the power to suspend at pleasure," meaning, we presume, the nullification club in Charleston. Mr. West will doubtless be superseded, and be again a candidate, and the Camden Journal promises that he will be sustained by a triumphant majority in the district. This process may be repeated perpetually, and all legal proceedings be thus arrested in the district by the peaceful action of the unionists in their elective character. "Thus," says the Charleston City Gazette, "it will be seen that the reign of proscription has begun in good earnest." And the Courier says that Mr. West's example will be followed by the union party throughout the state.

It is believed (says the Augusta Courier,) that not less than 20,000 of the citizens of South Carolina of all kinds, have passed through this city on their way to the west. In consequence, the roads to Alabama are very bad, and provisions scarce and high in price. A letter from a gentleman who recently moved to that state says he has to pay two dollars per bushel for corn, from the number of persons who have removed to that part of the country within the last three months.

MR. GWYNN. It is stated that the senate has, for the third time, rejected the nomination of Samuel Gwynn, as receiver of public monies in one of the land offices in Mississippi. The like, we suppose, never happened before.

JAMAICA. We have received by the Orbit, a file of the Jamaica Courant to the 4th inst. It appears by these papers, that the opposition to the government, and the administration of Lord Mulgrave, was on the increase. Some riots had taken place. The Courant says:

We repeat our regret, that the conduct of Lord Mulgrave should have reduced himself and the colony to their present condition. The signs of the times are awful, and our only salvation is coolness—discretion, with determination; and, with these united, Jamaica must yet flourish.

We learn, that for some weeks past, the towns and villages on the north side of the island have been placarded with such compliments to our esteemed governor, as—"down with Mulgrave!"—"independence to Jamaica!"—"no sectarians!"—"But success to the colonial union!"

[N. Y. Mer. Adv.]

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT—By and with the advice and consent of the senate.

Levett Harris, of New Jersey, to be charge d'affaires of the United States to his majesty the king of the French.

Peter V. Daniel, of Virginia, Wyll Sillman, of Ohio, and John R. Livingston, jr. of New York, to be commissioners under the treaty with Naples.

Thomas Swann, jr. of the District of Columbia, to be secretary to the board of commissioners, and George Breathitt, of Kentucky, to be clerk under the same treaty.

Joseph Villamil, late of Louisiana, to be consul of the United States at the port of Guayaquil.

J. B. Ferrand, to be consul of the United States at Panama in the republic of New Grenada.

Francis Thomassin, of South Carolina, to be consul of the United States at Baracoa, in the island of Cuba.

Obed Folga, of New York, to be consul of the United States at Payta, in the republic of Peru.

Henry Carleton, of Louisiana, to be attorney of the United States for the eastern district of Louisiana, in the place of John Eldell, whose commission has expired.

Jonas L. Sibley, of Massachusetts, to be marshal of the United States for the district of Massachusetts, from the 3d of March, 1833, when the commission of Samuel D. Harris expired.

Andrew J. Donelson, to be the secretary authorised under the act "prescribing the mode by which patents for public lands shall be signed and executed," approved March 2d, 1833.

Thomas McCrate, to be collector of the customs for the district, and inspector of the revenue for the port of Wiscasset, in the state of Maine, from the 11th of March, 1833, when his present commission will expire.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The following are Mr. Ritchie's remarks on Mr. Clay's tariff bill. We have no present comment to make upon them.

From the Richmond Enquirer of March 2.

THE TARIFF BILL.

We hope it is now a law of the land. It passed the house of representatives on Tuesday. Every vote south of the Potomac, we believe, with the exception of Mr. Mercer, being in favor of it. It is expected to pass the senate without difficulty. It is not the best bill to which we are entitled—nor in all probability the best which the whole moral force of the united south could have wrung from the next congress. But we take it for the present for what it is worth. It will give peace to South Carolina—whose measures have been marked by so much precipitation and danger, and calculated to shake the union itself. And we, for one, shall hail the measure with sincere satisfaction.

We do not understand Mr. Clay's course. In his speech on Monday last, he hopes "that the manufacturers would go on and prosper, confident that the abandonment of protection was never intended, and looking to more favorable times for a renewal of a more efficient tariff." RENEWAL of a more efficient tariff! Now, what says his bill? That "from and after the day last aforesaid" (30th June, 1833), all duties upon imports shall be collected in ready money, &c. &c. and such duties (not exceeding 20 per cent) shall be laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the government." How stand the hope and the pledge together? Does Mr. Clay mean to tantalise the manufacturers with the hope of "more favorable times for the renewal of a more efficient tariff"—or, does he mean to say, that notwithstanding the pledge in the bill, a more favorable time is to be seized upon for the renewal of a more efficient tariff?

Mr. Clay disclaims any share in bringing the existing evils on the country! Why, has he not been one of the great clannisms of the American System?—and is it not this most oppressive system which has applied the "torch" to our political fabric? He now declares, "that when he saw the torch applied to a favorite system, he would rush to save it, and to restore security and peace." Why, this is nothing but right—for, well it is, that the incendiary should rush to extinguish the flames he has principally contributed to kindle.

He declares, that he wishes to put the system on a permanent foundation for nine or ten years!—and adds, that he is willing to test his bill "by the opinions of the manufacturers themselves, a large number of whom are now assembled in Washington, and whose almost unanimous voice would be in favor of his bill." Well, if they are content, we can have no objection. But how foolishly would the south have acted, in submitting longer to a system, which the manufacturers can now afford to modify without a murmur? We doubt, however, whether Mr. Clay will find the manufacturers so quiet. Mr. Webster seems to think differently—but they may rely upon it, that their oppressive system is now gone—that no more favorable times will ever come for renewing a more efficient tariff—that Mr. Clay himself cannot bring it back—that the south has seen how gradually and insidiously this system has grown upon us—that they have seen the error, and will hereafter repudiate every return to it, with a jealousy and a determination which nothing can subdue. The die is cast, if this bill passes—and this unnatural system, which is so much at war with the genius of the age, and the institutions of a free and a young country, will never be renewed after 1842, by all the Clays and the Calhouns in the country.

We shall be delighted to see it down—and though 9 or 10 years is pretty long for us to submit to it, yet we are willing to allow so much time to the manufacturers to accommodate themselves to the change—always reserving the right of cutting down the revenue to the most economical wants of the government. We hail the passage of the bill with satisfaction—as calculated to preserve the peace of the country. Mr. Clay has been the most active man in bringing it about. It was what he owed to the country—and we are glad that he has paid the debt. But, depend upon it, Mr. Clay, that your hopes about the return of more favorable times, and the renewal of a more efficient tariff, will never be consummated with the consent of the south. And another thing! you will never succeed, as you hint, in converting the southrons into "high tariff men"—that hope is gone! that source of joy is dried up. And another! the south have not "given up their constitutional objections"—and what is more, they never will—for, independently of their pecuniary interests, they regard the whole system as contrary to the genius of our institutions—as involving especially a jurisdiction over the rights and pursuits of the people, which was never, and never will be, yielded to a limited federal government.

LETTER FROM GENERAL MERCER.

Washington, D. C. March 4, 1833.

Edgar Snowden, esq. editor of the Alexandria Gazette:

DEAR SIR: In the analysis, which lately appeared in your paper, of the vote of the house of representatives, on the bill modifying the tariff of July 1832, I appear to be the only member from Virginia opposed to that measure; and, as it was regarded, by a large majority of those who voted for it, as one of pacification, I avail myself of the channel of your paper, to state briefly, the grounds of my dissent to it, sustained, as it was, by many of my personal and political friends.

Those grounds would have been publicly submitted to the house, of which I was a member, had I not regarded it as a duty to forbear to protract a debate which consumed up a very large portion of the late session of congress; and, at one time, threatened to render an extra session of that body necessary to the administration of the government.

It is known to all my intimate friends, that, although I was not an original advocate of the protective system, beyond an adequate provision, in peace, of the means of defence in war, I consider the public faith as solemnly pledged, by the various tariff acts of congress, since the last war with Great Britain, to those citizens of the United States who have accepted the invitation of those laws, to place their capital and labor under the shield of the protective policy.

The testimony of so many men, representatives of the eastern and middle states, in both houses of congress,—in whose knowledge of the condition of the manufactures of the country I had much confidence, as well on account of their integrity and ability, as of their better opportunity of information, derived from their place of abode, a great proportion of whom voted against the bill in question,—occasioned in my mind no little hesitation to give to it the sanction of my vote.

But an earnest desire to pacify the existing discontents, to the south, if practicable, in a manner consistent with what is due to the authority of the laws, induced me to declare to the friends around me, after the bill had come from the senate called the "enforcing act," that, if it passed the house, I would yield my assent to a modification of the tariff; for which, bills were then under discussion in both houses.

The order in which those bills should pass the senate, had been, in my judgment, very properly arranged; and that arrangement I regarded as of material consequence to the character of the nation.

South Carolina had nullified a law of the United States, and threatened resistance to any attempt to enforce its execution. To yield to this threat, would be, in my opinion, a virtual renunciation of the sanction, not of this particular law only, but of the entire authority of congress. While an attitude of defiance was maintained by that state, I regarded any concession from the federal government, prior to a provision of the means and the expression of a determination to maintain, unimpaired, the authority of the union, as wholly derogatory to its character, and as eminently tending to endanger its future existence, by inviting similar resistance from other quarters, and a general and fatal distrust of its authority every where.

It was by no means certain, at the moment at which the late tariff bill passed the house of representatives, that the "enforcing act" might not be defeated, provided the former preceded it. Many causes led me to consider the passage of the "enforcing act," in such event, as doubtful. Among these, were the advanced period of the session, which must terminate in a few days, and the anxiety of many members to pass another very important act, called the "land bill." Accordingly, after the bill of conciliation had passed, there were more than 70 votes to lay the "enforcing act" on the table, with the avowed intent not again to consider it during the session.

As both acts have now passed, I have only to make, in justice to myself, this explanation to my constituents.

While I congratulate you and them, on the reasonable hope which those measures afford of the restoration of harmony to our union, without material injury to any class of citizens, I take this occasion to say, that I never, for one moment, considered its existence seriously endangered by the political movements of South Carolina. That glorious bulwark, not of our own freedom merely, but of the liberty of mankind, I regard as incapable of being subverted by the madness or folly of a single state. I am, dear sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
C. F. MERCER.

THE INAUGURATION.

At 12 o'clock, on Monday last, the president and vice president, elect, attended by the heads of departments, foreign ministers and their suits, the judges of the supreme court, the president of the senate, and senators, the speaker of the house of representatives, the members of the house of representatives, the marshal of the District and the mayor and corporate authorities of the city, and a vast concourse of citizens and strangers, entered the hall of representatives. The president took the seat of the speaker of the house with Mr. Van Buren on his left, and his private secretary, Mr. Donelson on his right. After a pause of a few minutes, the president rose and was greeted by the cheers of the large assembly present. He then proceeded in an audible and firm voice to pronounce his inaugural address, at the close of which, he was again greeted with cheers and applause. The chief justice then approached the president and administered the usual oath, at the conclusion of which he was again cheered by the multitude. The oath was also administered to Mr. Van Buren. The president and vice president then retired amid the plaudits of the assembly.

INAUGURAL ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, FOURTH OF MARCH, 1833.

Fellow citizens:—The will of the American people, expressed through their unsolicited suffrages, calls me before you to pass through the solemnities preparatory to taking upon myself the duties of president of the United States, for another term. For their approbation of my public conduct, through a period which has not been without its difficulties, and for this renewed expression of their confidence in my good intentions, I am at a loss for terms adequate to the expression of my gratitude. It shall be displayed, to the extent of my humble abilities, in continued efforts so to administer the government, as to preserve their liberty and promote their happiness.

So many events have occurred within the last four years, which have necessarily called forth, sometimes under circumstances the most delicate and painful, my views of the principles and policy which ought to be pursued by the general government, that I need, on this occasion, but allude to a few leading considerations, connected with some of them.

The foreign policy adopted by our government soon after the formation of our present constitution, and very generally pursued by successive administrations, has been crowned with almost complete success, and has elevated our character among the nations of the earth. To do justice to all, and submit to wrong from none, has been, during my administration, its governing maxim; and so happy have been its results, that we are not only at peace with all the world, but have few causes of controversy, and those of minor importance, remaining undischarged.

In the domestic policy of this government, there are two objects which especially deserve the attention of the people and their representatives, and which have been, and will continue to be the subjects of my increasing solicitude. They are the preservation of the rights of the several states, and the integrity of the union.

These great objects are necessarily connected, and can only be attained by an enlightened exercise of the powers of each within its appropriate sphere, in conformity with the public will constitutionally expressed. To this end, it becomes the duty of all to yield a ready and patriotic submission to the laws constitutionally enacted, and thereby promote and strengthen a proper confidence in those institutions of the several states and of the U. States which the people themselves have ordained for their own government.

My experience in public concerns, and the observation of a life somewhat advanced, confirm the opinions long since inculcated by me, that the destruction of our state governments, or the annihilation of their control over the local concerns of the people, would lead directly to revolution and anarchy, and finally to despotism and military domination. In proportion, therefore, as the general government encroaches upon the rights of the states, in the same proportion does it impair its own power and detract from its ability to fulfil the purposes of its creation. Solemnly impressed with these considerations, my countrymen will ever find me ready to exercise my constitutional powers in arresting measures which may directly or indirectly encroach upon the rights of the states, or tend to consolidate all political power in the general government. But of equal, and indeed of incalculable importance is the union of these states, and the sacred duty of all to contribute to its preservation by a liberal support of the general government in the exercise of its just powers. You have been wisely admonished to "accustom yourselves to think and speak of the union as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity, watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety, discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can in any event be abandoned, and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of any attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts." Without union our independence and liberty would never have been achieved—without union they never can be maintained. Divided into twenty-four, or even a smaller number of separate communities, we shall see our internal trade burdened with numberless restraints and exactions; communication between distant points and sections obstructed, or cut off; our sons made soldiers to deluge with blood the fields they now till in peace; the mass of our people borne down and impoverished by taxes to support armies and navies; and military leaders at the head of their victorious legions becoming our law-givers and judges. The loss of liberty, of all good government, of peace, plenty, and happiness, must inevitably follow a dissolution of the union. In supporting it, therefore, we support all that is dear to the freeman and the philanthropist.

The time at which I stand before you is full of interest. The eyes of all nations are fixed on our republic. The event of the existing crisis will be decisive in the opinion of mankind of the practicability of our federal system of government. Great is the stake placed in our hands: great is the responsibility which must rest upon the people of the United States. Let us realize the importance of the attitude in which we stand before the world. Let us exercise forbearance and firmness. Let us extricate our country from the dangers which surround it, and learn wisdom from the lessons they inculcate.

Deeply impressed with the truth of these observations and under the obligation of that solemn oath which I am about to take, I shall continue to exert all my faculties to maintain the just powers of the constitution, and to transmit unimpaired to posterity the blessings of our federal union. At the same time, it will be my aim to inculcate, by my official acts, the necessity of exercising, by the general government, those powers only that are clearly delegated; to encourage simplicity and economy in the expenditures of the government; to raise no more money from the people than may be requisite for these objects, and in a manner that will best promote the interests of all classes of the community, and of all portions of the union. Constantly bearing in mind that, in entering into society, "individuals must give up a share of liberty to preserve the rest," it will be my desire so to discharge my duties as to foster, with our brethren in all parts of the country, a spirit of liberal concession and compromise; and, by reconciling our fellow citizens to those partial sacrifices which they must unavoidably make, for the preservation of a greater good, to recommend our invaluable government and union to the confidence and affections of the American people.

Finally, it is my most fervent prayer, to that Almighty Being before whom I now stand, and who has kept us in his hands from the infancy of our republic to the present day, that he will so override all my intentions and actions, and inspire the hearts of my fellow citizens, that we may be preserved from dangers of all kinds, and continue forever a UNITED AND HAPPY PEOPLE.

From the Globe of March 6.

Yesterday, the diplomatic representatives of the different foreign governments, waited upon the president to offer their congratulations on his re-election, and to assure him of the friendly disposition of their own countries towards the United States. They were received and introduced to the president, by the secretary of state, in the presence of the heads of departments, at one o'clock, and Mr. Serrurier, minister plenipotentiary of France, made the following address on their behalf:

Mr. President: The diplomatic body accredited to the government of this republic, hastens to offer to your excellency their respectful felicitations on your second inauguration as president of the United States. They feel assured that this new and flattering proof of the confidence of your fellow citizens cannot but greatly contribute to confirm those friendly relations which already exist between this republic and the governments represented at Washington—relations which your excellency so happily preserved and extended during the four years of your first presidency.

I esteem it, Mr. President, at once a happiness and an honor to be, on an occasion so interesting, the interpreter of the sentiments which animate the diplomatic body towards you, personally, and to offer to you, in their name, the sincere wishes which every one of them truly entertains for the increasing prosperity of this republic, for the firmness of its union, and especially, Mr. President, for every thing that can contribute to your own personal glory and happiness.

To this address the president made the following reply:

It gives me great pleasure, gentlemen, to receive by the organ of the eldest and highly respected member of the diplomatic body, near the government of the United States, the congratulations you are pleased to offer on my re-election, and, above all, the assurances for my country of the friendly disposition of those which you represent.

It has been a principal object with me, to cultivate that disposition by the sincerest desire to cherish kindly feelings, extend the advantages of commerce, promote the interchange of every discovery in arts and science in peace, and lessen by humane stipulations, the evils of war, when, unfortunately, that scourge of the human race becomes inevitable.

Repeat these assurances, gentlemen, to the several governments you represent, as the invariable rule of my conduct towards them; and, for yourselves, accept the offer of the high respect and regard for you individually, with which your conduct during your residence here has inspired me.

TWENTY-SECOND CONGRESS—SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

March 1. Mr. Grundy, from the select committee appointed to wait on the president and vice president elect, to apprise them of their election, reported that the committee had performed that duty, in regard to the vice president elect, and had received for answer, that he received this evidence of the confidence of the people with gratitude, and would enter on the discharge of his duties with a determination to act so as to justify that confidence.

The bill for modifying the duties on imports, as passed by the house of representatives, (in effect Mr. Clay's bill), being under consideration and on its passage—

Mr. Robbins spoke at some length, in opposition to the bill. He objected to the idea which seemed to permeate the bill, that the protective policy of the country was an evil; an evil to be deprecated, and only to be tolerated for a moment, to prevent a greater evil. This policy was now placed in the situation of a state criminal condemned to die, but allowed a short time to prepare himself for death, since die he must—his doom being fixed and irreversible. He took a view of the true character of the resources of the country, and the obligation which true policy imposed on us to cherish and protect them. With the correct path so distinctly marked before us, he expressed his great astonishment that congress should be unwilling to pursue it; that there should always appear a reluctance to adopt measures looking to the development and judicious direction of these resources, and a readiness to rescind them where they had been adopted.

In reference to what had been said as to the preservation of the principle of protection by this bill, he asked what was the use of preserving the principle of protection, if protection itself was to be abandoned. He deprecated this bill as suicidal in its effects upon the great interests, and the general prosperity of the country. What Great Britain, with her thousand ships, and her Wellington armies, could not accomplish, was given to her by this single act of our own. It had been said that this bill was necessary to preserve the union, and that without it the union would be dissolved; but he questioned the correctness of this view, and policy of adopting this measure in the present attitude of South Carolina.

Mr. Calhoun then said, that although he objected to many of the details of this bill, he should vote for it. He thought the time too long, the descent of the duties too slow, and the home valuation as exceptionable; but all these are counterbalanced by the general spirit and principle of the bill. He stated that he did not regard the bill as containing any pledged pledge; but as a measure adopted to meet a peculiar state of things. He believed that no attempt would be made to disturb the arrangement of this bill, and if it was, that it would be repelled with indignation. He further believed that as far as this bill is concerned, peace will be given to the land; but he must say, with deep regret, that there is another bill which had originated in this body, and had just been returned with the sanction of the other house, which would disturb that peace. It would not do it immediately, but it was a precedent of the most dangerous character. He believed that this bill was a repeal of the constitution, and, "so help me God!" said he, "I would rather have that instrument repealed on the face of it." He viewed it as a measure which must inevitably tend to consolidation. It would not be acquiesced in. It would be resented, not by force, but by a long course of public opposition, which would never cease until the bill shall be expunged with disgrace from the statute book. The verdict of congress was against South Carolina; but there was an appeal which would lie to the people. The great republican party would again be rallied and re-united, as it was in 1798, and by its force this evil will be corrected, or else the liberties of this country are gone forever. He rejoiced that one subject of controversy was settled and put to rest, but he deeply regretted that another should be opened which presented a different issue, and one of the most formidable character.

Mr. Fredlinghausen then made some remarks in explanation and justification of the vote he should give. He admitted that when this bill was originally introduced, he had strong doubts as to its wisdom, deeming it to be a precedent which was of doubtful, or even dangerous tendency. But the result of a free interchange of opinions, and of the knowledge which he had acquired from the manufacturers of his own state, had been the removal of all these doubts, and a conviction that this measure ought to pass as a peace offering to the south. He adverted to the growing dissatisfaction in relation to the protective policy which prevailed in the south, and which rendered it necessary that something should be done to check the further increase of that policy. He complimented his honorable friend from Kentucky, for the great effort he had now made to restore peace and harmony to the country, and stated that, however that gentleman might be assailed, and his motives misrepresented by the presses of the country, the time would soon arrive when his course would be correctly understood, and properly appreciated. In his correspondence with some of the manufacturers of his state, to whom he had applied for information, he had ascertained that the guarantee of its permanence which this bill contained on its face, and the circumstance in which it was enacted, would be of far greater advantage to the manufacturers, than high duties, on the steadiness of which no reliance could be placed. He read an extract of a letter from one of these manufacturers to this effect; and then declared that he was satisfied that his course of duty was to give his vote for a bill which he was assured on the one hand, would tranquillize the south, and on the other, would be satisfactory to the manufacturers. He trusted that the effect of this compromise would be to induce gentlemen from the north and south to meet with kinder feelings than they had exhibited for the last ten years.

Mr. Dallas said that although the senator from S. Carolina had stated that the south would not view this bill in the light of a pledge to abandon the protective system, yet the gentleman who had opposed the bill had indicated a different opinion, and for himself he was opposed to all that kind of legislation. He expressed his fear that while we are tranquillizing one part of the country by this bill, we may be disturbing the tranquillity of another part, and thus be only shifting the scene of discontent. The bill would throw out of employment a great mass of people now occupied in the state of Pennsylvania in manufacturing establishments, and would render useless and profitless all those splendid works of internal improvement, her canals and rail roads, for the transportation of the fabrics which may be prepared by our domestic industry. It would diminish the value of her coal mines, and operate as a mischievous check on her prosperity. He thought that a bill involving such important results ought to have been more maturely considered and weighed, before any final decision was had upon it. Congress had acted hastily on this question, which affects the whole people, and which ought to have proceeded from some popular basis. He could have wished the postponement of this measure until the next congress shall assemble. In that congress there will be a fuller representation of the voice of the people, and if that body should then determine to destroy this system, he would acquiesce cheerfully in that decision, and so also would the state which he represented. All the conflicting interests had evinced a disposition to put off this question till the next session. South Carolina had determined to suspend her operations until that time, and the subject might have gone over till then without any danger to the peace of the country. The tariff bill of the last session was passed after the most serious examination and discussion, and he believed that if a bill destroying that measure was now passed, it would be difficult to avoid the character of inconsistency.

But he thought that as a substantive measure this bill ought not to pass. It had been hastily prepared, was loose in its structure, and had too few guards in it. He re-stated the views he had suggested while this bill was in preparation before the select committee, and the objection he had urged. The gentleman from Delaware had gone with him in most of his views,

In all except the return to cash duties which that gentleman had been willing to give up to the home valuation. He did not accord in the opinions of that gentleman as to the advantage of this home valuation. He declared that the immediate effect of this bill would be to reduce the value of all the property invested in manufactures, and to destroy the means which thousands of persons employed in them rely on for their daily sustenance. He expressed his inability to comprehend the benefits which he was told would result from the passage of the bill. A skillful pilot might be guiding a vessel in a storm safely to her harbor, while a less skillful landsman might suppose that he was running the vessel on the rocks. So it might be with the gentleman from Kentucky, who might see advantages which were likely to arise under this bill, such as a less skillful politician might be unable to discern. He took on the passage of this bill by the votes of the senators from South Carolina as an abandonment of the doctrines of nullification, since, after an abandonment of the tariff of 1832, by her ordinance, to be null and void, they vote for a measure which regards that very law in active and efficient operation. He had no doubt of the passage of the bill, and although he felt it would operate oppressively on the interests of the state which he represented, he was still disposed to give it fair play, and to look upon it as a measure of conciliation.

Mr. Ewing succeeded. He declared that the bill contains nothing which is more of the character of a pledge, than is to be found in the resolutions of the senator from Massachusetts. He replied to the statements that this bill yielded the principle of protection, and quoted from the language of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to-day, and some days since, for the purpose of shewing that even he had changed his first views of the subject. He adverted to the doubts which he had originally felt in voting for this bill at the present session, but said that those doubts had subsequently given way. He took a view of the course pursued by the senator from Pennsylvania, in reference to the last tariff, in order to shew that his opinions had not always been stable and uniform on the subject. He stated that there was no reason to believe that the senator from Pennsylvania would vote against any measure which carries into effect the views expressed by the president in his message at the opening of the present session, until his friend from Kentucky had introduced this bill.

He expressed his regret that he should be found on this question in opposition to the views of his friend from Massachusetts, but he could not help thinking that his friend had attached too much importance to the evils to which he thought this bill would give rise. Totally differing from the views of the senator from South Carolina as to the right of that state to place herself in the position which she now occupies, he would never have voted for the bill, until the other measure had been passed. He remarked that the senator from Massachusetts had objected to this bill because it was prospective legislation.

Mr. Webster stated that he had not objected to prospective legislation, but he had said that this bill, excepting the first section, was not prospective legislation. All our legislation is prospective. We do not legislate for the past.

Mr. Ewing then resumed, and argued that the bill gives sufficient protection to the manufacturers. It also saves the principle of protection which he would never have consented to abandon. It leaves free all articles which are necessary for the manufacturer. He believed that they who had hitherto opposed the protective system, would, when they should cease to view this question through a party medium, be disposed to yield a moderate protection to domestic industry.

Mr. Mangum then obtained the floor, and expressed his regret that the gentleman from Pennsylvania should have endeavored to mix poison in the cup which had been tendered to the south, in order to induce her to push it away from her. He stated that no man wished such an adjustment of the tariff as, by prostrating by a sudden action the great interests of one section of the union, might produce the danger of reaction. He said that the feeling of the south would be one of deep gratitude to those who had come to her aid, when her friends were upon her, and in the dark hour when there was not a particle of light save the sparkles which came from the steel of her enemy. He deprecated the panacea against panic which some gentlemen offered to them, and thanked those who had zealously hastened the present glorious consummation. He trusted that, although the present bill did not go so far as had been hoped, it would still conciliate the country, and obtain from all parties deep gratitude for those who have stepped forward, and by sacrificing a part of their system, saved the rest, and tranquillised the country.

Mr. Clayton then made some observations on the assertion that the principle of protection was abandoned, a statement which he denied. He could not understand how any gentleman could stand up, in the face of all the exemptions which the bill contained of articles used by the manufacturer, and say that there was any intention to abandon the principle of protection. He would not sacrifice any of the great interests of the country, but would look abroad upon the whole, with a desire to extend to all an equal and an efficient protection. He believed, that instead of being abandoned, the tariff system would hereafter be placed on a better footing than any on which it had heretofore stood. It was from no feeling of panic that he had been induced to vote for this measure. He had been disposed to soothe the feelings of the people of South Carolina, and to produce a state of things which would bring all the great interests of the country to act together. He replied to some of the remarks of the senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster), especially to the one in which he had said that this bill contained a pledge which would prevent an honorable man from voting for a repeal of this law. In such a case, he wished the senator from Massachusetts to establish a rule exclusively for his own government, and to leave others to the same free course of action. He also went over the ground he had formerly taken as to the concurrence between the resolutions of that gentleman and the bill now under consideration. He then replied to what had fallen from the senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Dallas), as to the course pursued in committee, and insisted that the protection secured by the bill as it now stands is more efficient than that which would have been obtained by the amendment of that senator. He also stated that he had conversed with practical manufacturers, and had been satisfied that none of the great interests of the country would be sacrificed by this bill. In reference to the statements made by the senator from Pennsylvania, relative to the ruin which this bill would bring on the establishments in Pennsylvania, he expressed his belief that as much injury would not result from this measure as would have resulted from the proposition made by the senator from Pennsylvania. However Pennsylvania may have legislated at home, she had not, on this floor, shewn that steady, inflexible determination not to surrender a particle of the principle of protection which was now manifested. He would not permit it to go forth to the world that he and his friends who were about to record with pleasure, because it would give peace to the country, their names in favor of this bill, were about to yield any thing of the principle of protection. He regretted that he had occupied the senate so long. He would not go through the clauses of the bill, which was printed. He trusted that his constituents would understand the motives which had induced him to vote for this bill. If he should find at the expiration of the nine years that there had been too much yielded of the interests of the manufacturers, he would willingly go with those friends with whom he had so long acted, in restoring things to their former condition.

Mr. Webster replied that he stood on the ground that specific duties and discrimination in laying them, were the essence of the protective system, and these had been surrendered in this bill. He would leave this point to be settled by the people. He then made some brief answers to the remarks of the senators from Delaware and New Jersey. He thought it was among the possibilities that when gentlemen came together next session, they would be told that a new law would be necessary to carry this into effect. They would then be told that this bill would produce no diminution of the revenue, and that if the revenue is to be reduced, it must be by a different modification of the tariff. He replied that as to what had been said about practical men, the opinions of half a dozen or a dozen such convened here was not to be mistaken for public opinion; and he was far from believing that the opinions of practical men were always the surest guides for politicians: He repeated that artisans and mechanics would be severe sufferers under the operation of this bill, which would take off the protection from those articles.

He made a brief reference to what had been said concerning his resolutions, and concluded with saying that he did take the ground that this bill was an abandonment of the essence of the protective principle.

Mr. Frelinghuysen made a few observations to explain a point on which he had been misunderstood by the senator from Massachusetts. He stated that he had received his information from the manufacturers, before he left home. He now said that his manufacturers would, if it came to that point, surrender the tariff for the preservation of the union, and so would he—he would live and die by the union.

Mr. Silsbee said a few words on the subject of the home valuation, which he deemed to be impracticable, and said that if it was practicable, the result would not be so favorable to the manufacturer as had been supposed.

Mr. Clayton repeated his views for the purpose of extricating them from any doubt as to the home valuation. He said he thought there would be no difficulty in attaining a uniform rate of value by the same process.

Mr. Forsyth said it was evident from the discussion that this was a very bad bill, and satisfied nobody. He expressed his conviction that public opinion is correcting, and almost corrected, on the subject of the tariff; and that the time is coming when this question will be put on its proper footing. He stated that this bill is the same with the tariff of 1832, with the exception of the high duty on woollens which was conceded last year as a boon from the gentlemen from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Wilkins), and from New Jersey, (Mr. Dickerson), and for which they were then seriously reprehended by those who now take the opposite ground. He thought it extraordinary that gentlemen on the other side had come so near together as they had.

In reference to the enforcing bill, and the remarks made by the senator from South Carolina, he said that he was glad to hear from him that this bill was to be discussed in the south hereafter, instead of the tariff. He rejoiced at this, and would meet the contest with pleasure, for it would be one which could be settled by the cannons of the press, and not the cannons of artillery, when, instead of steel bayonets, steel pens might be the weapons, and the cartouch box would be laid aside for the ballot box. On the question of protection, the bill provided protection for nine years, and then afterwards for protection of 20 per cent. The amount is nothing. If the bill protects to a small amount, it admits the power to protect to a large amount.

Mr. Sprague replied to what had fallen from the last speaker, and expressed his regret that the gentleman from Georgia should make his speech run counter to his vote. He repeated what he had formerly said, that this was a concession from the strong to the weak; and argued that a change had taken place in consequence of the influence of the desire of concession, in the opinion of many who were opposed to any legislative action. If the spirit which ran through the speech of the senator from Georgia was the prevailing spirit in the south, there would have been found in this part of the country a different spirit than that of concession.

Mr. Holmes said he was astonished that any one should speak of consistency in his presence. Every thing he saw or heard convinced him that he was the only consistent man in the senate. The senator from Massachusetts threw charges of inconsistency against South Carolina, and the latter threw them back, and so on and so forth. He was bound to believe them all, as they were all honorable men, and consequently he was bound to believe that they were all inconsistent. He then went into an examination of what had been said pro and con, on the subject of the pledge contained in the bill. In reference to the representative obligation, he was happy to be supported by his friend from Delaware, who had said that he did not view himself as the exclusive representative of Delaware. Now, he did not regard himself as the exclusive representative of his assumed constituents; and when he received some time since instructions from those who, like himself, were merely representatives of others, he thought them entitled to any thing rather than respect. He had answered them, and he believed they were sincerely sorry they had ever passed their resolutions; for what with his answer, and what with their disposition of it, they had managed to make themselves supremely ridiculous. He went on to state that the northern manufacturers would deem themselves sufficiently protected by this bill, and that the possibility was that the next application for protection would be from the south. He then declared that all the legislative efforts which might be brought against the manufacturers would never be found able to put down yankee industry and yankee enterprise.

Mr. Wright then rose, and stated the defects which he found in the bill. He objected to the proposed rate of reduction for the eight years, and to the want of a uniform rule of valuation. He objected to the inequality of the protection given by this bill. His next objection was that while the duty on negro cloth exists, it refuses to impose any duty on the material which enters into that fabric, and which is grown in abundance in this country. He also objected to the system of home valuation, which he deemed to be impracticable, or if practicable, most unequal; and he objected further to the abolition of all specific and discriminating duties, and substituting a mode unjust and oppressive. He would not discuss the question of the power of congress to protect our manufactures by imposing duties on foreign articles, but he thought that this bill did not sufficiently recognize that power. On this point, he quoted the language of the address of the free trade convention which met last year. He expressed his own opinion to be in favor of laying imposts for the purpose of raising sufficient revenue for the wants of the country. So far, he was assured that the power to impose duties, was vested in congress.

His strongest objection to the bill was that it endeavors to bind the action of future congresses. He considered this as a provision which was puerile in itself, and one which would never be considered as binding. He then viewed the circumstances under which congress was called upon to act on this bill, imperfect as it is. He knew that he should be charged with legislating under the influence of his fears. He could not suffer his fears to govern his conclusions. But he would not disregard them. There had been a deep and settled discontent in a certain portion of the country against our legislation, and he could not bring himself to regard that discontent lightly.

Under the expression of that feeling, congress had done what, if they had not done, would have left the union dissolved. The operation of that discontent was against the whole body of laws for the collection of the revenue; and would, if carried on, have destroyed all the means of the government. And without the purse no government could exist. He had therefore come to the question deeply impressed with the conviction, that it was his duty to give his vote to prevent such an evil. He had been long of the opinion that the revenue ought to be reduced. He had also been long impressed with a sense of the inequality of the tariff system. No one had questioned the principle on which this bill was founded; it was only in reference to the details that difference of opinion existed. A part of the country is deeply excited, deeply exasperated; by what means, it was not for him to inquire, but the condition of things was such as to render it uncertain whether the union can exist even until the month of December, unless something shall be done.

Mr. Bibb then stated, that he regarded the bill as a peace offering, so offered and so accepted, for the purpose of conciliation:

"Now is the winter of our discontent

Made glorious summer by this son of"—not Old York, nor New York, but a son of the Old Dominion—from the Slashes of Hanover—he did not care by what hand it was offered, he would willingly take it. He made a few additional observations on the propriety of taking the bill in the spirit in which it was offered.

Mr. Clay then said a few words in reference to this bill and the enforcing bill, both of which he considered that it was necessary to send forth, as well to shew that the laws must be executed, as well as that there is a disposition to make concessions. He stated, that on the subject of the government being a compact, he principally agreed with the senator from South Carolina, but with some difference as to the character of the right conferred by that compact. He did not adopt the opinion that there had been any advance made in the usurpation of powers by the general government. He then went into a view of the history of this system to shew, that twelve or thirteen years ago, there was no opposition raised against the power of congress to protect domestic industry. The opposition on constitutional grounds had subsequently grown up. He then stated, that in his opinion no state could so practically construe the constitution as to nullify the laws of the United States, without plunging the country into all the miseries of anarchy. He said that he adhered to the doctrines of that ablest, wisest, and purest of American statesmen—James Madison—who still lives, and resides in Virginia—the doctrines which were advanced by him in 1799. The answer of that distinguished man to the resolutions of the other states, and his address to the people, effected a sudden revolution of public opinion. The people rallied around him—the alien and sedition laws were repealed—and the usurpations of the general government were arrested. He viewed the government as federative in its origin, in its character, and in its operation, and under the clause of the constitution which gives to congress to pass all laws to carry into effect the granted powers, they could pass all necessary laws. He hoped that the effect of this bill would conciliate all classes and all sections of the union.

He did not arrogate any merit for the passage of this bill. He had cherished this system as a favorite child, and he still clung to it, and should still cling to it. Why had he been reproached? He had come to the child and found it in the hands of the Philistines, who were desirous to destroy it. He wished to save and cherish it, and to find for it better and safer nurses. He did not wish to employ the sword, but to effect his object by concession and conciliation. He wished to see the system placed on a secure basis, to plant it in the bosoms and affections of the people. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, who had learned his views of the system from the senator from South Carolina, had spoken of him as the pilot who was directing the vessel. If it was so, he would ask if she had been secured by a faithful crew? If all had been faithful, he believed there would have been no danger now assailing the system. He assailed no one; he merely defended himself against the reproaches of others.

Another motive with him was to preserve the union. He feared he saw hands uplifted to destroy the system—he saw the union endangered—and in spite of all peril which might assail himself, he had determined to stand forward and attempt the rescue.

He felt himself pained exceedingly in being obliged to separate on the question from valued friends, especially from his friend from Massachusetts, whom he had always respected, and whom he still respected. He then replied to the argument founded on the idea that the protective principle had been abandoned by this bill. He admitted that protection had been better secured by former bills, but there was no surrender by this. He considered revenue the first object, and protection as the second. As to the reduction of the revenue, he was of opinion that there was an error in the calculations of gentlemen. He thought that in the article of silks alone, there would be a considerable reduction. The protection to the mechanic arts was only reduced by the whole operation of the bill to 25 per cent. and he did not know that there would be any just ground for complaint, as some of the mechanic arts now enjoy only 25 per cent.

The argument of the senator from New York was against the bill, but he was happy to find his vote was to be for it. If his argument brought other minds to the same conclusion to which it had brought his, the bill would not be in any danger. He would say, save the country—save the union—and save the American System.

After a few words from Mr. Smith and Mr. Wright, in which the latter said he had so much confidence in the people, as to believe there would not be a worse congress than this.

Mr. Clay made a short rejoinder, in which he reminded the gentleman from New York of the words of a much greater man than any member of congress:—"Confidence is a plant of slow growth," which may be accelerated or retarded by circumstances. The gentleman should not outdo him in prepossessions of confidence in the people.

The question was then taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hill, Holmes, Johnston, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Rives, Robinson, Sprague, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggoner, White, Wright—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Hendricks, Knight, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, Tipton, Webster, Wilkins—16.

So the bill was finally passed.

The senate then took a recess of an hour and a half—(until a quarter past 7 o'clock.)

Evening session. The chair was resumed at half past 7 o'clock, and, until 9 o'clock, the senate was engaged in executive business—after which a great many private or local bills were variously disposed of, generally ordered to a third reading or passed—as will sufficiently appear in the list of acts. [It was hard to keep a quorum together this evening.]

The senate then took up the amendment made by the house of representatives to the bill authorising the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands.

Mr. Clay said that, although the objects to which these proceeds are to be applied, were a favorite point with him, yet as he had found that he was differing on this topic with some of his friends, and as it had been suggested that there might be difficulty in another quarter, if the words struck out by the house were retained, he would move to concur in the amendment.

Mr. Robinson expressed a hope that the question would not be pressed at this late hour, in so thin a senate, when many were absent who are so much interested in the measure. He hoped that the question would not be taken, except in a full senate.

Mr. Clay expressed his regret that, at this late period of the session, the senator from Illinois should wish for delay, which might endanger the passage of the bill. It was not the fault of the members present, that there are so many absentees.

The yeas and nays were then ordered on the motion to concur. Mr. Clay wished to take the question to night, in order that the executive might have time to act upon the bill.

Mr. Chambers said he should vote against the amendment. He would rather vote against the bill, than take it with the amendment.

The question was then taken on the motion to concur, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Black, Buckner, Clay, Clayton, Dndley, Ewing, Foot, Hendricks, Holmes, King, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tomlinson, Tyler, White—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Bibb, Chambers, Grundy, Robinson, Tipton—5.

So the amendment was concurred in.

On motion of Mr. Poindexter, it was Ordered, That when the senate adjourns, it adjourn to meet at 10 o'clock to-morrow.

At 11 o'clock, the senate adjourned—yeas 17, nays 10.

March 2. Many bills were taken up and disposed of, which there is no use in a present recapitulation of. Among other proceedings—

On motion of Mr. King, the senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill authorising the establishment of a pension agency at Decatur, in the state of Alabama.

Mr. Moore moved to amend the bill, so as to read, "one pension agency in the northern part of the state of Alabama," &c.

Mr. Chambers objected to the bill, which he regarded as an effort to remove the public funds from the United States bank. As the charter of the bank will expire in two years, it was scarcely worth while, for that short period, to make the change.

Mr. King disclaimed any intention to charge against the U. States bank that it was not competent to perform its obligations to pay the pensioners. The object of the friends of the bill was to enable the pensioners in Alabama to obtain their pensions without being put to the expense, inconvenience and delay, which are consequent on a journey to the place where the monies are deposited.

Mr. Sprague opposed the bill. He warned the senate against returning to the practice of investing the public funds in local banks, by which the government had already sustained heavy losses. The system established had been found convenient, easy and secure; and there was no reason for departing from it. If this bill passed, Maine would have an equal right to come to congress for a similar agency.

Mr. Ewing moved to lay the bill and amendment on the table. On motion of Mr. Moore, the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and the motion was decided as follows: yeas 20, nays 17.

So the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. Clay then rose, and addressed the chair to the following effect:

Mr. Clay. An incident occurred a few days ago which gave me very great pain, and I am quite sure that in that feeling the whole senate participated.* I allude to some of the observations made by the honorable senator from Mississippi and the honorable senator from Massachusetts near me, with reference to an important bill then pending. I was persuaded at the time those remarks were made, that they were the result of mutual misconception, and were to be attributed solely to that zeal which each of those honorable senators felt—in the position in which they stood towards each other—the one to carry, the other to defeat the measure, with respect to which my friend from Mississippi and myself unfortunately took different views.

The concluding observations of the senator from Mississippi, after having delivered a very able and argumentative speech, one which I need not say to him and the senate embodied all

*Mr. Poindexter had taken occasion to allude to the course of Mr. Webster during the war of 1812, on which he commented with great severity, and compared it with the conduct of Mr. Calhoun. Mr. Webster declined all explanations to the senator from Mississippi. He said that the senator from South Carolina was with him in the house of representatives at the period to which Mr. P. alluded, and if that senator wished any explanation of his course at that time, he would pay the most cheerful and respectful attention to his request. But he did not feel himself called upon to take any notice of the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi. Mr. Poindexter immediately arose and said, "he felt the most perfect contempt for the senator from Massachusetts."

which could be brought to bear on his side of the question, and made me regret that we had lost the benefit of his ability. In concluding his remarks, it did appear to some members of the senate, and to myself, and I have no doubt that it was so felt by the honorable senator from Massachusetts, that there was something personal, and peculiarly harsh in his language. Acting on that supposition the honorable senator from Massachusetts, in the course of his observations, also used language which may have seemed to be unnecessarily harsh. But in the sense which I understood the remarks of the honorable senator from Mississippi, the senator from Massachusetts might have found some justification.

I can perfectly well conceive, however, that the senator from Mississippi was influenced in his course by nothing beyond the ardor of the momentary excitement to which he had yielded himself. I know the respect which he bears, has borne at least, and I am sure, yet bears to the senator from Massachusetts, the personal and friendly intercourse which has always existed between them, and the respect which they bear to each other, and I am perfectly persuaded that the honorable senator from Mississippi, in the remarks with which he concluded his speech, referred solely to the public course—the public measures—of the honorable senator from Massachusetts, and the character of the particular measure under consideration, without intending to reflect on the personal character of the gentleman from Massachusetts. And I am sure, it was not the purpose of the honorable senator from Massachusetts to give any personal bearing to observations which he felt called upon to make. Under these circumstances, I should feel, and I am sure the senate would also feel, great pain, if these two gentlemen, who have been so long a time on a footing of friendship, should be separated by any circumstance attributable to hostile feeling; or, rather to the misunderstanding which has arisen. I am sure, that the senate as well as myself, would be glad that these two gentlemen should still pursue their friendly feelings to each other; and I hope such an explanation will be given as will produce a reconciliation between the two gentlemen, who have so frequently acted in concert together on important subjects, and who entertain towards each other the highest respect. And I do hope that, in some way or other, means will be found to remove this momentary interruption of these gentlemen, and that nothing will occur to disturb, among the members of the senate, that harmony and peace, which I trust will prevail among all the members of this body.

Mr. Poindexter rose and said, that the circumstance which the honorable senator from Kentucky had alluded to, as having passed between him and the honorable senator from Massachusetts, was to him a source of regret. The measure under consideration at the time, was one to which he was strongly opposed, and against which he entered his solemn protest. The honorable senator from Massachusetts had advocated that measure with his usual zeal and ability. In the course of his remarks he alluded to the course of the south in opposition to the American System, and charged upon citizens of that section of the union in general, and more particularly on South Carolina, acts which amount to treason and rebellion, and a disposition to rupture our happy union, and to burn the constitution at the point of the bayonet. Coming, sir, from that quarter of the union, I felt it to be my duty to vindicate it from those aspersions, and to throw back to the honorable senator, as far as I could, a Roland for his Oliver. Believing that the south was right in the position which she has assumed, I felt authorised to allude to the past history of the country, and to the political conduct of the honorable gentleman himself, in illustration of my argument. Perhaps, in the ardor of my feeling, I went too far; and, if so, I deeply regret it. For it was far from my purpose to violate the decorum of debate which has ever characterised this body, or to express myself with harshness towards the honorable senator from Massachusetts. He well knows the respect and kindness which I bear for him; and I assure him that I had no intention to reflect either upon his personal character, or the purity of his political motives. Having said this, I trust I have put myself "rectus in curia" on this subject. It was assuredly far from my intention to trespass on the feelings of the honorable member from Massachusetts.

Mr. Webster. It is not more a matter of regret to the honorable senator from Mississippi than to myself, that any misunderstanding should have occurred between us. Since our acquaintance in this body, we have been on a footing of kindness and courtesy, and there is no gentleman in the senate towards whom I have been less inclined to manifest any warmth, which might be attributed to want of decorum. I certainly thought that the last portion of the honorable senator's remarks had a very strong personal bearing on myself. I certainly thought they were intended to have that effect. I am very happy to hear the honorable gentleman disavow that he intended to give them such a bearing. I respond entirely to the declaration that there has been between us, always, kindness and a good understanding. There are incidents connected with our relative situations towards each other which would make it extremely unpleasant that any thing should occur which could disturb the good understanding which ought to exist between honorable members. I therefore entirely disavow any intention to offer any personal disrespect towards him, in my answer to the remarks which he made towards me.

Mr. Poindexter then rose and said: The disclaimer made by the gentleman from Massachusetts calls for further explanation from me. In reply to what I deemed a personal affront, towards myself, from the honorable senator, I used expressions which, if such was not intended, might appear harsh, and a violation of the respect which ought to be preserved between members of this honorable body. Finding from the explanation which has been given by the honorable senator, that his purpose was not to offer me any personal insult, or to wound my sensibility as an individual, I take this occasion voluntarily, and with great pleasure, to retract the offensive expressions, hastily used, under the impulse of the moment; and I tender my hand to the honorable senator with perfect freedom and cordiality.

Evening session. A private bill being passed—
On motion of Mr. Dudley, the senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

When the doors were re-opened, Mr. Clay was found speaking. He was engaged in expressing his approbation of the conduct of the president pro tem. of this body. The present, he said, had been a very arduous session. He should not have voted for the present presiding officer, had he been present when he was elected; nor did he mean to say what would be his vote, if the election were now to be made. But he gave with great pleasure, his testimony in favor of the faithful and able and impartial manner in which that officer had performed his duty. He concluded with asking leave to present the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of the senate be presented to the hon. Hugh L. White, for the dignity, ability, and impartiality, with which he has discharged the duties of president pro tempore of the senate.

The resolution was then considered, and unanimously adopted.

Late in the course of the evening—

Mr. Poindexter moved that when the senate adjourns, it adjourn to meet at 10 o'clock to-morrow; and asked for the yeas and nays, which were taken as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bibb, Black, Buckner, Clay, Dickerson, Holmes, Johnston, Moore, Poindexter, Robbins, Tyler, Waggoner, 12.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Chambers, Dallas, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, Knight, Naudain, Robinson, Rogers, Seymour, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, Wilkins, Wright, White, 23.

In the course of the evening—

A bill from the house of representatives for making appropriations for building light houses, &c. was read a first time, and on the question that it be now read a second time,

Mr. Grundy objected; and the motion requiring by rule the unanimous consent of the senate, the bill was of course rejected.

On motion of Mr. Foot, the resolution offered by him some days ago, calling upon the secretary of war to furnish a plan for equalising the pay of the army, was taken up and agreed to.

The chair communicated a message from the president of the United States, communicating information respecting the consular establishments of the U. States; which was ordered to be printed.

The senate spent about three hours in the consideration of executive business.

Several attempts were made to induce the senate to take up the bill for the relief of the heirs of Matthew Lyon, but the senate refused to consider it.

About half past 4 o'clock, a committee on the part of the senate was appointed to join such committee as the house might appoint, to wait on the president, and inform him that the two houses were ready to adjourn.

The house having appointed a committee, the joint committee waited on the president, and returned with an answer that he had no further communication to make; whereupon,

Mr. King moved that the senate then adjourn, sine die.

Mr. White, (president pro tem.) then rose and addressed the senate to the following effect:

Before the presiding officer leaves the chair, he is desirous of saying a few words.

We met under circumstances calculated to induce us to believe that matters of high excitement would arise during our sojourn here. It was by the will of the majority of this body that I was placed in this chair, to preside over your deliberations. I looked upon the high honor thus conferred to be but temporary; for could I then have foreseen that I was to act in this capacity till now, most certainly my distrust of my experience would have induced me to shrink from undertaking the task. The duties of the chair are at all times arduous, but the more particularly so, when topics of high interest and importance are under discussion. My experience, however, has convinced me that even under these circumstances, the presiding officer may have a pleasant task to perform, when every member submits himself to be guided by the rules of this body, instead of having a law for himself.

I take pleasure in stating that during the whole course of the session, no act has been done by any one member, and no single expression has reached my ear, calculated to give pain to the presiding officer. If, in the discharge of the duties confided to me, I have had the misfortune to injure or to wound the feelings of any individual, I trust he will do me the justice to believe that it has happened without any intention on my part. I have endeavored to act impartially towards every member of this body; and I would have them to bear in mind, that if, during the arduous duties I have had to perform, and amidst all the excitements that have existed, any thing like order has been preserved, it must be attributed more to the kindness and courtesy of senators towards the presiding officer, than to the capacity which he was able to bring to the duties assigned him. It is not probable, in the course of human events, that we can all ever assemble in this chamber again. I shall, after putting the question, take a farewell of all who are here present; and I feel regret that I cannot exchange good wishes with those who are absent; hoping that it may be our good fortune all to meet again.

The president then put the question on adjournment; which was carried nemine dissentiente.

The senate then, at 5 o'clock, [A. M.] adjourned sine die.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Proceedings of Thursday Feb. 28, continued—Evening session.
Among various senate bills which received their first reading, the house took up a joint resolution from the senate, suspending the rule which forbids the sending of bills from one house to the other on the three last days of the session, so far as to allow them to be sent on Friday and Saturday.

Mr. Adams moved to amend it by extending the suspension also to the rule which prohibits bills to be sent to the president on the last day.

Mr. Wickliffe wished to limit the effect of the suspension to the ordinary appropriation bills only.

After a desultory conversation, in which Messrs. Adams, Taylor, Wickliffe and Ellsworth, took part, the amendment was made specific, by enumerating certain bills to be excepted.

Mr. Hoffman supported the amendments of Mr. Wickliffe, and protested against consuming the morning of Sunday in legislation.

Mr. Irvin hoped the land bill would be included, and Mr. Newton, the light house bill.

Mr. Davis, of Mass. Mr. Cambreleng, and Mr. Adams, opposed the limitation proposed by Mr. Wickliffe.

Mr. Patton moved to lay the whole subject on the table; but this was negatived.

Mr. Wickliffe's amendment was then rejected, and that proposed by Mr. Adams was agreed to.
Mr. Wickliffe then proposed that both houses be adjourned by the presiding officers thereof, on Saturday night, at 12 o'clock.

Mr. Stewart moved the previous question on this motion, which was seconded—yeas 69, nays 40.

The joint resolution, as amended, was then ordered to be read a third time.

The house then resumed the orders of the day, being the bill further providing for the collection of the revenue; when

Mr. Wayne, of Georgia, took the floor, and continued to occupy it in a speech in support of the bill, and in reply to Mr. McDuffie's argument of the morning.

Mr. Foster, of Georgia, succeeded, and spoke with very great force and animation, in opposition to the bill.

Mr. Daniel, of Kentucky, next addressed the house, and did not resume his seat until a quarter before twelve o'clock; when

Mr. Craig, of Virginia, after some previous remarks, demanded the previous question; but withdrew his motion at the request of Mr. Carson, of N. C. who, under a promise to renew the motion, made an explanation in reference to something which had been said by Mr. Daniel. He then, according to promise, renewed the motion for the previous question.

Mr. Lewis moved an adjournment. The motion was negatived.

Mr. Clayton wished Mr. Craig to withdraw his motion for the previous question, to allow him to explain; but Mr. Craig declining to do so,

Mr. Wickliffe said he had an amendment or two to offer. He was called to order, as the motion for the previous question was not debatable.

The demand for the previous question was seconded—yeas 103.

The previous question was then put, as follows: "Shall the main question now be put?"

A call of the house was moved, but negatived.

The previous question was then carried by yeas and nays, as follows—yeas 110, nays 44.

So the house determined that the main question should now be put.

The main question was accordingly put—"Shall the bill be ordered to be engrossed and read a third time?" and determined as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Chilton, Allan, H. Allen, Anderson, Appleton, Ashley, Banks, N. Barber, Barringer, Barstow, I. C. Bates, James Bates, Beardsley, Bell, Bergen, James Blair, John Blair, Boon, Bouck, Briggs, J. Brodhead, J. C. Brodhead, Bucher, Bullard, Cambreleng, Carr, Chandler, E. Cooke, B. Cooke, Corwin, Craig, Crane, Crawford, Creighton, J. Davis, Dayan, Dearborn, Denny, Dickson, Donbleday, Draper, Geo. Evans, Joshua Evans, Edward Everett, Horace Everett, Findlay, Fitzgerald, Ford, Grennell, William Hall, Hiland Hall, Harper, Hawkins, Heister, Hodges, Hoffman, Hogan, Holland, Horn, Howard, Hubbard, Huntington, Ilrie, Irvin, Isaacs, Jarvis, Richard M. Johnson, Joseph Johnson, Kavanagh, Kendall, Kennon, J. King, Henry King, Lansing, Leavitt, Leecompte, Letcher, Lyon, Mann, Marshall, Maxwell, Wm. McCoy, McIntire, McKay, McKenken, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Muhlenburg, Nelson, Newton, Pearce, Pendleton, Pierson, Pitcher, Polk, Potts, J. Reed, E. C. Reed, Russell, Sewell, Slade, Smith, Southard, Speight, Standifer, Stephens, Stewart, Storrs, Sutherland, Taylor, F. Thomas, P. Thomas, John Thomson, Tompkins, Tracy, Verplanck, Ward, Wardwell, Watmough, Wayne, Wilkin, Elisha Whittlesey, Camp. P. White, Edward D. White, Worthington, Young—126.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, R. Allen, Archer, Arnold, Barnwell, Bouldin, Carson, Chinn, Claiborne, Clayton, Coke, Comor, Coulter, Daniel, Davenport, W. R. Davis, Felder, Foster, Gordon, Griffin, Thomas H. Hall, Lewis, Mason, Robert McCoy, Newnan, Nuckolls, Patton, Plummer, Roane, Root, W. Thompson, Wheeler, Wickliffe—33.

Mr. Bell moved that the bill have its third reading now.

Mr. Carson remonstrated, and proposed to-morrow.

Mr. Lewis demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. Gordon opposed the third reading at this time, on account of the absence of many gentlemen who wished to record their names against it. He wished, himself, to offer some remarks upon the bill.

Mr. Davis, of S. C. said he had been anxious to have addressed the house, and would, if it were the wish of the house, occupy about twenty minutes. But he could not ask it. Were he a mere demagogue, he would wish no greater advantage than to have the bill thus driven through the house.

Mr. Foster moved an adjournment; but withdrew his motion.

Mr. Ward said a few words, proposing a course to be adopted.

Mr. Wickliffe said he never had known the previous question called on a bill which had never been read, either in the house or in committee.

Mr. Leitcher remonstrated against proceeding at this time, as the bill was completely in the power of the house, and its passage could not be prevented.

Mr. Coulter hoped those opposed to the bill would commit it into the hands of the majority. It was plain that the bill must pass. He should have liked to address a few remarks to the house—but he was not solicitous on the subject—because there was another way of reaching the public than by speeches in that house.

Mr. Carson said he should resign the bill to the majority.

Mr. Polk thought it would be better to delay the third reading of the bill until the house was fuller.

Mr. Bouldin said there could be no need to postpone, unless those opposed to the bill could be heard. He had no other word to say, whether the bill pass to-night or to-morrow: it was the same thing to the part of the country he represented; but he ought to be allowed to declare their sentiments before it became a law.

Mr. Beardsley pressed the question to-night: the house had no time to hear further debate.

Mr. Craig said he was conscientious in voting for the bill; but he should do so without knowing how his constituents viewed it.

Mr. Lyon thought it would be better to read the bill now; and he would, in the morning, move the previous question; when all would record their votes.

Mr. Coke said the indications of the will of the house that the bill should pass without hearing the views of the minority were so decided that he should not oppose it: but he should prefer delivering his views.

Mr. Polk inquired whether, if the bill should be ordered to the third reading, and then the previous question should be called, the bill would be the first order in the morning?

The chair replied in the affirmative.

Mr. Foster moved an adjournment: which was negatived without a count.

The question was at length put on deferring the reading of the bill until to-morrow, and decided in the negative, without a count.

The question was thereupon put, on reading the bill now.

Mr. Beardsley moved the previous question: and it was seconded.

Mr. Foster asked the yeas and nays.

Mr. Wickliffe inquired whether the speaker could recognize the motion for the previous question as in order, before the bill had ever been read at all?

The speaker referred to the journal to prove that the bill had been twice read.

The chair then inquired whether any member wished the reading of the bill? if they did it should be read.

Mr. Wickliffe again made his question of order, and insisted that the previous question could not have been in order till the bill had been read through, as the house had ordered.

The chair decided that the bill must first be read. It was then read through at the clerk's table.

[It was now one o'clock in the morning.]

The question being propounded on the passage of the bill.

Mr. Beardsley moved the previous question—it was seconded, put and carried by yeas and nays, as follows: yeas 111, nays 40.

The house then adjourned at about half past one.

Friday, March 1. After some minor business—

Mr. Verplanck, under instruction from the committee of ways and means, made the following report:

The committee of ways and means report: That, among the subjects referred to the committee of ways and means, at an early period of the session, were the transactions of the bank of the United States, in relation to the payment of a portion of the public debt; and the inquiry into the present pecuniary and financial state and management of the institution.

The arrangement made by the bank for a temporary postponement, with the consent of the holders, of the payment of five millions of the three per cent. debt, being now substantially closed by the surrender to the government of the certificates of stock, except for a small amount, and the whole debt itself having been liquidated, so far as respects the government, at an earlier period than it is probable it would otherwise have been, this question seems no longer to present any important or practical object of inquiry, or to call for or admit any action of congress upon it.

The committee have examined several of the directors on this subject, as well as upon other points connected with the management of the institution. Their testimony is herewith submitted, and the committee specially refer to the evidence of Mr. Bevan and Mr. Eyre as explanatory of the history and motives of this transaction.

It is due, however, to the government to express the opinion, that, in the arrangement made by the bank agent in England for the purchase of the three per cent. stock, and the detention of the certificates (which measures were afterwards disclaimed by the bank), the bank exceeded its legitimate authority, and that this proceeding had no sufficient warrant in the correspondence of the secretary of the treasury.

The inquiry into the present condition of the bank, the general character of its business, and the soundness of its capital, is a subject of much greater interest and importance, since it involves not only the question of the safety of the public deposits, but the value of the large amount of stock held by government, and the still more momentous considerations of the soundness of a large portion of our currency, and the consequent security or insecurity of the domestic exchanges and commerce of the country.

The president, in his message to congress, at the opening of the present session, informed them, "that such measures as were within the reach of the secretary of the treasury had been taken to enable him to judge whether the public deposits in the bank of the United States were entirely safe; but, as his limited power might prove insufficient to that object," the president recommended the subject to congress, as particularly worthy of their investigation.

Since that period, the report of the agent appointed by government for this examination, has been communicated to congress, and referred to this committee. The committee of ways and means have also received from the directors of the bank a report on the principal points of its administration and its present state, prepared by the exchange committee of the bank, and adopted by the board of directors.

The importance of the statements and results, contained in that report, induced the committee of ways and means, in the course of the examination of the directors composing the exchange committee, to require their attestation, under oath, to the facts and statements of that paper, as distinguished from its opinions and arguments. This was done very fully. The same, and other directors, (two of whom had heretofore been government directors, one under the present, and one under two former administrations), in reply to various interrogatories, stated, as will be seen in the evidence herewith submitted, the means at the command of the board of directors, or any member of it, for distinctly knowing the operations of the several branches, and the character of the paper discounted at them, together with their own opinion, drawn from these sources, of the general safety of such paper.

The committee of ways and means have to regret that the constant and daily pressure of the various duties which have devolved upon them, during this short and laborious session, did not permit a more full examination into the concerns of the institution. If, however, in the entire absence of any evidence calculated to refute, or in any way, impeach, that which is before the committee, the statements and opinions of the treasury agent, selected by the treasury to examine the condition of the bank; those of several of the present directors, men of character and intelligence, long conversant with accounts and banking business; the official returns of the bank itself, and the report of its principal committee, attested to under oath; if all these can be relied upon, as furnishing satisfactory information on the present state and pecuniary means of the institution, the following results will appear:

First. The directors of the bank at Philadelphia receive from the boards of their branches frequent, regular and minute returns of the paper discounted by them. These returns, together with the separate correspondence of the cashiers of the several branches, afford such information of the business of those branches as to enable the board of the mother bank, or any single director who may wish to inquire into it, to ascertain the character of the business of those branches: as, for instance, whether the mass of paper discounted be founded on ordinary commercial transactions, and to be paid from their proceeds when at maturity, or whether any considerable proportion of it consists of what is called accommodation paper, regularly renewed. They can know, in like manner, whether the domestic bills of exchange, purchased at the branches, arise out of business transactions, and to be paid when at maturity, or whether they are mere accommodation paper in another form, to be repeatedly renewed by drawing and re-drawing between distant offices.

Second. These returns together with the reports of the boards of the several branches, upon whose character and judgment they place great reliance, form the ground upon which the directors have stated, under oath, their full confidence that the mass of paper discounted by the bank and its branches, and detailed as active debt in their statement, is safe. On this, they believe, no serious loss need be apprehended. The dishonored paper held by the bank is stated to be returned as doubtful or suspended paper, and to be estimated, not at its nominal, but at its presumed actual value. The real estate of the bank is, in like manner, valued, not at cost, but on estimates founded on frequently renewed appraisals of the probable market value. They depose that, to the best of their knowledge and belief, the whole amount, with inconsiderable exceptions, if any, of domestic bills of exchange purchased by the bank and its offices, is regular business paper, founded upon the agricultural exports and commercial imports of the country; and that by far the greatest portion (probably nine-tenths) of the notes discounted is of the same character. They also assert, with much confidence, that most of their accommodation notes are well secured, and form, in fact, the safest investment of the bank.

The inquiries respecting the amount of accommodation paper were made to ascertain the character of the general business transactions of the bank; and not because the committee believed that accommodation paper, discounted to a great extent, would necessarily endanger the solidity of any moneyed institution. Such paper may frequently be as safe, and such loans as useful, as any. But it is certain, that, when moneyed institutions are in a hollow and unsound state, it commonly arises from the capital having been invested in doubtful paper of this description. The very fact, therefore, of the discounts of a bank being principally applied to the ordinary business paper of an active commercial community, will show, that, allowing for only ordinary judgment and integrity in the selection of such paper, nothing short of some general overthrow of mercantile credit will produce material loss.

Third. In general corroboration of their statements on this point, as well as of their opinions of the security of the bank debt, the directors appeal, 1st, to the fact of the great fluctuation of the exchange business, at the same points, at different periods, corresponding with the periods of the shipments of agricultural produce in the west; as, for instance, at Nashville, within three months in 1831, from $366,000 to $1,063,000. And again, at the same place, in 1832, within about half a year, from $2,760,000 down to $503,000. 2d, That of the easy reduction, during the last year, of about one-eighth of the whole amount of the bank debt throughout the union, and specially to the amount reduced in the western offices. 3d, To the very small amount of losses which have occurred for some time past in those offices, and to the facility with which, in addition to the aggregate reduction of loans there, a very considerable proportion of the local debt, on promissory notes, has been converted into the more secure and manageable form of domestic bills of exchange.

If these statements, and this evidence, can be relied upon, the available and secure resources of the bank amounted, on the first of January last, to eighty million eight hundred and sixty-five thousand dollars, whilst all the claims against it, for bills, debts and deposits, including those of the government, and for the redemption of the public debt, were but $37,800,000, leaving above forty-three millions as a guarantee to the nation against any losses. For as the whole amount of debts, bills and deposits must be paid before the stockholders, the whole capital and the surplus must be considered as a pledge for the debts due to individuals and the government. As the capital consists of thirty-five millions of dollars, it would appear, from this statement, that the bank had earned, and then possessed, a surplus of twenty-two per cent. above the amount of its capital. Whether that surplus could or could not be realised, at a final winding up of the bank, is a subject only interesting to the buyers, sellers, and holders of stock. The single point of view in which it is important to the nation, is in regard to its bearing on the healthy state of the bank, and the consequent safety of the public deposits, and the sound state of the currency. For those objects, it is sufficient to inquire, whether this surplus does or does not afford a sufficient guarantee that the original capital of $35,000,000 is unimpaired.

The whole amount of bills and paper held by the bank, on the 1st January last, was $61,635,000; of which $3,246,000 is stated to be the local debt of the western states, leaving $58,389,000 as the debt of the Atlantic commercial cities, and that in the shape of domestic bills, between them and the interior. There seems no reason to doubt that the paper of the description last mentioned, is of the same general character as that of other city banks, managed with ordinary discretion. Now, it is well known, that, in our great cities, business paper is constantly guaranteed by commercial houses of prudence, stability and wealth, for a del credere commission of two and a half per cent. On much of the better class of paper, and in some of our northern cities, upon most of it, the ordinary charge is much less; but a greater proportion of loss than this ought certainly not to occur in a well managed city bank, where the judgment and information of a board of directors is combined with that of its officers. In point of fact, it is believed that two and a half per cent. on their discounted paper actually exceeds the losses of prudently managed institutions in our cities. But, allowing the loss on the Atlantic and commercial debt, to reach four times that amount, say ten per cent. then $5,370,000 of the surplus, would be an ample guarantee against such loss. This would leave $2,680,000 as a surplus, which would meet the loss of about one-third of the local western debt, without impairing the original capital of the bank.

The committee do not mean to be understood as asserting their belief that the western debt is more hazardous than that in any other part of the union. The bank directors express their conviction that it is not so; and the agent appointed by the treasury does not hesitate to say, "that he considers that debt in a safe and wholesome state, and that a greater amount of loss need not be apprehended from it, than from a similar mass distributed in the cities of the Atlantic frontier." But this estimate has been made, because the extent of the western transactions of the bank has been mentioned as one of the subjects peculiarly calling for investigation.

These general views of the situation of the bank, and the consequent safety of its depositors and bill holders derive strong confirmation from the fact of the large proportion of the specie in the country which is held by the bank. It appears from official documents of unquestionable authority, that the specie, actually in the vaults of the bank of the United States, is within one-tenth of the amount held by all the other banks in the union, whilst its circulation of paper is but one-fourth of the aggregate of theirs. In other words; the bank of the United States has above nine millions of specie, with a circulation of notes to the amount of seventeen millions and a half, whilst the aggregate of all the other banks, with specie in their vaults, but a little above ten millions, have a circulation of sixty-eight millions of bank paper.

If, then, the evidence herewith submitted, can be relied upon, which it is for the house to judge of, there can be no doubt of the entire soundness of the whole bank capital, after meeting all demands upon it, either by its bill holders or the government; and such is the opinion of the committee, who feel great confidence in the well known character and intelligence of the directors whose testimony supports the facts above stated.

The committee conclude by respectfully recommending the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the government deposits may, in the opinion of the house, be safely continued in the bank of the United States."

The report was accompanied by sundry documents.

Mr. Walmough moved the printing of 10,000 extra copies of the report and documents; which was agreed to, (Mr. Horn, who had objected to the motion, having withdrawn his objection).

Mr. Polk then made a report from the minority (three members) of the committee, of which the same number was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Daniel, from the select committee to which was referred so much of the president's message as related to the exercise of doubtful powers, made a verbal report, stating that there was not a single point on which the committee could agree; and he had therefore been directed to move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; which was, after some jocular conversation, agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion heretofore made, to print the report from the minority of the committee on manufactures.

Mr. Adams said that he should have been glad to have made some reply to the remarks of Mr. Hoffman, merely to satisfy the house that there had been no unfairness on the part of the minority. The report was not a speech, as the gentlemen had intimated, but a report, signed by those members who had agreed to it. But on account of the preciousness of time, he should be content with having the question taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. Hoffman concurred. He had merely meant to say that the paper, though in the form of a report, was, in fact, little different from a speech.

Mr. Barlow said that though there was scarcely a position in the report to which he agreed, he hoped it would be printed.

The yeas and nays were then taken, and the printing was ordered—yeas 93, nays 53.

The bill from the senate further to provide for the collection of the duties on imports came up on its final passage, (the previous question thereon having been last night ordered).

The question was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Chilton Allan, Herman Allen, Allison, Anderson, Appleton, Armstrong, Ashley, Banks, Noyes Barber, Barringer, Barstow, Isaac C. Bates, Jas. Bates, Beardsley, Bell, Bergen, Bethune, James Blair, John Blair, Bouck, Briggs, John Brodhead, John C. Brodhead, Bucher, Bullard, Burd, Burges, Cahoon, Cambreleng, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Collier, Eleutheros Cooke, Bates Cooke, Corwin, Craig, Crane, Crawford, Creighton, John Davis, Dearborn, Denny, Dewart, Dickson, Doubleday, Drayton, Draper, Ellsworth, Geo. Evans, Josiah Evans, Edward Everett, Horace Everett, Findlay, Fitzgerald, Ford, Glinore, Grennell, William Hall, Hiland Hall, Harper, Hawkins, Heister, Hodges, Hoffman, Hogan, Holland, Horn, Howard, Hubbard, Huntington, Irie, Ingersoll, Irvin, Isacks, Jarvis, Jenifer, Richard M. Johnson, Joseph Johnson, Kavanagh, Kendalls, Adam King, John King, Henry King, Kerr, Lansing, Leavitt, Lecompte, Letcher, Lyon, Mann, Marshall, Maxwell, McCarty, William McCoy, McIntire, McKay, McKean, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Muhlenburg, Nelson, Newton Pearce, Pendleton, Pierson, Pitcher, Polk, Potts, Randolph, John Reed, Edward C. Reed, Russell, Semmes, Sewall, Wm. B. Shepard, Aug. H. Shepperd, Slade, Smith, Soule, Speight, Standifer, Stephens, Stewart, Sutherland, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Philcom Thomas, John Thomson, Tompkins, Tracy, Verplanck, Vinton, Ward, Wardwell, Washington, Walmough, Wayne, Wilkin, Elisha Whittlesey, Fredrick Whittlesey, Camp. P. White, Edward D. White, Williams, Worthington, Young—149.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Robert Allen, Archer, Arnold, Babcock, John S. Barbour, Barnwell, Bouldin, Carson, Chinn, Claiborne, Clay, Clayton, Coke, Conner, Cooper, Coulter, Daniel, Davenport, Warren R. Davis, Felder, Foster, Gaither, Gordon, Griffin, Thomas H. Hall, Hawes, Hughes, Cave Johnson, Lamar, Lewis, Mardis, Mason, McDuffie, Newnan, Nuckolls, Patton, Plummer, Rencher, Roane, Root, Stanberry, W. Thompson, Weeks, Wheeler, Wickliffe, Wilde—48.

So the bill was finally passed.

The question being on its title,

Mr. McDuffie said that he rose to perform a solemn duty. The house was about to destroy the rights of the states—was about to bury the constitution: he asked the poor privilege of writing its epitaph. He then offered an amendment to the title of the bill, by striking out its present title, and inserting the following in lieu thereof:—"An act to subvert the sovereignty of the states of this union, to establish a consolidated government, without limitation of powers, and to make the civil subordinate to the military power."

Mr. Wayne moved to lay the amendment upon the table.

The chair said the motion was not in order.

Mr. Speight demanded the previous question, and the call was seconded by the house.

The yeas and nays were thereupon ordered, and being taken, stood as follows: yeas 150, nays 35.

So the house determined that the main question should now be put.

[The main question was on agreeing to the title of the bill as it came from the senate, Mr. McDuffie's proposed amendment having been cut off by the affirmative vote upon the previous question.]

The question was accordingly put and carried; and, in the same shape in which it passed the senate, the bill was returned to that body.

The speaker then proceeded to call the orders of the day; and the bill concerning the Virginia military land warrants being reached, Mr. Russel withdrew the amendment he offered thereto some days ago, and the bill was ordered to a third reading.

The bill to establish the territory of Wisconsin, and the bill authorising a subscription to an edition of the laws of the United States, were severally ordered to lie on the table.

Among the business attended to was the following:

Mr. Wickliffe, from the committee on the public lands, reported the following resolution, which was read and agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the clerk of this house continue the compilation of the land laws from the year 1827, to the end of the present session of congress, in conformity with the resolutions of 1st March, 1826, and 6th February, 1827.

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting an abstract of the official enrolments and expenditures for the year 1832, of the officers of the customs; which letter and abstract were laid on the table.

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting a report of the director of the mint of the assays of foreign coins in the year 1832; which letter and report were laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. C. P. White,

Resolved, That the director of the mint of the United States be requested to communicate to this house at the commencement of the next session of congress, such amendment to the existing laws, governing and regulating the mint, as he may deem necessary to the efficiency of that institution.

Mr. Boon submitted the following resolution, which was read and laid on the table, viz:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to this house, as early as practicable, the amount of T. Canby's defalcation on his first bond, as receiver of public monies at Crawfordsville, Indiana, at the time of his entering into a second bond as receiver, and also the amount of money received by said Canby, after the date of the order for his removal from office.

Resolved, further, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to this house, whether said Canby, late receiver as aforesaid, has not entered lands to a considerable amount, in his own name and that of others, with the public monies by him received; which lands yet remain unpatented; the purchase money of which go to swell the amount of his defalcation, now in progress of collection against his securities.

All the succeeding orders of the day were then, by successive motions by Mr. Wickliffe, postponed to to-morrow, until the land bill was reached; when, on motion of Mr. W.

The house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, the speaker calling Mr. Polk to the chair.

Mr. Verplanck moved that the committee take up some appropriation bills, but the motion was negative; and then, by a decisive majority, took up the bill, from the senate to distribute the proceeds of the public lands, in committee of the whole.

An amendment was offered by Mr. Duncan to set apart 20 per cent. of the value of the public land in certain of the new states, before the division of the proceeds should be made, instead of 12½ per cent. as in the bill. But it was negative.

Mr. Duncan moved an amendment, proposing to fix the minimum price of the public lands at one dollar. But it was rejected without a count.

Mr. Wickliffe moved to amend the second section thereof, by striking out the words which restrict the application of the funds accruing to the several states to three specified objects, (internal improvement, education and colonization), and to leave it to the states to apply the funds in such manner as the legislatures thereof shall direct.

The amendment was adopted, without a count.

Mr. Wickliffe also added a proviso postponing the effect of the bill, until the public debt should have been paid.

This was adopted, yeas 67, nays 42.

Mr. Plummer proposed to amend the bill so as to require the expense of surveys and sales of the public lands to be first deducted, before the distribution should be made among the states. He made a short speech in support of this motion, and

The question being put, it was negative.

Mr. White, of Florida, moved to amend to the bill, so as to include Florida in the distribution of the land; but it was negatively without a count.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, moved to amend the bill so as to allow the location of the granted lands in tracts of 80 acres, instead of 320 acres, as proposed in the bill.

In support of this motion, Mr. Plummer addressed the house for some time; but the motion was negative.

Mr. Clay then moved to amend the bill, by striking out the whole bill after the enacting clause, and inserting in lieu thereof two sections, which he read.

[His amendment went to graduate the price of the lands, diminishing it in proportion to the time they had been in market, and remained unsold.]

Mr. Speight now moved a recess, but the motion was negatively—yeas 29, nays 86.

Mr. Clay then commenced a speech, in explanation and support of the plan he had proposed. Having proceeded about an hour, he gave way to

Mr. Mardis, who moved a recess. The motion was again negatively—yeas 11, nays 97.

Mr. Clay resumed, and having again proceeded for some time, yielded the floor to

Mr. Duncan, who proposed that the bill be for the present laid aside. But the committee was manifestly averse to doing so, and some confusion arising,

Mr. Duncan withdrew his motion; and

Mr. Clay proceeded, and having concluded,

Mr. Mardis obtained the floor, and addressed the committee for about an hour in opposition to the bill, and in favor of the amendment proposed by Mr. Clay.

Mr. Plummer next obtained the floor; and held it until 10 o'clock, in a speech directed against the bill, and in support of the amendment. Repeated attempts were made to induce him to resume his seat, and the house was frequently in a state of extreme confusion and disorder.

Mr. Polk, who was in the chair, earnestly remonstrated, and implored the house to be mindful of its own dignity, and however anxious they might be to act upon the bill, to respect the constitutional right of the member from Mississippi to be heard.

Mr. Plummer said that when he rose, he had been prepared for interruption and insult; but should not be intimidated from the discharge of his duty.

Mr. Root called Mr. Plummer to order, as having reflected in an offensive manner upon the house.

The chair, however, pronounced him to be in order, inasmuch as he had not said that the insult to which he alluded was intended or offered by the members of the house.

Mr. Plummer having at length concluded his remarks, the question was taken on Mr. Clay's amendment, which was rejected without a count.

Mr. Clay offered it again as an additional section to the bill. It was again negative.

Mr. Mason, of Virginia, moved an amendment, the effect of which would be, that the whole expense of survey and sale of the land, and of the salaries of all officers connected therewith, including the expense of the general land-office, should be deducted before the proceeds of the land should be distributed. The amendment was also rejected; when

On motion of Mr. Wickliffe, the committee rose, and reported the bill and amendments to the house.

In the house, the amendments were read, and concurred in, with the exception of Mr. Wickliffe's proviso, which he, himself, after examination, thought ought not to be adopted, inasmuch as the contingency for which he had intended it, would not exist.

Mr. Mason again pressed the amendment he had offered in committee.

It was supported by Mr. Lewis, and opposed by Mr. Wickliffe; when

Mr. Stewart demanded the previous question, (which cuts off all pending amendments).

The demand being seconded, Mr. Mason called for the yeas and nays.

They were ordered, and the previous question was thereupon put, and carried—yeas 91, nays 46.

The main question on ordering the bill to its third reading was then agreed to.

The bill was read a third time, and the question being on its passage, it was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, C. Allen, Heman Allan, Arnold, Babcock, Banks, Noyes Barber, J. S. Barbour, Barring, Barstow, Beardsley, Briggs, Bucher, Bullard, Burd, Eluthors, Cooke, Bates Cooke, Cooper, Corwin, Coulter, Crane, Crawford, Creighton, Daniel, J. Davis, Dearborn, Denny, Dewart, Dickson, Ellsworth, George Evans, Joshua Evans, Edward

Everett, Horace Everett, Gilmore, Grennell, Hiland Hall, Helster, Hodges, Hogan, Hughes, Huntington, Inne, Irvin, Jonifer, J. Johnson, Kavanagh, Kendall, Kennon, Adam King, Henry King, Kerr, Leavitt, Letcher, Marshall, Maxwell, McCarty, Robt. McCoy, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Muhlenburg, Nelson, Newton, Pearce, Pendleton, Pierson, Fitcher, Potts, Randolph, John Reed, Root, Russell, Aug. H. Shepperd, Slade, Smith, Southard, Stanberry, Stewart, Sutherland, Taylor, Philmon Thomas, John Thompson, Tompkins, Verplanck, Vinton, Wardwell, Washington, Watnough, Wilkin, Elisha Whittelsey, Fred'k Whittelsey, Edward D. White, Wickliffe, Williams—96.

YAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Archer, Ashley, Barnwell, Bethune, John Blair, Boon, Cambreleng, Carr, Chinn, Claiborne, Clay, Coke, Daucan, Felder, Gordon, Griffin, William Hall, Hawkins, Horn, Isaacs, Jarvis, Richard M. Johnson, Lecompte, Lewis, Lyon, Mardis, Mason, Wm. McCoy, McIntire, McKay, Plummer, Roane, Sewall, Staudifer, Wiley Thompson, Ward, Camp. P. White, Worthington—40.

So the bill was passed, and returned to the senate.

[It was now near 11 o'clock; when]

On motion of Mr. Verplanck, the house went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, Mr. Taylor in the chair, and took up the harbor bill.

[Making appropriations for carrying on certain works heretofore commenced for the improvement of harbors and rivers, and also for continuing and repairing the Cumberland road and certain territorial roads.]

Mr. Coke moved that the committee rise, believing the house to be too much exhausted to proceed.

The motion was promptly negatived, and the committee proceeded to read and amend the bill.

The most important of the amendments were an item of $25,000 for the continuation of surveys under the act of 1824, and $31,000 for the repairs of the Cumberland road in Virginia.

Various attempts were made to insert provisions in this bill for new surveys, and the commencement of new works, but they were all promptly rejected.

The bill was then laid aside, and the committee took up the general appropriation bill, for the expenses of government for the year 1833.

On motion of Mr. Everett, the items were added to provide for arranging the papers in the state department, and making an index to the whole of them. Also for completing the publication of the diplomatic correspondence, and the printing of the last census.

On the subject of the expenses of the general land office, Mr. Wickliffe said that the committee on the public lands had not been able for want of time to complete the investigation of the concerns of that department. But from the progress they had made in it, he was fully convinced that the commissioner had made an improper application of the funds placed in his hands.

Mr. Verplanck proposed an item to cover certain arrearages which had improperly accrued in the land office. He did it with great reluctance, and merely because the United States must of course pay debts contracted by its authority. But the expenditure had the decided disapprobation of the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Wickliffe concurred in this sentiment, and hoped that this instance might prove a warning to all subordinate officers in the government, against exceeding the limit of the expenses they were authorised to incur.

A good deal of discussion was had in respect to extra clerks in that department, and the great amount of its contingencies.

Mr. Verplanck proposed an allowance of $34,000 for extra clerk hire in the post office department; which was promptly negatived; $65,000 was provided for completing the survey of the Choctaw lands; 16,000 for the Creek cession, and 80,000 for that of the Chickasaws.

Items were inserted for continuing the printing of the public documents—for 250 copies of the debates of the old congress; and 2,000 copies of Cobb's Manual.

Mr. Washington moved to insert an item of $250,000 to enable the corporation of Washington to pay up its subscription to the stock of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal. This amendment was negatived with the understanding that it was to be renewed in the house.

The bill was then laid aside, and the committee took up a bill appointing a clerk to sign the name of the president to land warrants, which was agreed without amendment; when the committee rose, and reported the bills to the house; and [a little after one o'clock in the morning]—the house adjourned.

[§3.—An error occurred in the copy from which we printed the yeas and nays in the house of representatives on the passage of the bill for modifying the tariff, Mr. Arnold, of Tennessee, who voted against the bill, being set down as voting for it.]

[Nat. Intel.]

Saturday, March 2. The resolution reported by the committee of ways and means, expressive of the opinion that the government deposits might, with safety, be continued to be deposited in the bank of the United States, coming up for the action of the house.

Mr. Polk delivered a vehement speech, in opposition to its adoption. He was followed by Mr. Ingersoll, in support of the resolution.

Mr. Boon moved the orders of the day; the motion was negatived—yeas 51, nays 65.

Mr. Ingersoll, thereupon referring to the pressure of business and the impatience of the house, moved the previous question, he, however withdrew his motion at the request of

Mr. McDuffie, who replied to Mr. Polk and briefly, but earnestly advocated the resolution. He concluded by moving (according to his promise to Mr. Ingersoll) the previous question.

Mr. Wayne requested him to withdraw it. He referred the gentleman to Mr. Ingersoll, but while these gentlemen were conversing on the subject,

Mr. Whittelsey rose, and after a word or two moved the previous question.

Mr. Patton moved to lay the resolution on the table.

On this motion Mr. Polk demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. Wayne remonstrated, and believed that the motion of Mr. Whittelsey had been out of time, and out of order.

The chair deciding otherwise,

Mr. Wayne submitted.

The question was then put on Mr. Patton's motion to lay the resolution on the table, and decided by yeas and nays—yeas 79, nays 96.

So the house refused to lay on the table.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. Whittelsey for the previous question.

The motion was seconded by the house—yeas 86, nays 30.

The previous question was then put and carried, and the main question, on the adoption of the resolution, was decided by yeas and nays—yeas 110, nays 46. So the house

Resolved, That the government deposits may, in the opinion of the house, be safely continued in the bank of the United States.

The house then took up the general appropriation bill, with the amendments reported from the committee of the whole.

Some desultory debate occurred on one or two of the items—particularly on an amendment offered by Mr. E. Everett, to extend the franking privilege, by giving it to members from the period of sixty days before their entering congress, to the first day of the congress succeeding. This amendment was agreed to. The item of $34,000 for extra clerk hire in the post office department, produced a somewhat sharp debate, in which Messrs. Whittelsey and Wickliffe opposed, and Messrs. Conner and R. M. Johnson defended and supported the amendment. A letter of the late post master general was read; and after some desultory conversation on a few amendments of minor importance,

Mr. Hubbard demanded the previous question; which was seconded, put, and carried; and the bill was then ordered to its third reading.

The house then took a recess from 4 to 6 o'clock.

The evening session. The house was occupied in reading a third time and passing some of the appropriation bills, &c.

A joint resolution with an amendment, from the senate, extending the interpretation of the pension law, occasioned some debate. Mr. Wickliffe opposed the resolution, and moved to lay it on the table, but withdrew his motion for Mr. Hubbard to explain.

Mr. Wickliffe farther opposed, and Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, advocated the resolution, insisting that pensions ought to run not only to the proclamation of peace, but till the day of the disbanding of the revolutionary army, (Sept. 1783).

The question being taken on laying the resolution on the table, it was decided in the negative—yeas 64, nays 73.

The senate's amendment was then concurred in.

The appropriation bill for the engineer and ordnance departments was amended, and then ordered to its third reading.

A bill increasing the number of passengers in proportion to tonnage which vessels may bring into the United States, coming up, Mr. Jarvis moved to lay it upon the table. The motion prevailed, yeas 74.

The bill empowering the president to change the location of land offices was laid on the table.

The bill giving the assent of congress to an act of the state of Virginia, on the subject of the Cumberland road, coming up, Mr. Alexander moved to strike out the proviso retaining the jurisdiction of congress over the road.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. Vinton, McKennan and Mercer, and advocated by Messrs. Mason, Alexander and Clay. Mr. Stewart demanded the previous question.

Mr. Clay moved to lay the bill on the table—negatived.

The previous question was seconded, put, and carried, and the main question being put, the bill was ordered to its third reading.

The house, on motion of Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, went into committee of the whole on the state of the union—and after a struggle in respect to different bills proposed, took up the bill from the senate, (128), to carry into effect certain Indian treaties. It was amended, on motion of Mr. E. Everett, by adding a proviso for the valuation of the buildings and improvements of the American board among the Choctaws, and the payment of the balance only. The bill was then ordered to its third reading.

The committee next took up the amendments from the senate to the general appropriation bill; among these was an item for a custom house in Baltimore, advocated by Mr. Howard, and concurred in; another for a custom house in Newburyport; another for the investment of the money received from the government of France under the late treaty, until paid over to the claimants; another allowing the officers of the customs the same income as they would have been entitled to, had the tariff act of 1832 not passed; with some others, which our reporter failed to hear.

The amendments were all concurred in, and the bill ordered to be engrossed.

The committee took up the bill to explain the 18th section of the tariff law of 1832. It was amended in several respects, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng, and then ordered to its third reading.

The hardware bill was taken up and amended, on motion of Messrs. Stewart and Adams.

The bill for improving harbors and rivers in the territories, on motion of Mr. Serier, and the light house bill, on motion of Mr. Newton, were considered in committee, amended, and ordered to a third reading.

The committee then rose, and reported the bills to the house. The bill to explain the 18th section of the tariff act, occasioned a pretty warm debate. Mr. Wickliffe insisting on the proviso he had offered when the bill had formerly been in committee of the whole, confining the effect of the bill to goods which would have been entitled to drawback.

Messrs. Hoffman, Cambreleng and Wickliffe supported, and Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, opposed the amendment.

The question being put, it was carried.

The bill was then ordered to its third reading—yeas 79, nays 47.

When the light house bill came to its third reading, an ardent contest arose. Mr. Lewis, of Alabama, vehemently opposed the bill, and threatened to call yeas and nays on every item of the bill.

Mr. Davis, of Mass. and Mr. Cambreleng replied, when Mr. Lewis moved to lay the bill on the table.

The yeas and nays were taken on this motion, and stood as follows:—yeas 44, nays 71.

So the house refused to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. Hoffman made various inquiries of Mr. Cambreleng in relation to the grounds on which the items had been inserted in the bill.

Mr. Cambreleng replied, and stated the strictness with which the committee of commerce had investigated each item. The amendments were all agreed to, and the bill ordered to its third reading.

[It was now two o'clock in the morning.]

Mr. Wickliffe moved to suspend the rules, to allow him to move that the house send a message to the senate, informing them that the house would adjourn at 4 o'clock sine die.

But the motion failed.

Mr. Lyon, of Kentucky, obtained leave to present a memorial from the legislature of that state, condemning the doctrine of nullification. The reading was dispensed with, and it was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Whitelsey moved to go into committee on various private bills, which he named. The motion was warmly opposed, but it succeeded.

Mr. Wickliffe then moved a call of the house, which motion prevailing, the house was called accordingly, when 116 members answered to their names.

Mr. Wickliffe, hoping that this number of members could be kept in the house to do business, moved to suspend the call. It was thereupon suspended.

The bills named, were then passed through committee, and reported to the house.

On motion of Mr. Howard, the following vote of thanks was passed unanimously.

Resolved, That the thanks of this house be presented to the hon. Andrew Stevenson, speaker, for the fairness, dignity, skill, and impartiality, with which he has discharged the duties of the chair, during the twenty-second congress.

Mr. Serier moved to go into committee on three bills, for territorial objects. The yeas and nays were called, and it appeared that only ninety members answered to their names.

At a little before 5 o'clock, a motion was made to appoint a joint committee on the part of the house, to join a committee on the part of the senate, to inform the president that the two houses were ready to adjourn.

The question was put and decided in the affirmative—ayes 70, noes 19.

Mr. White, of New York, and Mr. Polk, were appointed the committee—and in a short time after, they returned and reported that the president had no further communication to make to congress.

Whereupon, on motion of Mr. Barbour, the house adjourned sine die.

The speaker then rose, and addressed the house as follows:

Gentlemen: I pray you to accept my grateful acknowledgments, for this renewed expression of confidence and approbation, in the discharge of the official duties of this high office.

I receive it in the same spirit of kindness, in which I flatter myself it has been offered, and shall cherish it with feelings of profound respect and the deepest gratitude. For the last six years, it has been your pleasure, that the arduous duties of this chair, should be assigned to me.

This whole period of service, has, as you well know, gentlemen, been distinguished by events, well calculated to render this station, one of more than ordinary labor and responsibility.

I have zealously and faithfully endeavored to meet this responsibility, and I hope I shall not be deemed arrogant, when I say, that I feel a proud consciousness that the duties of this high trust, have been discharged by me, with a single eye to the character and dignity of this house, the interest of my country, and my own honor.

That I have often erred, I most readily admit; but they have been errors of rule and principle, not caprice or passion; and if there has been any apparent rigor or harshness in the chair, you will do me the justice to believe, that it was unintentional and indiscriminate.

If, gentlemen, in moments of excitement and commotion, any thing unkind has occurred between myself and the individual members of the house, let me assure you it has long since passed from my memory, and been forgiven and forgotten.

I have no injuries to complain of, and no memory for them, if they existed, and I shall part with you all, this night, in the spirit of peace and good will.

Before we separate, gentlemen, will you pardon me for a moment, in offering a single suggestion?

Our councils of late have been greatly divided, and their harmony and peace disturbed.

Our country has been deeply and painfully excited, and the safety and security of the union itself threatened.

May we not all now hope that the causes of excitement are hourly subsiding and passing off? That peace and harmony and brotherly affection, will soon shed their holy calm and blessed influences around us, and that our beloved country will again become united, peaceful and happy.

In assuming this station, some years ago, I took the liberty of then expressing to the house a sentiment which I had long cherished, and what I now seize this fit occasion of repeating from this chair. It is this: that our confederated republic can only safely exist, under the influence of wise, equal and just laws; by the ties of common interest and brotherly affection; a spirit of mutual forbearance and moderation, (collectively and individually), and by cherishing a devotion to that liberty and union, secured to us by the blood of our common fathers. These are the stable foundations upon which our liberties and free institutions can alone rest; and God grant they may be eternal. This, gentlemen, in all human probability, is the moment of separation, with many, very many of us, forever. Is there one individual present to whose bosom a final separation from those with whom he has been so long and intimately associated, will not cast a painful and bitter pang? If there be, I confess I envy not his feelings.

You will carry with you, gentlemen, my cordial and best wishes for your individual prosperity and happiness, and I pray you to receive this my most affectionate, and possibly, last farewell.

The speaker then adjourned the house sine die.

House of representatives—Monday, Feb. 25. A message, in writing, was received from the president of the United States, by Mr. Doneison, his private secretary, as follows:

Washington, 22d Feb. 1833.

To the house of representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the consideration of the house, a letter from general Lafayette, to the secretary of state, with the petition which came enclosed in it of the countess d'Amberg, and Mde. de la Gorce, granddaughters of marshal count Rochambeau, and original documents in support thereof, praying compensation for services rendered by the count to the United States during the revolutionary war; together with translations of the same. And I transmit with the same view, the petition of Messrs. de Fontaville de Jaramont, and de Rossignol Grandmont, praying compensation for services rendered by them to the United States in the French army, and during the same war, with original papers in support thereof; all received through the same channel, together with translations of the same.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The said message with the petitions and papers accompanying the same, was referred to the committee on revolutionary claims.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 3—VOL. VIII. BALTIMORE, MARCH 16, 1833. [VOL. XLIV. WHOLE No. 1,121.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

It will be seen by a brief article inserted below, that a veteran friend of domestic industry has made his valedictory to the "AMERICAN SYSTEM"—in a settled belief that the principle of protection has been abandoned. Mr. Carey will carry with him, into his retirement, the warm wishes of thousands, that the remainder of his days may be as happy as those of his past life have been useful; and the distinguished talent and disinterested zeal with which he pursued his munificent purposes, will long be, and "sweetly, remembered." Whether (consulting both inclination and interest), I ought not to follow this lead of my old and valued friend, is a question that will be held yet a short season under advisement—for the sense of what was esteemed duty is blunted, in a hopelessness of rendering desired service; but of this I shall speak at length when the "signs of the times" more distinctly appear. The flag of the "American System" must either be run up to the mast-head, to bear the "battle or the breeze"—or be "doused" and cast overboard. It shall not fly at half-mast in the REGISTER. If any thing is worth doing at all—it is worth doing well, with all one's heart. It is easy to retire from a position—to give it up altogether; and obtain peace in submission; but I am not sufficiently versed in the doctrine of the "non committal," or either-neither-sidean school, to conduct this work between the warts and the rights of free labor, and the demands of nullifiers and anti-protection men. The doubt is—whether a plank remains afloat to sustain the "system." Perhaps, there is—in the phalanx which voted against the new tariff law in the house of representatives; but is it worth while to take hold of that plank, in the circumstances under which we are placed?

On two memorable occasions, I have stood upon the same ground, with respect to the same subject—insisting, during the long embargo, &c. and the war, that congress had a right so to "regulate commerce with foreign nations," as to prohibit all interchanges or intercourse with them; and more recently, that this power to "regulate commerce" might be surely exerted for the purpose of protecting the industry of the American people, as foreign nations protect their industry. In neither case, would I admit the existence of a rightful authority, in any section of the union, or particular state, to "nullify" the laws of the United States. It was no matter to me, whether "moral treason" was cherished on the north or the south of the Potomac. What was wrong on the one side of that river must be wrong on the other side of it—at least I think so! But the right to "regulate commerce" being perfect in congress—I would not have any law upon that subject "nullified," except in appeals to the sober judgment of the people, and by force of the ballot. No consideration has yet presented itself to my mind that would have induced me to vote for the tariff law recently passed—for any action on that subject should have been preceded by a repeal of the ordinance of South Carolina; and besides, I cannot admit that the main purpose of assessing duties on goods imported should be the collection of revenue. The practice of every civilized nation is against this heresy:—and such taxes are unequal, and, of course, unjustly, imposed on the people of the United States. In their protected labor on the one hand, they should have an indemnity for the extra amount of the public contributions which free working persons are required to pay, and of public service, which they are expected to render, in times of need. Yet, the law being passed, must be obeyed; though believing it impossible that I shall ever yield an acquiescence to its principles, as I "understand" them, and as every citizen has an undoubted right to interpret them—if he pleases.

I impeach no man's motives—some few of my nearest and dearest friends, men worthy of all honor, in my estimation, voted for, or now render a qualified support to this law. I condemn them not—shall not quarrel with them. I affect no mastery over other men's opinions—but will admit of none over my own; except in a submission to the reason and fitness of things.

As before intimated, I shall, as soon as the bustle of business is a little over, and time is allowed for the people to reflect on the subject—present my views of the operation and effect of this bill, in extenso;^{*} shew why the power to "REGULATE COMMERCE" was inserted in the constitution; and, if I can, expose the grand heresy, that regulations of commerce should only be governed by the wants of the treasury. How has it been—how is it—with respect to the interests of the merchants and ship-owners?

In a subsequent page will be seen what may be esteemed the opinions of both parties in South Carolina, concerning the new tariff law. The "nullifiers" believe that they have obtained a glorious victory—and the "union party," also opposed to the protective system, appear fully satisfied. The latter resisted the application of force to amend the laws—and certainly deserve much praise for the steadiness with which they maintained their ground.

The "Washington Telegraph" says—"We presume that South Carolina will acquiesce in the compromise which has been offered in Mr. Clay's bill; and which, by-the-by, is very similar to the bill drawn up by Mr. Tazewell at the last session, which bill met the approbation of the southern members, but it was not brought forward, as it was clearly ascertained that such a bill had no possible chance of passing.

"Nullification is triumphant. What has produced the settlement of the tariff question? NULLIFICATION. WOULD WE HAVE SEEN MR. CLAY'S BILL HAD IT NOT BEEN FOR THE ACTION OF SOUTH CAROLINA?"

The "Georgia Journal" of the 7th March, announcing Mr. Clay's bill, heads the news with "DEATH TO PROTECTION."

The "Richmond Enquirer" says—"We bid Mr. Clay's bill welcome, on account of its conciliatory tendencies—but it is a piece of patch-work which is very imperfect, and will require great amendment. It will, however, be amended, in the true, not technical sense of the word. It will be improved, and not made worse by the change. Let Mr. Clay be assured, that our chains will be relaxed, not made tighter. He may try to soothe the monopolists by hopes of better days. He may beg them to wait for more fortunate times, and a more efficient protection. That time will never come. Thanks to Mr. Clay! He himself has contributed to sing the requiem of his protective system. We hail the euthanasia with delight."

* * * "The tariff has received its death-blow—and so has nullification. By a singular fatality, it happens, that the two individuals, who have been most active in raising up this monstrous tariff, have been forced by public opinion to slay it."

The "New York Evening Post" after much self-compliment, because of its efforts in the support of "free trade," says—"Our readers who have gone with us in this contest will now permit us to tender them our cordial congratulations on witnessing this proof, that the political superstition of protection is passing away from the land. A system founded in the most short-sighted selfishness has received its death-blow. There is no fear that another congress will undo what this has done, further than to make the measure more perfect. The experiment has been fully—almost fatally, tried; and it will be recorded in our history only to avoid its repetition."

§§—We might fill a page or two with things of this sort.

A correspondent of the New York American, under date of Washington, March 3, says—Congress adjourned last night, having completed the great work of pacification. To Mr. Clay it was a proud day. His tariff and land bills both received the final sanction of congress; and when to these is added the passage of the enforcing bill, we may safely say, that no day ever saw more done in that body for the perpetuation and strengthening of the government. The tariff, while it does not expose to immediate danger the great manufacturing interests of the country, satisfies the south for the present, and affords to South Carolina an opportunity to escape from the hazardous position in which her rash and misguided leaders had placed her. In doing this, it also does away the necessity of wielding those powers for the vindication of the authority of the government, which, however necessary it might have been to vest in the hands of the president, I would rather have seen entrusted to a man, who, with his firmness and decision, had more calmness of temper, and acted less under the influence of personal feelings.

* But previous to this exposition, and as soon as room can be made for it, I shall publish the corrected speech of Mr. Clay (just received), which embraces not only his reply to Mr. Webster, but several observations made by him on other occasions, during the progress of the bill.

† No nullifier will agree to this—every one says that nullification is the "lion rampant" on the shield of "state-rights."

We have postponed a dangerous crisis by the passage of these bills; and at the same time we have distinctly declared, that the government has the power to enforce its rights.

The tariff bill, while it accomplishes these desirable ends, is not, however, without objections. By ultimately abolishing all discrimination in duties, it surrenders a power of the federal government of great value, and one which the people will not consent shall be a dead letter; and it does it, too, upon compulsion, and thus encourages future malcontents to venture upon the dangerous experiment of rebellion, to relieve themselves from all laws which they may imagine to operate injuriously against their peculiar interests. The law, too, will be difficult to carry into effect, from the peculiar manner in which the reduction is to take place, in order to bring all duties to an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent. Many articles now pay a specific duty, as sugar and spirits. Others, i. e. paper, cottons and woollens, pay a duty partly specific, and partly ad valorem. For the purpose of deducting the 1-10th of the excess of the present duty over an ad valorem duty of twenty per cent. it will be necessary to ascertain the value; and it is not pointed out in the law how that is to be done, nor whether the market value or cost at the place of production, or the home value, shall be taken as a standard. The bill, therefore, may be regarded rather as an experiment than a permanent measure: and it is not impossible that it may be repealed next year. Still, however, it gives time to reflect; and time may furnish the cure which skill cannot. On this point, Mr. Clay did not agree with Mr. Webster. The latter was unwilling to sanction a bill which he thought was calculated to delude the public mind, and never intended to realise the benefits it promised. In this difference, however, there was no petty insinuation as to motive, but, as statesmen and gentlemen, they paid a proper tribute to the motives which had compelled them to differ.

We have only to add—for the present: "HE WHO GIVES UP ESSENTIAL LIBERTY, TO PURCHASE A TEMPORARY SAFETY, DESERVES NEITHER LIBERTY NOR SAFETY."

¶ We have a copy of Mr. Calhoun's speech in the senate, in opposition to the passage of the bill further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, and also Mr. Webster's, in reply. We should, probably, and promptly, have given to these speeches an insertion in the REGISTER, proper, but for the reason that Mr. Calhoun, (especially), refers so often to the arguments of gentlemen who had preceded him in the debate, that justice could not be rendered to the latter—their speeches being omitted: and so we have thought it not only the most expedient, but also most just, that these speeches should simply have their regular places in the supplement for the last volume, now in the press, and to be published next month.

The very great length of these speeches would, also, have much embarrassed the current business of the REGISTER; and besides, most persons anxious to read them, will have had an opportunity before we could present them. They will be preserved, for the deliberate judgment of the people.

We pity the poor things who condemned Mr. Webster's reply to Mr. Hayne, about two years ago—and, "on their allegiance," are now compelled to approve Mr. Webster's answer to Mr. Calhoun.

¶ According to custom, we present the other side of the question—by inserting the "supplemental report" of the minority of the committee of the house of representatives on the subject of the bank, while regretting the room that it occupies—for we do not see that it contains any thing of practical usefulness, being made up of high-pressure statements; and which, if even sustained in the most ample manner, would not have any sort of effect on the question at issue, as to the safety of the public deposits in the bank of the United States: for if the whole amount of the much-talked of western debts were lost, the safety of these deposits would not be at all endangered. It is "labor in vain"—the common sense of the people utterly rejects this weak movement of a small fragment of political party—as the decided proceedings of a great majority of the house of representatives most clearly shews. Credence was not yielded to certain statements—however strongly they had been endorsed.

This supplemental report, however, shews the truth of a statement which we were loath to believe—that persons had been engaged in the honorable business of making "a run" upon one of the western branches—and, in an embarrassment of that branch, thus wantonly, or maliciously, caused—hoped to find the semblance of proof for certain assertions, which, perhaps, not one intelligent man really believed—unless in that devotion which forces an assent to all that "the party" sends out to be believed—white being black, or blue red, in the fulness of political orthodoxy. These persons have no generous affections. To defeat an enemy—to render him hors de combat, incapable of further resistance, is not sufficient: the dead or the dying must still be assailed—and even the goodness of their bones to manure the land" be questioned.

The semi-weekly "Globe" of the 13th inst. has twenty-two columns of matter "about the bank." Hardly twenty-two persons, we think, will ever read it, excluding those who are directly interested in the discussion.

¶ The report of the minority of the committee on manufactures of the house of representatives, signed by Messrs. Adams and Condict, has been received. It is able and highly interesting—plain, pointed and instructive, prepared in Mr. Adams' own strong and peculiar manner—and we must publish it, for numerous reasons; but its great length—filling eighteen of the capacious and close columns of the "National Intelligencer"—compels a present postponement. It is a powerful exposition of the principles of the protecting system, and a review of certain proceedings had to overthrow it.

The Intelligencer, speaking of the report says—"It is from the pen of Mr. Adams, and signed by himself and Mr. L. Condict, comprising the minority of the committee on manufactures. To that committee, at the commencement of the session, the reader will recollect, was referred so much of the message of the president of the United States as related to the subject of manufactures. The committee was so adversely organized, and the committee of ways and means moved upon them so promptly with the anti tariff bill, that there was no hope of any action by the committee of manufactures in favor of that interest. Unwilling, apparently, that any duty imposed upon him should be neglected or pretermitted, Mr. Adams then set about and has prepared the document we refer to, which, to say the least of it, may be considered the most important of those to which the session gave birth.

"The report does not confine itself to the comparatively narrow question of the relation of manufacture and importation; but it considers the subject of the protective policy, in a larger view, in connection with the other objects of recommendation in the message, to which it was decidedly adverse, as it is to the reduction of the tariff. The report is, in fact, a review of the scheme of policy unfolded in the annual message, which, we had occasion to remark, at the time, if carried out into action, would leave us nothing in the government worth contending for.

¶ Our old and valued friend—MATHEW CAREY, esq. has sent us a copy of his valedictory "to the manufacturers of the United States," recapitulating his efforts to establish and sustain the "American System," and stating the reasons for his retirement from discussions of that subject. The following are the closing paragraphs of his circular:

"Let us now see the actual state of the country.

"The dignity of the government is indelibly tarnished; as a single state, the thirteenth of the whole, in regard to white population, has, with arms in her hands, dictated terms to the other twenty three, and forced them to surrender at discretion. Proh pudor!

"To remove the imaginary grievances of a portion of the states, real substantial grievances are inflicted on the remainder, whereby a large portion of their industry and happiness will be blasted and withered.

"We ingloriously abandon the union party who have so nobly defended the cause of the country, and leave them to be trampled under foot by their violent opposers, who have unconstitutionally disfranchised them!!

"We have established, in a great measure, the right of a single state to 'nullify' laws enacted by the majority of the nation!

"After having, in compliance with the threats of three-fifths of 250,000 white people, enacted, in 1832, a tariff, fraught with large concessions and sacrifices, we again yield to their threats, and before that tariff goes into operation, we enact another, in 1833, which appears to renounce the principle of protection almost altogether!!

"This hideous state of things might and would have been prevented, had a fourth part of the pains been taken, or the expense incurred, to enlighten the southern people, that were employed by the nullifiers to poison their minds.

"What a fearful responsibility have those misguided citizens incurred, whom no facts or arguments could induce, in 1832, 29, 30, 31 and 32, to make any sacrifices for the prevention of such a mass of evil!"

"Philadelphia, Feb. 28, 1833."

It is proper to observe, in explanation, that Mr. Carey complains of the want of liberality in the manufacturers, with respect to contributions for the publication and distribution of his own essays, and other papers, having reference to the system: that is, for mere payments for paper and print—Mr. C. having no sort of pecuniary interest in the matter.

Two letters were received by the editor this week, which it may be well to notice. One contained a five dollar bill, with the brief writing, "no apology is necessary for sending you payment for the Register for 1833"—and on this letter 50 cents postage was paid. The other was a long letter on speculative matters, and contained a one dollar bill, in payment for the supplement for the last volume, on which we paid 37½ cents postage—a larger sum than the profit on the supplement ordered will amount to.

As only a small comparative number of this supplement is printing [and if any copies remain beyond the prompt demand of the subscribers to the REGISTER for them, will be offered for general sale,] it is necessary that we should be apprised of the wishes of our friends to possess them; but other than the expensive mode just mentioned of making known such wishes, should be resorted to. And, as the debate in the senate is eminently calculated to increase the knowledge of the people in matters of high public interest—and as, besides, the transmission of the supplement, by mail, will increase the amount derived from postages—we think that it will not at all interfere with the strictest duty of postmasters to send on the names of their neighbors, if disposed to accommodate them, in this respect.

MANUFACTURES OF IRON. We feel much mortified in presenting the following exhibit of four-o'clock-in-the-morning proceedings in congress: but it may serve as a warning for future legislation.

In the last REGISTER, page 18, we inserted a paragraph from the "National Intelligencer," saying—

"Among the acts, of which a list is published, is one reported by Mr. Verplanck, which passed in the night of Saturday, and which seems to us of sufficient importance to the importing merchants, as well as to the revenue officers, to justify a special reference to it. By the operation of the general act of July, 1832, unintentionally, probably, on the part of congress and of those who framed it, the duties imposed on many kinds of hardware were nearly doubled, and other inconveniences interposed in the way of importers. These are removed by the act just passed; in which also the inconveniences from the duties on copper, brass plates, and copper for sheathing vessels, are also remedied, by restoring the duties on all these articles to their former footing, except copper sheathing, which is hereafter to be admitted free of duty."

And the "New York Journal of Commerce," perhaps taking its lead from the "Intelligencer," has said—

"We learn that the bill introduced into the house of representatives by Mr. Verplanck, some time since, for correcting the error in the act of 1832, which imposed increased duties on hardware, passed at a late hour on Saturday night, and has become a law. It was amended, by an additional section relating to brazier's copper, copper sheathing and brass plates: all of which, with hardware, are restored to their former rates, which were unintentionally changed by the act of 1832."

Now we have good reason to believe, and surely do believe, that the parts of the law of 1832 which are repealed, were not put into that law "unintentionally," or in "error," but deliberately inserted for the express purpose of preventing frauds on the revenue, and for the just encouragement of American makers and manufacturers of iron; as we think will appear from a simple reading of the following clauses of the second section of the act:

Tenth. On axes, adzes, hatchets, drawing knives, cutting knives, sickles, or reaping hooks, scythes, spades, shovels, squares of iron or steel, plated brass and polished steel saddle-ry, coach and harness furniture of all descriptions, steclyards and scalebeams, socket chisels, vices and screws of iron, called wood screws, thirty per centum ad valorem; on common tinued and japanned saddlery of all descriptions ten per centum ad valorem: Provided, That said articles shall not be imported at a less rate of duty than would have been chargeable on the material constituting their chief value, if imported in an unmanufactured state.

Twelfth. On japanned wares of all kinds, on plated wares of all kinds, and on all manufactures, not otherwise specified, made of brass, iron, steel, pewter or tin, or of which either of these metals is a component material, a duty of twenty-five per centum ad valorem: Provided, That all articles manufactured in whole of sheet, rod, hoop, bolt or bar iron, or iron wire, or of which sheet, rod, hoop, bolt or bar iron, or iron wire, shall constitute the greatest weight, and which are not otherwise specified, shall pay the same duty per pound that is charged by this act on sheet, rod, hoop, bolt or bar iron, or on iron wire, of the same number, respectively: Provided, also, That the said last mentioned rates shall not be less than the said duty of twenty-five per centum ad valorem.

The provisos in these clauses are repealed; and certain manufactures of metal, (so called, to evade the duty,) may be admitted at a less rate of duty per lb. than the mere iron out of which they are so manufactured would pay; the absurdity and injustice of which need not be pointed out—but would be hardly worth mentioning, in the present state of abandonment, except by way of caution as to things which have no relation to, or concern with, the seemingly rejected "AMERICAN SYSTEM."

We shall only give a statement of the facts which belong to this important change in the tariff law, in the words of a friend who was present when the bill passed the senate:

"Mr. Clay's compromise tariff bill became a law about 3 o'clock of the morning of the 3d inst. and an hour afterwards the principle of the compromise was violated, for the first time, by passing a bill suspending until the 1st of June 1834, the operation of the provisos in the 10th and 12th clauses of the 2d section of the act of 1832—introduced into that bill to forbid the importation of manufactured iron at a less rate of duty than was imposed upon the raw material, and to prevent a variety of frauds in the importation of iron."

Gen. Smith had introduced a bill into the senate to repeal so much of the law of '32 as respected brasier's copper, copper bottoms and leaf tobacco, which was considered and passed. The house of representatives, entreinating an opinion that such a bill should not originate in the senate, originated the same bill themselves; but added to it a section postponing the provisos mentioned—which passed that body without discussion, and was sent to the senate. As soon as it was received, Mr. — rose, and stated that this bill was identically the same with the one sent from the senate, and, thereupon, he moved to dispense with the reading of it. It was read by its title three times and passed, all in less than five minutes. As soon as the bill was laid upon the secretary's desk, Mr. Dickerson took it up and discovered this new section—and informed the senate that they had been surprised into the passing of an important section which had never been read in the senate. Mr. —, mortified that he had, upon the information of some third person, stated that this was the identical bill which had formerly passed the senate, moved for a reconsideration of the vote on passing the bill. It was reconsidered—but, on a motion to amend the bill, by striking out the obnoxious section, it was objected that this could not be done without reconsidering the vote for ordering the bill to a third reading. A motion was made for reconsidering this vote, but failed for want of a quorum. It was then urged that the bill ought not to pass, inasmuch as the negative of a single senator could, and no doubt would, have prevented a second reading of the bill, had it been read once. It was further urged, that these provisos ought not to be suspended, inasmuch as they were adopted for the purpose of giving the manufacturers of iron in this country some compensation for the great reduction of duty on that article which they had been obliged to submit to, and that it was unjust to take from them this advantage, unless a like suspension should apply to such part of the law as reduced the duty upon iron. It was also urged that this was in violation of the principle of the compromise law just passed: on taking the vote, a bare quorum of 25 were present—17 of whom voted in favor of passing the bill, and 8 against it."

— The following is a copy of the law just above alluded to—

An act to explain and amend the act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports, passed July fourteenth, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, so far as relates to hardware, and certain manufactures of copper and brass, and other articles.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled, That the provisions of the tenth and twelfth clauses of the second section of the act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports passed July fourteenth eighteen hundred and thirty-two, be, and the same are hereby suspended until the first day of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-four.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports, passed July the fourteenth, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, as repeals the duties heretofore levied on copper bottoms cut round, and copper bottoms raised to the edge, and still bottoms cut round and turned upon the edge, and parts thereof, and of copper plates or sheets, weighing more than thirty-four ounces per square foot, commonly called braziers copper, and on tobacco leaves, or unmanufactured, be, and the same is hereby repealed.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That nothing contained in the act of the fourteenth of July, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports, shall be so construed as to authorise the exemption from the payment of duty on sheet and rolled brass, but the same shall be charged with the payment of a duty of twenty-five per centum ad valorem.

*The name of this senator is not given—for the reason that if there was any trick in the transaction, he is not of the class that would have had a part in it. Ed. REG.

"THE BLOODY BILL." The law "further to provide for the collection of duties on imports," is called "the bloody bill," by all the nullifiers, and some yet talk about letting blood, because of its passage! We have not had time to examine the provisions of this bill in comparison with certain parts of the embargo laws, passed under the administration of Mr. Jefferson—the great state-rights president, and author of the sentiment, that "nullification is the rightful remedy;" but if memory serves correctly, the laws enacted to enforce the embargo, went, at least, as far, if not much further, than the "bloody bill." But there is this difference: the laws, in the one case, were intended chiefly to operate on the "federalists" of the east, and, in the other, on the "democrats" of the south—which "materially alters the case!" There are two sides of the "Tweed," as the noble Potomac has been contemptibly designated by southern orators, for lack of brains, or want of resolution, to describe American things by American names.

DREAFFUL SUFFERING IN SOUTH CAROLINA. The Charleston faças have been uncommonly well attended, with great displays of fashion and wealth: and the Mercury of the 1st inst says—"We learn that $35,000 was offered and refused on Wednesday last for old Bertrand. This sum is exactly ten times as much as was given for him by his present owner, Mr. Lindsey, of Kentucky, who bought him from col. Spann, the day after his great race with Aratus and Creeping Kate."

"[Taxed] 'forty bales of the hundred,' and yet able to pay thirty-five thousand dollars for a horse!]

We see further—that "the friends of Julia, by Bertrand, dam Transport," &c. have challenged a race against her—for ten thousand dollars, not excepting any horse in the United States.

THE TARIFF—IN MISSISSIPPI! We have been favored with a copy of some interesting papers concerning a proposed extension of the charter of the bank of the state of Mississippi, which are laid aside for insertion at full length, for several reasons—but especially to shew the awfulness of the poverty and suffering with which the people of that state have been afflicted because of the tariff—which takes from them "forty bales of cotton out of every hundred" produced by them, to pamper the pride, and glut the avarice of the nabob manufacturers and monopolists of the north, as the following sentences from the report of the committee of the bank will conclusively shew:

"For several years past the inhabitants of this state have been prosperous beyond example, capital judiciously invested and properly managed has yielded at least ten per cent. and in many instances the rate of profit has been doubled—as a consequence, capital has been eagerly sought after," &c.

"In the middle and northern states, money does not command more than one-half the profit which it readily yields here."

And that capital may abound, it is proposed that the discount on notes having more than four months to run, shall be eight per cent. but if over a year, nine per cent. because it is believed that such loans would be unadvantageous to the planting interest. And it is stated that five millions of additional banking capital will be needed, immediately after the withdrawal of the office of the bank of the United States—if not before; to discount notes at nine per centum!

We believe that many millions are borrowed in Louisiana at ten per cent. and not a small amount in Alabama at 15, or more. The great wonder is, that, after the planters are "plundered of forty bales of cotton out of every hundred" which they grow, and are compelled to pay six and a quarter cents a yard for shirtings for their negroes—that they are able to return ten per cent. for money invested in cotton lands, and slaves to work them!

The fact we believe is—that all well-managed estates in Mississippi, Louisiana and Alabama, one year with another, yield more than twenty per cent. CLEAR PROFIT, on the capital invested in them.

THE PAST AND THE PRESENT. The New York Commercial Advertiser, severely censuring the supplemental report of the minority of the committee of the house of representatives on the subject of the U. S. bank, says—

"The truth is, beyond a doubt, that no western debts were ever more sound and available, than those at this moment due to the U. S. bank; and never were the means of the west so ample, or its resources so flourishing. To sustain this remark, a gentleman from Cincinnati has furnished us with the following schedule of prices there in the year 1819, and the year 1833. In 1819 the currency was at a discount from specie of thirty per cent. At that time barges were from three to four months coming up from New Orleans, and freight was five cents a pound. Now the steam boats come up in eight or ten days, and freight is three-fourths of a cent a pound. If the west had any resources of a pecuniary nature in 1819, those resources must be immensely greater now."

Q3—The high prices in 1819 were in the then distracted currency of the west—and the low prices of other articles in the want of a demand for them. The difference in freights, and the support of the bank, could not have brought about such important changes. Other causes were also in operation. A market for the products of the west has been opened in the east, or more nearly at home, by wholesale divisions of labor, and brisk circulations of values—at every change in their character adding to the common wealth, and promoting the "general welfare."

BANKS, &c. By a statement in the Philadelphia Commercial Herald, it appears that the chartered capital of banks in that city, 16 in number, amounts to $265,600,000—the sum paid in, is $18,935,000. The insurance companies, 14 in number, have a capital of $5,080,000.

There is a bank in good, and, no doubt, well-deserved credit, in one of the villages of N. York, which, on a capital of $90,000, has a circulation of 264,000 dollars; and the notes and other sureties discounted amount to the great sum of $358,000.

An act has been passed by the legislature of the territory of Florida, incorporating a bank, to be called "the Union bank of Florida," with a capital of one million of dollars, to be funded upon real estate, to be represented by bonds, &c. on the faith of which the capital of the bank is to be borrowed.

We received the other day, a bill of the Win-ni pi-si-o-gce bank, and wish that we had a good many of them. The issue is at Meredith, New Hampshire.

"Something new" has lately appeared in the shape of a bank note. We have one of the notes described below, and consider it not only a "splendid specimen of engraving," but because of the "labor bestowed on the plate," are led to believe that the counterfeit of it will hardly ever be attempted.

"The Western bank of Philadelphia" has issued bills of five and ten dollars denomination, in the German language. The bills are splendid specimens of engraving. Some idea of the labor bestowed on the plate, may be gathered from a description of one of the bills, as we find it in the Pennsylvanian. They are from the workshop of Topham & Co.

"The vignette on the fives is an exquisite representation of that cruel yet heroic tragedy in the history of Switzerland: Tell shooting the apple on the head of his child, by order of the tyrannic Gessler. The hero of Switzerland is seen standing against the trunk of a huge 'father of the forest,' bonneted; his strong bow uplifted in his left hand, his right drawn back, he leaning forward watching with intense anxiety the flight of his true arrow, which is then seen piercing the apple in its centre. In his belt hangs another arrow, with which he intended to penetrate the heart of the unfeeling tyrant, had the first injured his child. Gessler sits horeed, his bonnet up, in front of a file of soldiers; looking in cold blood, upon the boy, who stands, a little hero, fastened to the stake. The back ground presents to the eye the rugged mountains of romantic Switzerland, towering to the skies. On either side of this beautiful and interesting scenery, is placed a minor vignette, representing the rich german valleys of Pennsylvania, and the drover driving his fat cattle to the 'great emporium.'"

REGIMENT OF DRAGOONS. Adjutant-general Jones, by order of major general Macomb, announces the following officers appointed to command the regiment of dragoons authorised by an act of congress approved on the 2nd inst. All the officers had belonged to the old regiments of infantry, except col. Dodge, promoted from major of rangers.

RHODE ISLAND. The legislature of this state has passed an act prohibiting the administration of extra-judicial oaths.

HOLT'S HOTEL, NEW YORK. We are informed by a correspondent who yesterday visited this immense establishment, that the enterprising proprietor is likely to realize his most sanguine expectations in the success of his house. It has been opened scarcely a month, and he now dines over two hundred gentlemen at his ordinary, and at least two thousand in the various rooms, daily. His beds, amounting to near 250, have been several times completely filled. To supply his table, he purchases, besides large quantities of cut beef, a fat bullock every morning, with other meats, poultry, fish, &c. in proportion. He roasts 700 lbs. of provision at a time, the spit being turned by a steam engine. Our correspondent wishes that those who have not yet paid Mr. Holt a visit, would call and view for themselves one of the most extraordinary hotels in the world. The order, regularity and quiet, preserved there, together with the kind attention of the domestics, are worthy all praise. [N. Y. Gaz.]

TURKISH BARLEY. The New York Daily Advertiser notices the arrival at that port of nine thousand bushels of barley from Constantinople, and remarks—

"This, we believe, is the first parcel that has ever arrived here; the quality appears to be good, in a sound state, plump and bright. We are told it will pay the shipper at the very low price barley is selling at here. It would be a most extraordinary fact, if the opening of commercial trade with the sublime port, should be the cause of introducing into this country barley and wheat, which are raised in abundance in that country. Up to the present period, grain, flour, &c. have been among the most important articles of export from this country."

COTTON MANUFACTURE. The amazing cotton manufacture continues to increase. The reduction of the profits has sharpened the wits of the manufacturers; and men, women and children, as well as machines, throw off an increased quantity of work. We perceive, from the evidence on the factory bill, that the weekly quantity now spun by one spindle is 21 hanks of No. 40 in a week.* The cotton spun in Great Britain last year amounted to about 288,000,000 lbs. Of this vast quantity a tenth was spun in Scotland. The United States supply three-fourths of the consumption, or 213,000,000 lbs., the East Indies about 20,000,000 lbs., the West Indies 1,600,000 lbs. only. All the cotton, except the growth of the East and West Indies, pays a duty of 5-8d per lb. This duty would last year exceed £690,000, and would be as nearly as possible ten per cent. on the return of the cotton in bond.

[The preceding is from Bell's [London] Weekly Messenger, of Jan. 13. The cotton spun in the United States in 1832, was about 85,000,000 lbs.; and, after England, the best market which the southern states has for cotton is in the northern states. And the manufacturers in the latter, coming first into market, and demanding the better qualities, fix the price of each crop considerably higher than English agents will give in the first instance.]

LOTTERIES. In a special message from governor Lincoln to the Massachusetts legislature, on the subject of lotteries, occurs the following remarkable passage:

"In a recent exposition made under the most respectable authority, of a similar traffic in a city of a sister state, it is stated to have been ascertained that an officer of a banking institution, who had been detected in abstracting from the bank divers sums of money, 'was found to be in possession, in tickets and parts of tickets in various lotteries, of two thousand three hundred and twenty-seven chances, which, after having been all drawn and examined by order of the bank, produced less than twenty dollars. Another case of bankruptcy is given, whose accounts exhibited an aggregate of $8,000, drawn by him in lotteries at different periods, while his expenditure for tickets amounted to the sum of $120,000, and he was then insolvent $70,000.'"

On the same subject, the "Boston Transcript" says—Mr. Buckingham, from the special committee appointed to consider whether any alterations are expedient in the laws for the suppression of lottery tickets, &c. submitted a report accompanied by a bill. The report is very elaborate, and enters into the whole subject in detail. The bill provides that no person shall make, sell, or offer for sale, &c. any lottery ticket, under penalty of not less than $100 nor more than $2,000—on a second conviction, in addition to the aforesaid penalty, the convicted to be sentenced to confinement in the house of correction for a term of time not less than three months nor more than twelve months—on a third conviction, not less than six nor more than eighteen months. Advertising lottery tickets, &c. punishable by a fine of not less than $30 nor more than $100—selling tickets in fictitious lotteries, punishable by imprisonment for a term of time not less than one year nor more than three. Persons prosecuting to conviction entitled to a reward of $50. Any one permitting the sale of any lottery ticket, or the managing or drawing of any lottery, in any house, store or other building, owned, rented or occupied by him, to be punished by a fine not less than $100 nor more than $2,000.

—New York and Pennsylvania have passed laws which will speedily, and efficiently prevent the sale of lottery tickets in these states.

O'CONNELL. A late English paper says—Gratitude for services rendered does not seem wanting on the part of the Irish people towards the agitator Daniel O'Connell. So entire is their confidence in the wisdom and patriotism of the family, that not only the great reaper himself, but three of his sons—his brother-in-law, Mr. Finn—his nephew—his cousin—and Mr. Fitzsimmons, his son-in-law, have all been returned to parliament from different parts of Ireland. Including himself, says an Irish paper, "there will be nine of the clan O'Connell altogether, which with old Judy and her cub, and a straggling devil or two, whose existence depends on the breath of his nostrils, will make at least a sergeant's guard, and goodly show on the benches. Where they will all get victims and drink, heaven knows. The sooner the begonia-box is put into requisition the better; people, and people's wives and their children, cannot live on the odoriferous perfumes of the cook's shop in London. As to qualification, we dare say they are all qualified, though no one else, we imagine durst say so. But we are hold men."

SUPPLEMENT TO THE LAST VOLUME. It has already been mentioned that we had in the press a supplement for the volume of the REGISTER just closed, to contain 13 or 14 sheets, or as much reading matter as is generally given in an octavo volume of more than six hundred pages, at the extra charge of one dollar; and desired gentlemen, who wish to have copies of this supplement, to make their wishes known, that they may be supplied, &c. And it is proper, and perhaps, necessary—that such intimations of the wishes of subscribers should be promptly given, before the surplus copies are disposed of in general sales—for many who are not subscribers will desire to obtain this large collection of important papers and speeches, on such moderate terms.

This supplement will contain—

1. The Virginia resolutions of 1798, concerning the alien and sedition laws.
2. An extract from the address to the people which accompanied those resolutions.
3. Answers of the states of Delaware, Massachusetts, New York, Connecticut, New Hampshire and Vermont, to the Virginia resolutions.
4. The Kentucky resolutions of 1798 and of 1799.
5. Mr. Madison's elaborate report on the Virginia resolutions, made to the house of delegates in the session of 1799-1800.
6. A letter from Thomas Jefferson Randolph, with a copy of the original draft of the Kentucky resolutions, which remains among the papers of his grandfather, and in his own hand writing.
7. Proceedings in the legislature of Pennsylvania, (1809), in the cause of George Olmstead.
8. Mr. Madison's letter to Mr. E. Everett, on nullification, state rights and federal powers—August 1830.
9. From the same to Mr. C. J. Ingersoll, of June 1831, on the same subject.
10. From the same to Mr. A. Stevenson, on the terms "common defence and general welfare," used in the constitution.
11. From the same to E. Livingston, on his [Mr. L.'s] interpretation of the Virginia proceedings of 1798-99—dated May, 1830; with an extract from Mr. Livingston's speech, referred to by Mr. Madison.
12. From the same to gov. Snyder, of Pennsylvania, (1809), on the Olmstead case.
13. Two letters from the same to Mr. Cabell, (1828), on the constitutional power of congress to impose a tariff for the encouragement of manufactures.
14. Extract from Mr. Jefferson's report as secretary of state, (1793), on "commercial restrictions"—and the right to "burthen," or exclude, foreign productions which come into competition with our own.
15. Mr. Jefferson's letter to Mr. Leiper, (1809), in favor of encouraging domestic manufactures.
16. Letter from Mr. Benjamin Austin, (1815), to Mr. Jefferson, and the reply of the latter, on the right and necessity "of placing the manufacturer by the side of the agriculturist," &c.
17. Extract from the circular of general George Washington, dated Newburg, 1783.
18. The proclamations of president Washington, (1794), concerning combinations to defeat the execution of the laws in certain parts of Pennsylvania.
19. Speech of president Washington to both houses of congress November 1794, chiefly concerning the disturbances in Pennsylvania.
20. Extract from the address of governor Mifflin, of Pennsylvania, to the legislature of the state, on the same subject.
21. A charge delivered by A. Addison, president of the court, to the grand jury of Alleghany county, Pennsylvania, September 1794.
22. The ratifications of the constitution of the United States by the people of Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Georgia, Maryland, South Carolina, New Hampshire, Virginia, New York, North Carolina, Rhode Island—and Vermont, in their several conventions.

*Many of the American mills work at the same high speed. ED. REG.

23. Bill reported by the committee on the judiciary in the senate of the United States, January 21, 1833, further to provide for the collection of duties on imports.

24. Report and bill of the same committee in the house of representatives, on the same subject—February 8, 1833.

25. The entire debate in senate, (and chiefly from the corrected speeches of the members), on the bill of the judiciary committee, so far as published, beginning with the opening speech of Mr. Wilkins, and ending with that of Mr. Ewing, with which the debate was concluded.

26. The resolutions offered by Messrs. Calhoun, Grundy and Clayton, and the debates thereon.

27. The speeches delivered in the house of representatives on similar questions, and previous to the passage of the bill from the senate.

28. To which will probably be added, an appendix—containing additional papers of "authority," as to the doctrine of state rights, nullification, secession, &c.

If after inserting the articles abovementioned or alluded to, any room shall remain—we have a superabundance of useful matter wherewith to overflow it.

We again beg leave to state, that the title page and table of contents for the last volume, will not issue until this supplement is completed—that the items of the latter may have their proper place in the index of the former, for more easy and certain reference to important subjects; and to repeat, that, though pecuniary profit has not induced us to encounter this additional labor,—we have no sort of willingness to lose money by it; and that copies of the collection will be offered for general sale* if the edition shall not be taken up by the subscribers for the REGISTER, early in the ensuing month.

CASE OF TOBIAS WATKINS.

From the National Intelligencer of March 13.

Ex-parte, Tobias Watkins. We stated, some days ago, that it was the intention of the counsel of doctor Watkins to institute further proceedings in this case. Since then, we understand that Messrs. Brent and Cox have failed in application to the supreme court to obtain its opinion as to the points upon which the court was divided, and that they were informed the court refused to give its opinion because the division was of such a nature as would require the judges to give separate opinions. This novel state of the case leaves not only the counsel of doctor Watkins, but the public, in darkness, as to the opinion and division of the court, upon the various points made in this important case. We also have understood, that the counsel have abandoned the intention of moving the court to reinstate the court, for the purpose of arguing the effect of a division in the court, upon an application to be discharged on a writ of habeas corpus, it having been intimated, that the practice of the supreme court was always, in both civil and criminal cases, to refuse a rule where the court was divided. The opinion of Messrs. Brent and Cox was, we understand, that where the court was divided upon an application for a rule like that in Watkins' case, the decision in England and the practice of the common law, entitled the party to his release, in being in favor of liberty. A fortiori, they agree, such practice ought to exist in this country and under our form of government. We are, however, authorized to state, that an application is about being made to the circuit court of the United States for this district, for the discharge of Dr. Watkins from his second alleged illegal imprisonment, and as that court is supposed to have, beyond any doubt, jurisdiction of the case, and can control its own writs if illegally issued, the counsel feel confident of success. We forbear, for the present, any further comment on the case.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

Greece. By the brig Angola, at New York, Intelligence is received that the division of Bavarian troops, destined for Greece to support the throne of king Otto, arrived at Trieste, December 20th, (the day the Angola left), and were to embark in two days for Piræus, where the convoy was to assemble. On the 21st the second division was expected to arrive; on the 22nd, the third; 26th, the fourth; 28th, the fifth and last; amounting in all to about 4,000 men. The troops which arrived on the 20th, elicited the general admiration of the people at Trieste. The Greek committee had also arrived. Admiral Miaulis expressed himself very much pleased with the young sovereign, from whom he had received marks of distinction.

The Falkland Islands. It is stated that a British vessel of war had proceeded to these islands to take possession of them "in the name of his Britannic majesty."

A quaker named Pease has been returned to parliament from South Durham, but he has misgivings, it would seem, from the annexed paragraph, about taking the oaths.

A member of the Society of Friends, by name Joseph Pease, has been placed at the head of the poll and returned for the southern division of the county of Durham. He is a man of considerable wealth and of great influence in that part of the county, as this election proves—there being in Southern Durham a vast number of persons who wear the same garb, and profess the same doctrines, as their honorable representative.

Mr. Joseph Pease, however, has some apprehensions as to his reception in the house of commons. He may not court, but he obviously anticipates martyrdom. He told the electors that "he was well aware that he must go through much persecution in their cause, and that he should not be surprised if the sergeant-at-arms be ordered to take him into custody."

These fears take their rise in Mr. Joseph Pease's honest and conscientious repugnance to take the necessary oaths. He declares that he cannot take an oath—that the taking of oaths is unlawful—and that he is resolved to contest their expediency with the speaker, at the hazard of being removed from the house by the sergeant-at-arms.

On the preceding election the Leeds Mercury says—We have this week the pleasure to see the first frank ever written upon a letter by a member of the Society of Friends in this country—we say the pleasure, for this, amongst hundreds of other instances by which we are surrounded, is an indication of the progress of that enlightened policy which has enabled our fellow subjects to exercise the functions of legislators without regard to sect or party.

Royal matters. The princess Victoria, daughter of the duke of Kent, aged 14, is now the presumptive heir to the British throne.

The duke of Cumberland comes next, and then his son, prince George, who is also 14 years of age. The duke does not bear a good character. The celebrated affair in which he made a figure, occasioned by the singular death of his valet, has affected the whole public mind unfavorably towards him. It is stated that the mother of the princess Victoria avoids him as she would a pestilence, and that she never suffers her daughter to come within the sphere of his observation or influence.

Central America. The people of this war-wexed country seem now to have peace among themselves; but are on bad terms with Mexico.

Buenos Ayres. We hear of no late battles in the provinces. The resignation of governor Rosas had been at length accepted, and gen. Juan Ramon Balcarce was elected (by the house of representatives) in his stead.

The apostolic vicar of Buenos Ayres, at the request of the government, has issued a decree reducing the number of holidays to ten, besides Sunday. All the half holidays are suppressed with the exception of that of San Jose. In an accompanying note by the minister of the home department, it is stated "that, including Sundays and other holidays, rainy days and contingencies of the weather, which render it impossible to work on the river La Plata there are now (i. e. before the reduction took place), more than 150 days in the year entirely lost as it regards labor!"

Colombia.—Divided into three parts, has present peace. The parts are the republics of Venezuela, New Granada, and Ecuador—the latter being acknowledged, by the decree of gen. Santander; but differences, and further sheddings of blood are feared from the generals, who have some degree of command, and wish for greater power.

Nullification in Mexico.—The mania of nullification appears to have seized upon our patriotic neighbors of Mexico. The Texas Advocate says—"The federal constitution is dissolved, and we are now without a constitution. Many of the states have refused to vote for a president, for senators or for representatives." By this nullifying proceeding on the part of the states, the government of the country is thrown into confusion.

FOREIGN NEWS.

By an arrival at New York, London papers of the evening of the 19th Jan. have been received.

The king of Holland has opened the Scheldt to the flags of all nations—those of Great Britain, France and Belgium excepted. The British commissioner or envoy in Portugal, lord Hervey, is negotiating for the peace of the country—by the retirement of Miguel from the kingdom, and the installation of Pedro's daughter as queen, with a regency.

Ireland was more and more disturbed—the most horrible outrages were frequently committed. Lord Anglesea was speedily to leave the viceroyalty.

Parliament was to meet on the 29th January, to elect a speaker—but would not commence business for a week after.

Mount Vesuvius was in a violent commotion. Continued explosions were heard in Naples.

A large reduction of the French army is expected—100,000 infantry, and 26,000 cavalry.

The king of Spain has associated his wife with him in the government of the kingdom—which was in a state of tranquillity. There is a report that Ibrahim Pacha had made a retrograde movement—and a general battle with him was expected. The grand vizier was at the head of 60,000 men.

DISCOVERY OF MINES IN CHILI.

The Avawano, an official journal, contains in the No. of the 9th June, 1832, the following document—

"The intendancy of Coquimbo Serana, 7th June, 1832, to the minister of the interior:—A wonderful discovery of silver ore has been made in the mountain chain of Topiapo, called Chancrilla and Mole. It is affirmed that the veins are immense. Since the 22d of May, sixteen, more or less rich, have been discovered; and travellers who have been upon the spot make the number even fifty. The ore is of the purest quality, and experienced miners entertain not the smallest doubt of the richness of this discovery."

(Signed)

"JOSE MARIA POONAVENTE."

*At one dollar for the supplement, in sheets—or 11½ cents; if neatly done up in boards.

The same paper contains the following article, dated Coquimbó, June, 1832.

"We have before us several letters from the most respectable persons of the province, who unanimously confirm the wonderful discovery which we have mentioned in a preceding number. The mine lies at the south of Topiapo; it extends about fifteen feet in length, and ten in breadth; it touches the following places—Chauercilla, Ritacus Pan de Azerear, Pagonales and Mole. Chance led to the discovery by a wood-cutter, who communicated his good fortune to one Godoi and Don Miguel Gallo; they resolved to keep the secret to themselves; but certain signs and traces, which they could not conceal, soon made the matter public. Four days after this, sixteen veins were already discovered—on the eighth day there were forty; and when the post left, fifty—not to mention the number of smaller veins, of which no notice was taken for the moment. A mass of ore which was purchased by an Englishman for two hundred piasters, proved to be worth a thousand. Besides the prodigious quantity of the ore, it is extremely rich in quality. The intendante has sent to the minister of the interior specimens from three different veins, the analysis of which proves what is here stated; and, as if it were not enough to give that district a name by a single event of this kind, a discovery has been made of rich gold mines in the adjacent canton of Jaicos; that hitherto uninhabited and desert mountain region, is, at this moment, animated by the presence of above 3,000 people."

There is no doubt that these important discoveries will have a great influence on the future political and commercial situation of the country. In one respect they have already been injurious—for the copper mines are abandoned by the workmen.

MR. SOUTHARD'S LETTER.

Trenton, February 25, 1833.

His excellency, Samuel L. Southard:

SIR—The undersigned, as a committee of the last joint meeting, have the honor of informing you, that you were appointed by that body, senator in congress of the United States for six years from the fourth day of March next, and of respectfully requesting your acceptance of the same,

With great respect, yours, &c.

ELIAS P. SEELEY, } committee, &c.
JOHN P. JACKSON, }

To the honorable Elias P. Seeley, vice president of the legislative council—and the hon. John P. Jackson, speaker of the general assembly.

SIR—I have been honored by your communication, by which I am informed that the joint meeting have conferred upon me, the office of senator in the congress of the United States, for six years from the fourth day of March next.

I beg you, sirs, to convey to the members of the joint meeting, my acceptance of the appointment—and the expression of my grateful sense of the confidence manifested towards me. It is the more deeply felt, because the duties and the responsibilities of the station are greatly enhanced by the present condition of our country—and because it is bestowed after a long period of public service, during which my conduct and opinions have been known to my fellow citizens—and after a recent expression of many of those opinions, in the discharge of the duties of my present office. I cannot but rejoice that my election gives me an assurance that those opinions have not been misunderstood, nor disapproved by the members of the joint meeting, however they have been misrepresented by some others.

In acting upon my own strong convictions in regard to constitutional questions and the policy of the country, I feel, that I shall but follow the wishes, and aid in protecting the interests of my fellow citizens. I believe with them, that the nullification of the laws of the union, by the authorities or people of a single state, is a heresy most dangerous to our institutions; and must be discountenanced and repressed; and the government amply and vigorously sustained, in the enforcement of the laws—that the power and the right of congress to protect the industry, of the country, clearly exist, and that their exercise cannot be surrendered without an obvious neglect of duty—that a sound and convenient currency is indissolubly connected to the common prosperity, and that it is not wise to destroy the means and instruments by which it has, heretofore, been secured to us—that the public lands are public property which ought neither to be given away, nor squandered upon objects which are not connected with the common interests of the whole—that the independence of the judiciary, is interwoven with the best portions of our institutions, and its defence while in the exercise of its legitimate authority, is the high duty of every public agent. While endeavoring, in my humble measure, to sustain these and other important principles, I shall rely on the generous confidence of my fellow citizens—and feel great consolation that in the discharge of my duties, I am associated with a colleague, in whose known opinions I so generally concur, and on whose purity, intelligence, and faithfulness we all have entire reliance.

I am, very respectfully yours, &c. &c.

SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD.

Trenton, Feb. 26, 1833.

MR. VAN BUREN AT PHILADELPHIA.

Philadelphia, Feb. 25, 1833.

SIR—Entertaining the same sentiments of respect for your talents and patriotism as a statesman and republican, as the great body of the people of the United States, by whose suffrages you have recently been elevated to the second office of the republic, the undersigned, on behalf of their fellow citizens, embrace this opportunity of your presence in the second city of the union, or inviting you to partake of a public dinner, in which they, in common with many of their political friends, would gladly join.

The situation of the country is so peculiar at this moment, that public men, whose sentiments are known to be in favor of moderate but firm measures to meet the present crisis, deserve and ought to receive the countenance of those who have only at heart the good of their country. The democracy of Pennsylvania, have from the commencement of the government, always shown themselves firm for those principles and measures which will preserve the union, as well as the rights of the states, the prosperity of the country, and the advancement of civil liberty. In this sentiment, they unite with their brethren throughout the country, by whose suffrages you have been called to give your aid and support to the measures of the present chief now at the head of the government.

Believing that the confidence of the country has not been misplaced, in elevating you to the high office, the duties of which you will shortly assume, and that the wise measures of the president will always receive your firm support, they beg to assure you of their esteem for your character as a statesman, and respect for your private worth as a citizen.

With sentiments of high consideration, we have the honor to be your friends and fellow citizens, Robert Patterson, Samuel Badger, James Page, Joseph Worrell, William Stewart, Thomas Cove, Robert B. Dodson, Wm. J. Leiper, Christain Kneass, Frederick Stoecker, Jno. M. Barclay, C. Hickman, T. W. L. Freeman.

Philadelphia, Feb. 25, 1833.

GENTLEMEN:—My stay in Philadelphia will be too short to enable me to comply with your polite request. But I am not therefore, I assure you, the less sensible of your courtesy and kindness. There is no portion of my fellow citizens whose good opinion I value more highly than that of those you represent, and I shall ever cherish with the most grateful feelings, the flattering and affectionate expression contained in the communication with which you have honored me.

I concur freely in the views you express in regard to the necessity and propriety of moderate but firm measures to meet the present crisis in our public affairs. The inflexible support which has been given by the democracy of Pennsylvania to those principles and measures which will best preserve the union as well as the rights of the states, promote the prosperity of the country, and advance the cause of civil liberty, will be attested by all who are in any degree conversant with our public history. It is by this patriotic and honorable course of her citizens, that Pennsylvania has acquired so large a share of the respect and confidence of the nation.

The present condition of our country is, as you justly observe, a peculiar one; yet I cannot but think that the dangers which menaced our institutions, are already quietly, lessened, and bid fair to be speedily and happily removed; it is to me most obvious that the difficulties attending a satisfactory adjustment of the tariff, are now reduced to questions of time merely. The repeated and earnest recommendations of the president to congress in favor of a reduction of duties to the revenue standard, by means of a law, which shall be certain in its ultimate effect, but yet so gradual in its operation, as to give the greatest extent of protection to existing establishments, that shall be found consistent with the paramount obligation to relieve the people from all burthens which are not necessary to the support of government—recommendations, on the propriety of which he so distinctly placed himself before the American people at the late presidential canvass, and in which he was so triumphantly sustained by a vast majority of them—seem to be now unembarrassed by any opposition, and to have become the favorite and universal sentiment. These important points established, there can surely be nothing in the residue of the subject, nor in the details of a bill, by which they are to be carried into effect, that, if acted upon, in a proper spirit, may not be overcome without threatening the public peace, or endangering the stability of our union. Any measure which shall successfully accomplish the objects proposed, and which shall be of a character to recommend itself to the moderate men on both sides of the question (the only securities we can have for its permanency) will, without doubt, receive the approbation of the people and restore the different sections of the country to those relations of peace, affection and good fellowship, which are so indispensable to the prosperity and happiness of each and all. That these great objects shall not fail for the want of such an arrangement, is so emphatically demanded by public sentiment as to ally all apprehension: should the present congress, unfortunately, be unable to effect it, we may count with confidence upon the speedy and successful efforts of the next. Until this desirable result shall be attained, we have a safe guaranty against violence and discords in the discreet exercise of executive authority, the pervading patriotism of our countrymen, and that sacred inextinguishable love of union which is so predominantly and master-feeling in an American bosom.

You do me but justice in expecting a sincere support on my part, of the administration of our worthy and venerable chief magistrate. I regard that as the most useful and honorable portion of my public life, which was spent under his immediate direction, and cannot fail to appreciate, as I ought, the honor of being permitted to co-operate in the advancement of the public interest, with one in whose capacity and patriotism, my confidence is unqualified.

Be pleased to make my sincere acknowledgments to those you represent, for this mark of their respect, and to accept for yourselves individually, the assurances of my sincere regard.

M. VAN BUREN.

OHIO CANAL REPORT.

The eleventh annual report of the canal commissioners states that the works committed to their charge are completed, with the exception of the lower lock at Portsmouth; and those at Cincinnati, for connecting the canals with the Ohio river; that the materials for these are collecting, and that the work will be prosecuted as soon as the state of the water in the Ohio river will permit.

During the year ending Dec. 31, 1832, the gross amount collected for tolls and water rents were,

On the Ohio canal, $82,867 40

" Miami canal, 40,936 81

Making a gross sum collected on both canals, of $123,794 21

It is estimated that the prevalence of the cholera at New York and Cincinnati produced a reduction in the revenue of the canals, of $30,000; but notwithstanding this and other causes of fluctuations in trade, they express the confident belief that the revenue from them will continue to increase, as the resources of the country are developed, and that their predicted benefits to the state are confirmed by past experience.

Payments during the year, and total cost.—The total amounts of payments on contracts, and to superintendents of repairs, for the year ending on the 10th of Nov. 1832, is,

" Miami canal, 52,085 95

Total disbursements for work on the canals, $362,490 53

Wages, subsistence, and incidental expenses of engineers and acting commissioners, $18,178 53

Other canal commissioners and clerk, 667 68

Damages awarded, 3,988 80

For real estate to accommodate water power, 3 0 00

Total disbursements for the year ending 30th Nov. 1832, 385,625 59

To which add amount paid-up to Nov. 1831, as per last year's report, 4,778,099 65

Making a total cost of the canals, &c. up to Dec. 1, 1832, $5,163,725 24

The aggregate length of the canals is 400 miles, comprising 184 lift locks, overcoming a total amount of ascent and descent of 1,547 feet; 9 guard locks; 22 aqueducts; 242 culverts, 182 of stone and 60 of wood; 9 dams for crossing streams; and 12 feeder dams. Both canals have a minimum breadth of 40 feet at the water line, 26 feet at bottom and 4 feet deep. The locks are of stone, 15 feet broad, 90 feet in length between the gates, admitting boats 78 by 14 feet 10 inches.

COMMERCE OF BOSTON.

We copy the following very interesting article from the "Boston Courier," to shew the immense importance of the late much abused, and now diseased, or deceased, "American System." Look at some of the items—60,011 bales of cotton—386,809 barrels of flour, of which 127,233 were from the Hudson, 141,181 from the Chesapeake, 17,365 from the Delaware, &c.—1,207,676 bushels of corn, 47,660 rye, 178,771 oats, &c. chiefly from the Chesapeake—and 22,954 hds. (domestic) molasses; and these, or nearly all these, for the home consumption. The progress of such importations is beautiful, as stated for the three last years.

7-Increase in two years—bales of cotton 14,808; barrels of flour 76,812; bushels of corn, (one year) 526,545.

To the editor of the Courier: I send you a statement, in detail, of the commerce of Boston, for 1832. Compared with previous years, it presents a large and truly gratifying increase in our trade, which must be cheering to every one. It appears after all, our factories have not quite ruined our commerce.

Foreign arrivals—American 842, English 211, French 3, Sicilian 3, Spanish 2, Dutch 1, Danish 1, Swedish 1—Total 1,064. Ships and barques 165, brigs 536, schooners 360, sloops 2, galliot 1. Coastwise—Ships 62, brigs 514, schooners 2,332, sloops 638, steam boats 2—Total 3,538.

It should be observed that a large number of vessels arrive coastwise, whose cargoes are not usually reported, and a great portion of these are from the state of Maine. The number of this class of vessels, such as wood coasters, fishing vessels, &c. amount probably to two or three thousand annually. The list of coasters above named, and the tables of imports which follow, were taken from City Hall books.

Import of Cotton, 1832.—From New Orleans 25,693, Charleston 15,470, Savannah 9,916, Mobile 7,213, New York 679, North Carolina 467, Virginia 279, Gloucester 180, Florida 58, other ports 58—Total 60,011 bales.

NEW YORK INSPECTIONS OF FLOUR AND MEAL, &c.

From the Shipping List.

By the report of the flour inspector in this city, made to the legislature of the state, it appears the amount of inspections from 1st January, 1832, to 1st January, 1833, were as follows:

Wheat flour.

	Average value per brl.

[3—The whole inspection of wheat flour in 1832, being added up, was 840,029 barrels; of which 195,614 were exported, leaving 644,415 unaccounted for, a three times greater quantity than foreigners would receive, though a glorious trade has been opened with the West Indies, in British vessels, through British North American ports! So even at New York, "the great commercial emporium," the home market for the farmers is three times (and more) more valuable than the foreign one. And by the preceding statement concerning the commerce of Boston, it appears that at that place of deposit for the supply of a portion of the manufacturers of Massachusetts, is shown that nearly twice as much flour was imported at Boston as was sent to all foreign places from New York—independent of the supply of the Boston market by inland transportations.]

CONVENTION WITH FRANCE.

Office of the board of comm'rs. under the convention with France. Washington City, March 5, 1833.

The board having considered and disposed of all the memorials before it, passed the following orders:

1. Ordered, That all persons having claims to be presented to this board, memorials of which have not been filed with the secretary, or, which being filed, have not been received by the board at its present session, by reason of defects in the same, to file memorials of their said claims, with the secretary, on or before the 10th day of June next; after which day, no new memorial will be received, unless upon good cause shown, why the same was not filed as herein before required; and that each of said memorials, so required to be filed, be prepared and verified in conformity to the orders of this board of the 11th day of September, 1832.

2. Ordered, That the memorials which have been received by the board, at its present session, be set down at the expiration of six months from the date of this order, for examination upon the proof, filed with the secretary previous to that period, and that all memorials that shall hereafter be received by the board, be set down for examination, in like manner, at the expiration of six months from the date of their reception; but if any claimant shall wish his memorial set down for examination at an earlier day, it may be done at any time upon application made to the board for that purpose; and if any claimant can show good cause why his memorial should not be set down for examination at the expiration of said period of six months, upon application, and such good cause shown to the board, further time will be allowed him for that purpose.

3. Ordered, That the arguments in each case which has been suspended, be filed with the secretary on or before the 10th day of June next; and that in the case of every memorial that shall hereafter be received in which the claimant intends to submit an argument to the board, such argument shall be filed with the secretary, before or on the day his memorial shall be set down for examination, and no proof, argument, or other document, shall be received after the memorial is set down for examination, except by special leave of the board; and no paper shall be withdrawn after being filed, without such leave.

And that time may be allowed to claimants to prepare and file their memorials, as above directed—procure their proofs, and prepare their cases for examination, it is further,

Ordered, That when the board shall adjourn to-day, it will adjourn to meet again on the 10th day of June next; at which time, it will proceed to examine and decide on such memorials as may have been filed with the secretary previous to the said 10th day of June next, pursuant to the above orders. By order of the board, JOHN E. FROST, secretary.

LEGISLATURE OF MAINE.

To the senate and house of representatives:

The order requesting the governor "to communicate to the legislature the report of the commissioner on the north eastern boundary, appointed under the resolve of March 3, 1832, if the same has been received by him, with any other documents which he may deem proper, and as soon as the same can, in his judgment, be communicated consistently with the public good," has received the attentive consideration of this department, which has come to the conclusion, that the publication of these documents, at this time, could not fail to be prejudicial to the success of the negotiation instituted by the president with Great Britain in relation to the north eastern boundary; and in that view, could not be consistent with the public good, but adverse to the interests of the state, and of the United States. The legislature and people can be assured that no definite action will be, or can be had in relation to the disputed territory, on the part of this state, till the whole subject shall receive the consideration of the legislature, to whom, at the proper time, the documents will be communicated, and by whom such direction will be given to this important concern as shall best comport with the rights, honor, and interest of the state.

Michigan. But Massachusetts has something to say about the bargain.

An account of the proceedings had on the preceding message says:—"It was referred by the senate to a select committee; but, an hour afterwards, a motion to reconsider the vote of reference was carried by a vote of 11 to 9. A motion was then made to lay the communication on the table; but was withdrawn, that it might be sent to the house. In the house, a motion to refer it to a select committee was rejected, 86 to 31, and it was finally returned to the senate.

"It is obvious from the language of the governor's message, that a report has been made by the commissioners. What the tenor of that report may be, is not fully known; but from the language used in the debate relative to the disposition of the communication above referred to, there seems to exist a persuasion that the commissioners have entered into a negotiation for a surrender of the territory in dispute, on the receipt of some indemnity. Among other objections to the action of the commissioners, the following was suggested by Mr. Boutelle, a member of the senate:

"Suppose our commissioners make a bargain and obtain an 'indemnity,' we cede away territory of which half the soil belongs to Massachusetts, and that commonwealth loses her share, or looks to us as responsible for selling her land."

Just before the adjournment of the legislature, the following resolutions were passed:

Resolved, That so much of the resolve passed the 3d day of March, 1832, respecting the north eastern boundary, as provides for the submission to the legislature, "for approval or rejection," of the agreement or treaty therein contemplated to be made by the commissioners therein mentioned, be, and the same is hereby repealed.

Resolved, That no arrangement, provisional agreement or treaty, already made, or that may hereafter be made, under, or in pursuance of, the resolve to which this is additional, shall have any binding force, effect, or operation, until the same shall have been submitted to the people of this state, in their primary assemblies, and approved by a majority of their votes.

LEGISLATURE OF MARYLAND.

IN THE HOUSE OF DELEGATES.

Mr. Wright, of Dorchester, submitted the following preamble and resolutions:

By the house of delegates, March 4th, 1833.

The legislature of the state of Delaware having represented to this general assembly, that in the opinion of the legislature of the state of Delaware, it would greatly promote the interest, comfort and prosperity of the inhabitants of the peninsula, formed by the waters of the Chesapeake and Delaware bays, if they were united under one government:

That it comports with the wishes and views of the people of the state of Delaware, that the people of the Eastern Shore of Maryland, and those of Delaware, should be united under one government, and that the region of country inhabited by them respectively, should be denominated the state of Delaware. And that the governor of Delaware is authorised, in case these views of the state of Delaware should meet the approbation of the legislature of the state of Maryland, to appoint three commissioners on the part of the state of Delaware, to meet such as may be appointed on the part of the state of Maryland, to carry the measures into execution, and settle the preliminaries and details thereof, subject to the final ratification of the legislatures of the two states, and that of the congress of the United States;—therefore,

Be it resolved by the general assembly of Maryland, That, holding the pursuit of happiness as the unalienable right of all men, and that political associations and governments are but means to gain that desirable end, we refer the overture made to this general assembly, by the legislature of the state of Delaware, to the candid and serious consideration of our fellow citizens, in the respective counties on the Eastern Shore of Maryland, who are immediately and most particularly interested in the proposition. And we leave the subject to be first entertained by our fellow citizens on the Eastern Shore, in a general convention, to be held among themselves, or in such other way as to them may seem most fit.

Resolved by the general assembly of Maryland, That in case it should be authentically notified to the governor of Maryland by any proper authority from the counties on the Eastern Shore of this state, that it is the wish and pleasure of the people in those several counties, that commissioners should be appointed on the part of the state of Maryland, to meet those to be appointed by the state of Delaware, in order to adjust preliminaries and details, that all may the better understand the precise terms of the proposed change, before any final decision is made. That the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the council, is hereby authorised and empowered to appoint three commissioners from the Eastern Shore of Maryland, for that purpose, as soon after the notification as may be—and the said commissioners are directed to make full report to the governor, to be by him laid before the general assembly of Maryland, at the earliest period after its reception.

Resolved, That the governor of this state be requested to forward a copy of these resolutions to the governor of the state of Delaware, with a solicitation to present them to the legislature of that state.

Which were read.

Mr. Jones moved to refer said preamble and resolutions, and the resolutions of the state of Delaware, in relation to the union of the Eastern Shore counties of this state with the said state of Delaware, to a select committee, to be composed of one member from each of the Eastern Shore counties.

Mr. Merrick moved to amend the motion of Mr. Jones, by striking out, "Eastern Shore counties," and inserting "counties of the state."

Mr. Nicols moved to lay the motion and amendment on the table; resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. George A. Thomas, submitted the following order:

Ordered, That the governor be requested to cause the flag to be hoisted on the state house this day at 12 o'clock, in honor of the inauguration of the president and vice president of the U. States of America.

Which was read.

Mr. Cotnam moved to amend said order, by striking out these words, "and vice president."

Resolved in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. George A. Thomas, the yeas and nays were ordered, and appeared as follows—affirmative 34, negative 26.

The question was then put, "will the house adopt said order, as amended?"

Resolved in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. Jenkins, the yeas and nays were ordered, and appeared as follows—yeas 59, nays 2.

Mr. Jones submitted the following order:

By the house of delegates, March 4th, 1833.

Ordered, That his excellency the governor, be requested to cause the flag of the union to be hoisted over the capitol, to-morrow at 12 o'clock, M. in honor, and as expressive of our approbation of the patriotic exertions of Henry Clay, and those senators and representatives in the congress of the United States, who co-operated with him in effecting a compromise of the tariff, and in endeavoring to restore harmony to our country.

Which was read.

Mr. Turner moved to amend said order, by striking out the name of Henry Clay.

Determined in the negative.

Mr. Jenkins moved to amend said order, by inserting after the word "approbation," the following:—"and Andrew Jackson, president of the United States, for recommending in his annual message, of December last, a gradual and protective reduction of the tariff, with a just regard of the great interests invested in manufactures."

Determined in the negative.

On motion by Mr. Jenkins, the yeas and nays were ordered, and appeared as follows:—yeas 21, nays 42.

Mr. Holmes moved to postpone said order indefinitely.

Determined in the negative.

Mr. Wright, of Queen Anne's, offered as a substitute for said order, the following:

Ordered, That in the exertions which have been made by the distinguished individuals in congress to effect a modification of the tariff, or their exertions in favor of any other subject, they did nothing more than their duty, and that it does not comport with the dignity of freemen to be offering their thanks to any, for the performance of nothing but their duty.

Which was read.

Mr. Turner moved to lay the order and substitute on the table.

Determined in the negative.

Mr. Jenkins moved to amend said order, by adding at the end thereof the following:

And to William Wilkins, senator from Pennsylvania, who reported the bill further to provide for the collection of the duties on imports, thereby affording to the president of the United States power to support the dignity of the nation, and the supremacy of the constitutional laws of the land, and those senators and representatives who voted for the said bill.

Mr. Merrick called for the previous question, and being demanded by a majority of the members present, the said previous question was put, viz. shall the main question be now put? and it was resolved in the affirmative.

On motion by Mr. Jenkins, the yeas and nays were ordered, and appeared as follows:—yeas 33, nays 27.

The question was then put on the amendment, as proposed by Mr. Jenkins;

Determined in the negative.

On motion by Mr. Jenkins, the yeas and nays were ordered and appeared as follows:—yeas 33, nays 41.

The question was then put on the adoption of the substitute, offered by Mr. Wright, of Queen Anne's.

Determined in the negative.

On motion by Mr. Holmes, the yeas and nays were ordered, and appeared as follows:—yeas 21, nays 37.

The question then recurred, and was put on the adoption of the original order;

Resolved in the affirmative.

On motion by Mr. Ely, the yeas and nays were ordered, and appeared as follows:—yeas 40, nays 22.

Mr. Jenkins asked leave of the house, to enter upon the journal his reason for his vote on said order;

On the question being put, will the house grant the leave?

It was resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. Jenkins then offered as his reason, the following:

"Because he believes that the said order was designed as a party movement."

On motion by Mr. Harris, seconded by two other members who voted in the majority, the house reconsidered their vote upon said leave;

The question was then again put, Will the house grant the leave?

Resolved in the affirmative.

THE NEW TARIFF LAW.

The following is from the Charleston Mercury of the 23d February. The writer is a very pious man—perhaps a little profane—but it is from the "right side of the Tweeds," and may not be impeached! We have marked a few words in italics and SMALL CAPITALS, to shew the notions of the writer.

"Mr. Clay's bill is the subject which now engages all tongues and occupies all attention. And well it may: for it was certainly as unexpected, as it is gratifying, considering the source from which it comes. Who would have thought that our wounds would have been healed by the hand that inflicted them? or that peace would have been restored by the individual who has done more than any other to destroy it? or that the union would have been preserved by him who brought it literally to the verge of the precipice? There is something, not only peculiarly right and beautiful in this, but that shows distinctly the superintending Providence of God in the affairs of our country, and that as he blesses and sustains the cause of justice, so he works out its triumph even by the instrumentality of the chief of our oppressors. Is it not right that he who has injured us, should be the means of redressing our wrongs? And is it not retributive justice, that even at a period like this, when all hope of relief apparently was gone, and South Carolina was calmly preparing for the field, determined if she could not regain, not to survive her liberty, he who had forced her to resistance, who had driven her to secession, should now appear as her friend and champion? WHO DOES NOT PERCEIVE IN THIS THE HAND OF THE ALMIGHTY SUPPORTING THE CAUSE OF THE OPPRESSED, AND TURNING EVEN THE HEART OF THE OPPRESSOR TO THE PURPOSES OF JUSTICE? What less than the power of God could have induced Mr. Clay to consent to the abandonment of that system of which he is the father, and which he has zealously maintained against all our petitions and remonstrances, even to the present hour?—What less than that power could have torn him from his darling policy, and from all his cherished notions of government, and have induced him to sacrifice them all upon the altar of peace and union?"

"Really, Mr. Editor, I know not how others think or feel upon this subject, but, for myself, as I have never doubted that our cause was just and that the God of justice would ensure its triumph, so I perceive in this movement of Mr. Clay a distinct manifestation of the DIVINE INTERPOSITION in our favor, and of the overruling care and protection of that BEING who makes the wrath of man to praise HIM, by making even our greatest enemy himself the instrument of our deliverance from tyranny. Let us be grateful to God, that as he gave us intelligence to understand our rights, and firmness and resolution to maintain them, so he now opens a prospect of peaceable success, in a way which HE only could have opened, if not by actually converting our principal antagonist to a friend, at least by turning his thoughts to harmony and conciliation. As to the bill itself, there are but two or three questions worthy of consideration. Ought it to satisfy the south? Will it become an act? How will it affect Mr. Clay in the different sections of the union? In relation to the first point, I have no hesitation to say, for one, that it ought to satisfy the south. I could have wished, indeed, that the period for the final reduction of the tariff to the revenue standard had been shorter, but the time fixed, long as it is, ought not to constitute an insuperable objection. The great objects are, to abolish the protective policy, and to reduce the revenue to the legitimate wants of the government. Both of these objects will be accomplished by this measure. It will reduce the protective duties, biennially, till they come down to 20 per cent. and after that on a uniform ad valorem duty will be laid upon all articles indiscriminately, except such as may be admitted duty free. HERE THEN EVERY TILING IS OFFERED FOR WHICH WE HAVE CONTENDED. THE BILL GIVES UP THE PROTECTIVE PRINCIPLE, AND WILL ABANDON THE PROTECTIVE POLICY; we give them time, so that the system may be let down gradually, without any PUBLIC CONVULSION or individual ruin."

The following is from the Charleston "Mercury" of the 5th inst. We regret the necessity of admitting that certain of its most important points seem true—and that the friends of "free trade," so called, as well as of "nullification," have gained a victory—for the time being. A little more modesty, however, in proclaiming it, might have been well—under the circumstances of the case. We add some extracts from the "Courier" and "Patriot"—union papers.

From the Charleston Mercury.

THE ADJUSTMENT.

It will be seen that Mr. Clay's bill for the gradual reduction of the tariff to the revenue standard has passed the house of representatives, and there is no doubt that it has also passed the senate and become a law. This is a result which we confess we did not anticipate. Henry Clay, the father of the American System, after his long and zealous advocacy, and after carrying through the abominable tariff of 1832, has found it necessary, even before the time appointed for that bill to go into operation, to abandon it, and to introduce a bill providing for the eventual reduction of duties to the amount of revenue "necessary for the economical administration of the government!" This is indeed surprising; and although the provisions of the bill fall short of what we could have desired, and are not such as the south had a right to demand, and in strict justice to insist upon—yet we cannot but hail with gratification this decided evidence of a disposition on the part of congress to do justice, to respect the constitution, and restore the sound principles of the government.

The final reduction is too long deferred. Four or five years would have been a sufficient concession of time to the manufacturers, before the reduction was completed: and 15* and not 20 per cent. might have been safely assumed as the extent of duty to be ultimately allowed them, and as being a rate sufficiently high to raise the amount necessary for the economical administration of the government. The cash duties—and the home valuation are also objectionable features of the bill. Still it has been a compromise, between our just claims, and the vested interests of the manufacturers, which immediate and full justice to the south would have involved in certain ruin—a consummation, which whether merited or not, the south did not desire. In making such a compromise, some obnoxious provisions were unavoidably to be permitted. The principle too has been yielded to us, for which we contended from the first, that revenue, and not protection, should be the object of duties; and it has been yielded under a pledge that guarantees to us, that protection of manufacturers will not be hereafter again assumed as the object of legislation. A pledge which, even if it should be violated, will secure us a decided resistance against all attempts to return to the American System. As therefore, we have never complained merely of the amount of the exactions levied for the benefit of the manufacturers—but contended against the principle, that being yielded and the definite prospect of full relief secured, we have gained the main point, and mastered the citadel of the odious system, and we may submit to the concession of time for the manufacturers to shape their speculations to the new arrangement, though we do think that a more than reasonable period has been allowed them, considering how long the south has been denied even the hope of redress at the hands of congress.

We rejoice therefore in the prospect of a pacification of the confederacy, in spite of the inauspicious influences which have been exerted, and which until now induced us to despair of a peaceable issue of the struggle, which has shaken our union to its foundation, though we never despaired of the ultimate triumph of the good old cause. We are of opinion that South Carolina has not indecumbent now left her for a further act of nullification, and that it is probable that when the convention reassembles, no new ordinance of nullification will be adopted, that already passed, having now been rendered inoperative by the abolition of the obnoxious enactments against which it was framed to operate. Our convention will not, we think, reject a compromise for which our own delegation and that of the whole south voted in solid phalanx; against which we are glad to see recorded the votes of all the ultra-tariffites and which none from the south sought to embarrass, but a few underling implements of the kitchen cabinet. This is our present impression, though events may intervene which we do not anticipate, which may require further action for the defence of their rights on the part of the people of South Carolina.

The passage of Clay's bill effectually kills the enforcing bill, which, however, from the indications in the house, will probably pass by a large majority. If so, it may be considered as nothing more than an abolition of spleen. It will record the spite of the administration against certain men, and shew what enormities it would perpetrate, were the opportunity afforded. But the president will have been effectually precluded from the opportunity of chastising our resistance, by the removal of all motive to our resistance, and by there consequently being no resistance for him to punish. The ultra-tariffites will, in revenge, and from principle, combine to pass the enforcing bill. Our convention will do no more than declare it null and void; and it will remain dead upon the statute book, "brutum fulmen" a monument of the corruption of the times—a record of treason to the constitution and liberty, which its authors will ere long wish in vain to have utterly erased from the memory of the republic. The passage of this bill will be ardently desired by the administration, as some compensation for the heavy blows which have fallen in such quick succession upon them of late; and they will claim it as a triumph of the principles of the proclamation, but it will be an empty triumph, as worthless as that of the bufoon tyrant of Rome, who, returning from his pompous and futile invasion of Britain, consoled himself by picking up, and brought back as trophies the shells which he had gathered on the sea shore.

From the Charleston Courier, March 5.

The question settled.—The Washington papers, received by the mail yesterday, confirm the gratifying intelligence as to the adjustment of the tariff, received the day before by the way of New York; and contain the additional information, that on Tuesday last, Mr. Clay's bill, as a substitute for Mr. Verplanck's finally passed the house of representatives, by a majority of 34 votes, and was sent to the senate for concurrence, where, at the date of the last accounts, it was rapidly progressing to "the consummation devoutly to be wished," through the usual forms of legislation. There can be no doubt that Mr. Clay's bill, ere congress adjourned, must have passed both houses, received the signature of the president, and become the law of the land.

*We wish that the revenue duty was instantly reduced to five per cent. "Feeling has no fellow." Ed. Reg.

We cannot but indulge in the expression of our heartfelt gratification, at this unexpected and auspicious termination of a controversy, which has been such a prolific source of mischief, political, commercial and social, in our community, and which, as it were, but yesterday threatened to plunge us in all the horrors of civil war, and lay in ruins the noble edifice of union, erected by our fathers, as the palladium of our liberties. The union has been thus once more saved, in the spirit of concession and compromise, that presided at its formation. The settlement of this question has taken place too, at a time in other respects most opportune—at a period, when the government had assumed the attitude becoming the assertion of its lawful supremacy, and when nullification, the spirit of evil that had crept for purposes of mischief into our political paradise, had received the rebuke and reprobation of every section of the union. We cannot then but commend this act of our national legislature, as a magnanimous concession from the strong to the weak, dictated by a spirit of conciliation that will disarm the enemies of the government, and a spirit of wisdom that will strengthen the ties and perpetuate the institutions, that constitute us one people.

From the Southern Patriot, March 4.

Gratifying intelligence. We have the satisfaction of announcing the passage of Mr. Clay's bill in the house of representatives on last Tuesday, by a majority of thirty-four votes. It has no doubt before this become the law of the land. We do not think this is as good a bill as we had reason to expect, but we hail it with gratification, as assuring peace to the country, and as it is not binding on future congresses, however, individuals who may have voted for it, consider themselves under a pledge of honor not to disturb the arrangement to which they have lent a sanction, we shall be able to see the working of the measure long before the lapse of the period when it is to receive its final character. It is to be hoped now that the wounds which have been inflicted on the peace of this community by the deadly breaches which have been made in the social charities and enjoyments of its members, will be permanently healed. Let us all forget and forgive, in the spirit of liberal minds and generous dispositions, the mutual provocations and injuries to which the late unhappy controversy has led. Let us bury all feuds, and banish to the shades of everlasting oblivion, the demon of party. Let us, in short, recollect that we are citizens of a common country; and, however we may differ about the means of glorifying and exalting it; the end we all have in view being the same, mutual charity dictates generous oblivion of all past differences.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Supplemental report of the minority on the subject of the bank.
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 2, 1833.

Mr. Polk from the minority of the committee of ways and means, made the following supplemental report:

Since the body of the former report submitted by the minority of the committee of ways and means, was drawn up, the correspondence with the western offices which had been called for, has been received, and they ask to submit the following additional report in confirmation of the views already submitted in relation to the western debt. It is to be observed as stated in the former report, that the exchange committee in their report state, that "as soon as it was known that the agent had arrived in England, and that an arrangement of some kind would be accomplished, no time was lost in communicating to the board the fact that the preparations of the bank were such as to make it practicable to secure the usual facilities to the community." The subject was therefore immediately brought to the view of the board in the manner stated in the following extract from the minutes. These minutes are dated "Bank of the United States, September 21st, 1832," and conclude with authorising the committee on the offices "to modify the instructions under which the officers of the bank have been acting, at such points and in such manner as they may deem most conducive to the interests of the bank." Instructions were addressed to such of the western officers as would most sensibly feel the restrictions, authorising them to resume the purchase of domestic exchange, and draw checks on the bank.

As the information that "an arrangement of some kind would be accomplished" in England, did not reach the exchange committee before the 1st October, it was difficult to perceive how it could have had any influence in producing the proceedings on the 21st. It now appears by the correspondence with the western branches, that they were not produced by that cause, but by an apprehension for the safety of the Lexington office, which the other offices in that quarter were called upon to sustain.

On the 11th September, as appears by the correspondence, the cashier of the Lexington branch wrote to the principal bank as follows, viz: "The disposition by organized concert, to make a run for specie seems to increase. Since the 28th May, we have paid out about $23,000, and in the last 7 days $9,300." "We have been apprised of calls that will be made for about $25,000 which we are looking for every hour," &c. On the 18th Sept. the cashier of the principal bank wrote to the Lexington branch as follows, viz: "Your letter of the 11th instant, to the late acting cashier has been received and we have in consequence to despatch by the mail to-morrow, two of our clerks, Samuel Mason, Jr., and Edward Wheeler, with fifty thousand dollars in U. States gold coin for your office. This sum we trust will put you quite at your ease, at least until you can receive a supply of dollars from New Orleans. In addition to the other offices to which you have written for aid, that at Cincinnati may be resorted to."

On the 14th September the cashier at Lexington wrote that the demand upon them still continued.

On the 21st, the day on which the proceeding before adverted to took place, the president of the principal bank wrote to the Lexington branch as follows, viz:

Bank United States, September 21, 1832.

DEAR SIR—I received this morning your letter of the 14th inst. and in consequence have requested the cashier to send immediately an additional sum of $60,000 in gold, which with the previous remittance of $50,000 and the aids which I hope you will have received before this time from some of the neighboring offices, will place you at your ease. If from day to day as we hear from you there should seem to be a necessity for a greater supply, it will be forwarded to you, meanwhile you will take care of course to keep out of the way of any large demands by confining your receipts to the paper of your own office; and keeping your business within safe limits.

Very respectfully, yours,

(Signed),

N. BIDDLE, president.

In addition to these $110,000, $10,000 more are furnished from Louisville, $30,000 from St. Louis, $25,000 from Natchez, and $17,000 from New Orleans, making in all $275,000.

This is sufficient, without the aid of the news of the arrangement in Europe, which could not have been received until more than a week afterward, to account for the proceedings of the 21st September, and the instructions sent to those western branches which were expected to sustain the branch at Lexington.

In relation to the condition of the western debt, involving the safety of the institution, the correspondence with the western branches affords evidence, not before the committee when their former report was drawn up, and which goes strongly to confirm the opinions therein expressed.

To Mr. Beaman, the following question was propounded, viz: "Of the amount of domestic bills of exchange reported in the monthly statements of the year 1832, do you believe any considerable proportion to be of the character of accommodation paper to be renewed by drawing and redrawing between the bank and its branches, or between several branches? Answer. If any, it must be a very limited amount, because the directors discountenanced and refused, when they knew it to be such, and I presume the same course to be followed in the branches, which have instructions from the mother bank to guard against that description of paper.

Mr. Eyme was asked. Is there any amount of the bills of exchange discounted or purchased by the bank, which consists of accommodation paper produced by drawing and redrawing? Answer. I know of none—such paper is not countenanced by the bank.

To Mr. Lippincott, the following was propounded: "Of the amount of domestic bills of exchange reported in the monthly statements of the years 1831–2, do you believe any considerable proportion to be of the character of accommodation paper to be renewed by drawing and redrawing between the bank and the branches or between the several branches? Answer. I don't recollect of any."

Mr. Lippincott was also asked: Have the directors of the bank the means of detecting any habitual practice of drawing and redrawing just referred to, if it should exist between the branches when carried to any extent? Answer. They have, by means of the periodical returns of the branches to the mother bank of the business done at these branches respectively.

Of Mr. Eyme and Mr. Ewam, similar questions were asked, who, each gave similar replies.

The preceding testimony of the two members of the exchange committee, one of whom was also chairman of the committee on the offices, is before the house, and we take the following extract from their report, viz:

"In further illustration of the character of the western debts, the returns show that the total amount of domestic bills of exchange, purchased at the western offices from the 1st of July, 1831, to the 31st of December, 1832, is $16,397,094 93
On which the amount protested and unpaid is 13,853 36
Of which the estimate of probable loss is 1,500 00
But as some portion of this may be still running to maturity, and its fate undecided, it should be remarked that the whole of this estimated loss of $1,500, arose out of the purchases during the year ending on the 1st of July, 1832—
Which amounted to $10,137,722 22
On which the total amount protested and remaining unpaid, is only 13,853 36
The total loss only 1,500 00

"The cause of a loss so little proportioned to the amount of the investment is to be found in the fact, that the exchange transactions of the western states, grow out of the actual business, the actual shipments of the produce to the place of its exportation, furnishing to the bank the triple security, of the personal responsibility of the shipper, the property which he exports; and again, the personal liability of the merchant who receives it at the place of exportation. As an illustration of this, the following statement of the exchange operations of the bank at Nashville, may furnish an interesting example.

1831. October $366,512 63. When the few bills remaining out of drafts on shipments of the previous crop, had not yet run to maturity.
1831. December 1,062,094 84. When the shipment of the new crop had commenced, and the planters and ginners had begun to draw on their correspondents.
1832. April, 2,759,754 93. When the crop may be considered to have all been shipped and drawn upon, and of course the amount of bills at the highest point.
1832. October, 503,234 90. When the bills drawn upon the shipments of the last crop had mostly matured.
1833. Jan. 9, 2,019,512 02. The shipments of the present crop having progressed to some extent, the amount of bills is naturally swelled in proportion.

The branch which the exchange committee had selected to show the sound condition of this debt, we select to show its actual condition. On the 10th day of November last, the following letter was addressed to the president of the Nashville branch, viz:

Bank of the United States, November 20th, 1832.

DEAR SIR—You will receive, through the cashier's department, notice of the appointment of G. W. Gibbs and H. M. Rutledge, esqs: as members of your board. These gentlemen have long been known to us by reputation, and I am sure will make useful and agreeable associates in the administration of the office.

Allow me to ask your attention to my letter of the 27th of July last, in which I communicated the wish of the board, that you would abstain from the purchase of domestic bills except in reduction of pre-existing debts to the bank. At the period when my letter reached you, your account of domestic bills was about $500,000. Your statement of the 24th ultimo, the latest which has reached us, shews that amount to be upwards of one million of dollars, being an increase of more than $500,000, and making an actual purchase of bills to the amount of eight hundred thousand dollars since the middle of August. We are aware that many bills have returned upon the office, which, it was necessary to take up by redrafts. But still the amount exceeds much what had been anticipated by the board, and now that this source of demand must have ceased, I cannot too strongly invite your attention to the instructions contained in my letter of the 27th July, as the receipt of your notes occasioned by the purchase, may become very inconvenient to the bank. As the season advances, too, it would be desirable to shorten the term of all the bills which you are under the necessity of purchasing, to a period not exceeding four months. Very respectfully yours.

[Signed] N. BIDDLE, president.

Josiah Nichol, esq. president's office, D. and D. Nashville, Tenn.

By this letter, it will be perceived that it was known to the bank at Philadelphia, that many bills had returned upon the Nashville office, which it was necessary to take up by redrafts. This letter called out an explanation from the president of the Nashville branch, dated 22d November, which was followed by another dated the 24th, a note at the end of the first, says,

"We will not be able to get the debts due this office paid—in deed, if any, it will be a small part—the means are not in the country."

In other respects, the contents of the two are almost precisely alike, and we here give that of the 24th entire, viz.

Office bank United States, Nashville, 24th November, 1832.
N. Biddle, esq.

DEAR SIR—On the 22d instant, I did myself the pleasure of acknowledging the receipt of yours of the 10th instant, but as the mail was just about closing when I wrote, perhaps it did not explain to your satisfaction the reasons why our domestic bill account was so large; but, my dear sir, when you are informed of the debts that those bills are intended to liquidate, you will be of the opinion that we have not exceeded very far in that respect. The parent bank, and the offices at New York, Baltimore, Washington, Richmond, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Louisville and Lexington, have been and still continue the practice of discounting bills and notes made payable at this office, and forwarding them for collection. 'Tis has been done this season to, I would say, three times the amount of any previous year, and to add to our difficulties last season, we had a very short crop of cotton, so that our own drafts predicated on the crop and payable at New Orleans, could not be paid out of the crop, in consequence of which drafts to a very large amount have been drawn by the commission merchants of New Orleans on their funds here, and made payable at this office. These drafts cannot be met when due at this office by the payment of cash, on account of its scarcity, and no other means could be resorted to but drafts again on New Orleans, which our directors thought right to purchase. Supposing that your letter of the 27th of July permitted or authorized the protesting of paper discounted at the parent bank and offices, as it would, if sent back, have occasioned a great many failures, if all, or a large portion of the above notes and drafts had been sent back under protest to the bank at Philadelphia, New York, Baltimore, Washington, Richmond, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Louisville, Lexington and N. Orleans, which would have been the case had we not pursued the above plan—and bills payable 6 months after date is as short a time as ought to be taken—if we wished to serve all parties—as you will be apprised that those bills must be paid, if at all, out of the new crop, and only a very small part can be in cash before May or June. Be assured, sir, that we are as well convinced as you are that too many bills are offered and purchased, amounting to more than the present crop of cotton and tobacco will pay, I mean before all those papers are taken up. I am certain that one half of the collection paper sent here since August for payment, has not been taken up, as yet. Our cashier will make a statement to you showing how it stands.

As far as we yet purchased bills this season, it was to protect and pay the above collection notes and bills. Cash we have not given for bills, except small balances might be over after taking up the paper intended. I am also satisfied that adding mere cash purchases and bills we received for our own notes discounted (together) since the first April last, would not amount, in the whole, to more than $150,000, so that, if we had erred, it was to save the parent bank and offices. Your letter of the 10th inst. was this day laid before the directors requesting an answer to the several points of it. A committee of three have been appointed to draft such answer, it will be forwarded to you when made up. Very respectfully,

JOSIAH NICHOL, president.

This was followed on the 26th by the promised explanation of the cashier, which was of the same import. We content ourselves with taking the following extract, viz.

"The following exhibits the amount collected here for the parent bank and offices from the 1st September last to this date, which, with small exceptions, have been paid through our bill operations, viz:

Bank United States	-	-	-	$147,473
Office New York	-	-	-	31,365
Baltimore	-	-	-	7,607
Washington	-	-	-	2,460
Richmond	-	-	-	42,112
Fayetteville	-	-	-	276
New Orleans	-	-	-	746,893
Natchez	-	-	-	3,150
St. Louis	-	-	-	722
Louisville	-	-	-	51,595
Lexington	-	-	-	24,902
Cincinnati	-	-	-	10,001
Pittsburg	-	-	-	28,521
Boston	-	-	-	350
				$1,097,427

"In Alabama we have about $30,000 loaned in eleven notes, $30,000 of which will be turned into bills when they mature. All are of the first character for safety. There are some thousands of dollars of bills from New Orleans and other offices yet to mature, which can only be met through our bill operations."

The subject was submitted to the board of directors of the branch, who adopted unanimously the following resolution, viz:

"Resolved, That for the very satisfactory reasons assigned in the letters of the president and cashier of this office, addressed to the president and cashier of the parent bank, one dated on the 22d of November, 1832, the other the 26th November, 1832, that the board recommend it to the parent board to permit this office to continue its purchases of domestic bills at six months date, until the 1st day of March next."

Notwithstanding the confidence of the directors of the parent bank, that little or none of the debt based on domestic bills of exchange, was in the nature of accommodation paper, to be renewed by drawing and redrawing, we have here conclusive proof, that nearly the entire debt to the Nashville branch, is precisely of that description. Some of it, as the president of the branch admits, had already been drawn for three times, and he anticipates that it will again come back from New Orleans. By the monthly statements of the 1st November and 1st December, it appears that the whole amount of domestic bills at Nashville on the 17th October was $895,228 30, and on the 7th November, $1,245,510. The cashier states, that nearly the whole purchases made in September, October and November, amounting to $1,097,427, were redrafts, and he says, there are some thousands of dollars of bills from New Orleans and the offices which can be met only in the same way. The president of the branch, in his letter of the 24th, says, that the bills already offered and purchased were more than the present crop of cotton and tobacco will pay. Yet, as the committee of exchange state, the amount of these bills had increased on the 9th of January, 1833, to $2,449,612 32. From the statements of the cashier and president of the bank, there cannot be a doubt, that a large amount of this whole debt is redrafts!

We have here the reason why there are so few protests in the west.

It is with all this evidence in the bank, that the committee of exchange inform us "the exchange transactions of the western states grow out of the actual business, the actual shipments of produce to the place of exportation," &c. and give us an illustration of the small amount of bills at the Nashville branch in October, 1831 and 1832, and the large amounts in December, 1831, April, 1832, and January, 1833. If they had examined this evidence, they would have seen, that the reason of all this is, that at the periods of the lowest depression the racers were at the other end of the course. The bills at New Orleans at the times stated were as follows, viz:

1831, November, 4th,	$1,766,828 68
1832, June, 25th,	7,061,968 07
November, 2d,	2,501,840 58

In the fall and first part of the winter they start from Nashville and other western offices to New Orleans, and in the spring and early part of the summer they start back again. As the amount sinks in Nashville, it rises in New Orleans; and as it sinks in New Orleans it rises in Nashville. The bills on New Orleans discounted last September, October and November were at six months, so that they will be falling due in March, April and May next, at which time the bill account at N. Orleans will rise and that at Nashville sink. Bills on Nashville will be discounted to pay the bills from Nashville, and again those bills will be paid by new bills on New Orleans.

There is no reason to suppose, that the bill business at the other western branches, is any better than at Nashville. That it is no better at Louisville, is shown by the letter of the cashier of that branch written in November last, and already adverted to in the body of this report. The whole amount of domestic bills under discount in the valley of the Mississippi in November last, as shown by the monthly statements at the close of that month, was $10,112,106 37. Upon the supposition that it is all in the same condition as the bill debt at Nashville, at least seven out of the ten millions is secured by paper called race horse bills, which is running from branch to branch, waiting for crops to be raised to meet them, and running the drawers with interest, exchange, commission for endorsement and acceptance, and other expenses.

In our opinion, no system of banking operations could be invented, more desolating and fatal to the trading and planting community of the west, than this extension of bank credits and overtrading in domestic exchange.

The facts now disclosed throw additional light upon the other branch of the western debt. To a great extent, the same parties which are engaged in this extensive business of drawing and redrawing, are undoubtedly principals and securities in the notes discounted. From the letters of the cashiers at Cincinnati, Louisville and Nashville, it appears to be as difficult to collect this debt as that based upon bills.

It is proper that we should add in conclusion that we cannot suppose the directors called before us, or the exchange committee in their report, could have been fully apprised of the facts, disclosed in this correspondence, which is herewith submitted.

LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES.

An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the president, to execute the revenue laws, and collect the duties on imports in the ordinary way, in any collection district, it shall and may be lawful for the president to direct that the custom house for such district be established and kept in any secure place within some port or harbor of such district, either upon land or on board any vessel; and, in that case, it shall be the duty of the collector to reside at such place, and there to detain all vessels and cargoes arriving within the said district until the duties imposed on said cargoes, by law, be paid, in cash, deducting interest according to existing laws; and in such cases it shall be unlawful to take the vessel or cargo from the custody of the proper officer of the customs, unless by process from some court of the U. States and in case of any attempt otherwise to take such vessel or cargo by any force, or combination, or assemblage of persons too great to be overcome by the officers of the customs, it shall and may be lawful for the president of the United States, or such person or persons as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces, or militia of the U. States as may be deemed necessary for the purpose of preventing the removal of such vessel or cargo, and protecting the officers of the customs in retaining the custody thereof.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States shall extend to all cases, in law or equity, arising under the revenue laws of the United States, for which other provisions are not already made by law, and if any person shall receive any injury to his person or property for or on account of any act by him done, under any law of the United States, for the protection of the revenue, or the collection of the duties on imports, he shall be entitled to maintain suit for damage therefor in the circuit court of the United States in the district wherein the party doing the injury may reside, or shall be found. And all property taken or detained by any officer or other person under authority of any revenue law of the United States shall be irrepleviable, and shall be deemed to be in the custody of the law, and subject only to the orders and decrees of the courts of the United States having jurisdiction thereof. And if any person shall dispossess or rescue or attempt to dispossess or rescue, any property so taken or detained as aforesaid, or shall aid or assist therein, such person shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be liable to such punishment as is provided by the twenty-second section of the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, approved the thirtieth day of April, anno Domini one thousand seven hundred and ninety, for the wilful obstruction or resistance of officers in the service of process.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That in any case where suit or prosecution shall be commenced in a court of any state against any officer of the United States, or other person, for or on account of any act done under the revenue laws of the United States, or under color thereof, or for or on account of any right, authority, or title, set up or claimed by such officer, or other person, under any such law of the United States, it shall be lawful for the defendant in such suit, or prosecution, at any time before trial, upon a petition to the circuit court of the United States, in and for the district in which the defendant shall have been served with process, setting forth the nature of said suit or prosecution, and verifying the said petition by affidavit, together with a certificate signed by an attorney or counsellor at law of some court of record of the state in which such suit shall have been commenced, or of the United States, setting forth that, as counsel for the petitioner, he has examined the proceedings against him, and has carefully inquired into all the matters set forth in the petition, and that he believes the same to be true; which petition, affidavit and certificate, shall be presented to the said circuit court, if in session, and if not, to the clerk thereof at his office, and shall be filed in said office, and the cause shall thereupon be entered on the docket of said court, and shall be thereafter proceeded in as a cause originally commenced in that court; and it shall be the duty of the clerk of said court, if the suit were commenced in the court below by summons, to issue a writ of certiorari to the state court, requiring said court to send to the said circuit court the record and proceedings in said cause; or if it were commenced by capias, he shall issue a writ of habeas corpus cum causa, a duplicate of which said writ shall be delivered to the clerk of the state court, or left at his office by the marshal of the district, or his deputy, or some person duly authorised thereto; and thereupon, it shall be the duty of the said state court to stay all further proceedings in such cause, and the said suit, or prosecution, upon delivery of such process, or leaving the same as aforesaid, shall be deemed and taken to be moved to the said circuit court, and any further proceedings, trial, or judgment therein in the state court, shall be wholly null and void. And if the defendant in any such suit be in actual custody on mesne process therein, it shall be the duty of the marshal, by virtue of the writ of habeas corpus cum causa, to take the body of the defendant into his custody, to be dealt with in the said cause according to the rules of law and the order of the circuit court, or of any judge thereof, in vacation. And all attachments made and all bail and other security given upon such suit, or prosecution, shall be and continue in like force and effect, as if the same suit or prosecution, had proceeded to final judgment and execution in the state court. And if, upon the removal of any such suit or prosecution, it shall be made to appear to the said circuit court that no copy of the record and proceedings therein, in the state court, can be obtained, it shall be lawful for said circuit court to allow and require the plaintiff to proceed de novo, and to file a declaration of his cause of action, and the parties may thereupon proceed as in actions originally brought, in said circuit court; and on failure of so proceeding, judgment of non pros. may be rendered against the plaintiff with cost for the defendant.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in any case in which any party is, or may be by law, entitled to copies of the record and proceedings in any suit or prosecution in any state court, to be used in any court of the United States, if the clerk of said state court shall, upon demand, and the payment or tender of the legal fees, refuse or neglect to deliver to such party certified copies of such record and proceedings, the court of the United States in which such record and proceedings may be needed, on proof, by affidavit, that the clerk of such state court has refused or neglected to deliver copies thereof, on demand as aforesaid, may direct and allow such record to be supplied by affidavit, or otherwise, as the circumstances of the case may require and allow; and, thereupon, such proceeding, trial, and judgment, may be had in the said court of the United States, and all such processes awarded, as if certified copies of such records and proceedings had been regularly before the said court.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, whenever the president of the United States shall be officially informed, by the authorities of any state, or by a judge of any circuit or district court of the United States, in the state, that, within the limits of such state, any law or laws of the United States, or the execution thereof, or of any process from the courts of the United States is obstructed by the employment of military force, or by any other unlawful means, too great to be overcome by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshal by existing laws, it shall be lawful for him, the president of the United States, forthwith to issue his proclamation, declaring such fact or information, and requiring all such military and other force forthwith to disperse; and if any time after issuing such proclamation, any such opposition or obstruction shall be made, in the manner or by the means aforesaid, the president shall be, and hereby is, authorised, promptly to employ such means to suppress the same, and to cause the said laws or process to be duly executed, as are authorised and provided in the cases therein mentioned by the act of the twenty-eighth of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, entitled "An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrections, repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for that purpose;" and also, by the act of the third of March, one thousand eight hundred and seven, entitled "an act authorising the employment of the land and naval forces of the United States in cases of insurrection."

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That in any state where the jails are not allowed to be used for the imprisonment of persons arrested or committed under the laws of the United States, or where houses are not allowed to be so used, it shall and may be lawful for any marshal, under the direction of the judge of the United States for the proper district, to use other convenient places, within the limits of said state, and to make such other provision as he may deem expedient and necessary for that purpose.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That either of the justices of the supreme court, or a judge of any district court of the United States, in addition to the authority already conferred by law, shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus in all cases of a prisoner or prisoners, in jail or confinement, where he or they shall be committed or confined, on or by any authority or law, for any act done, or omitted to be done, in pursuance of a law of the United States, or any order, process, or decree, of any judge or court thereof, any thing in any act of congress to the contrary notwithstanding. And if any person or persons to whom such writ of habeas corpus may be directed, shall refuse to obey the same, or shall neglect or refuse to make return, or shall make a false return thereto, in addition to the remedies already given by law, he or they shall be deemed and taken to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction before any court of competent jurisdiction, be punished by fine, not exceeding one thousand dollars, and by imprisonment, not exceeding six months, or by either, according to the nature and aggravation of the case.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the several provisions contained in the first and fifth sections of this act, shall be in force until the end of the next session of congress, and no longer.

An act to explain and amend the eighteenth section of "an act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," approved the fourteenth July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That all articles upon which the duties were reduced by "an act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," approved the fourteenth July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, and which may not have been deposited under the provisions of the eighteenth section of the act aforesaid, whether the said articles were imported, or the duties thereon were secured or paid, before or after the passage of said act, may, to obtain the benefit of said act and this amendment thereto, be deposited at any time before the first of April next, in the custom house stores, or in the manner prescribed in the following section, by the importer, consignee, or any subsequent purchaser or owner, and all wines now on hand, or which may be imported at any time previous to the fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, and which may remain in the custody of the customs on that day, shall be entitled to the benefit of this act, and of that to which it is an amendment: Provided, that no merchandise imported in packages, hales, or casks, shall be entitled to the benefit of this act, or of that to which it is an amendment, unless they are as originally imported; and that all articles placed in the custody of the customs under this act shall so remain, for inspection and examination, till the fourth day of March next: Provided also, That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to extend the provisions thereof to any merchandise which under the existing laws would not be entitled to the benefits of drawbacks.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in all cases where the quantity of merchandise entitled to the benefit of the acts aforesaid shall exceed ten packages, hales, or casks, or where the articles may be in bulk, or otherwise than in packages, bales or casks, the collector of the district where the same may be is hereby authorised to direct that the said merchandise shall not be removed from the warehouse of the owner, but that the same shall be there placed in the custody of a proper officer of the customs, who shall examine the same, and keep them under the keys of the custom house, till the first of April as aforesaid: Provided, The collector shall consider the same a safe place of deposit, and that application be made to him for that purpose on or before the twenty-fifth March next.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all articles remaining under the control of the proper officer of the customs, according to the provisions of this act, on the first of April next, and all wines which shall remain in the same manner after the 4th day of March, 1834, shall be subject to no higher duty than would be levied under the act aforesaid, approved the fourteenth of July last; and if any higher duty shall have been paid, such excess shall be refunded, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the person placing the same in the custody of the customs, and any outstanding bond or bonds which may have been given for duties on the same shall be cancelled; and if a sum equal to the amount of duties levied by the said act of the fourteenth July, shall not have been collected, and the bond or bonds given shall amount to more than the duties imposed by said act, the secretary of the treasury shall direct that a debenture certificate or certificates, (the form of which shall be prescribed by him) for such excess of duty, shall be issued to the persons placing the same in the custody of the customs, payable out of the bond or bonds given for duties on the same. The collectors to give the debtors credit on their bonds for the difference between the high and low duties, and to cancel the bonds on payment of the balance.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the secretary of the treasury shall cause the amount of excess duties, as aforesaid, to be ascertained and paid, or the credit given, as the case may be, as soon as practicable after the first of April next; and that he shall be authorised to cause all articles under the control of the proper officers of the customs to be examined; and, where the merchandise may have passed out of the possession of the importer or consignee, to require satisfactory evidence of the transfer or transfers, to identify the same; and to make all other rules and regulations which may be necessary and proper to carry this act into effect.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the secretary of the treasury is hereby authorised and directed to extend relief to all persons whose cases are provided for in this act, who may have been deprived of the benefit thereof in consequence of the collector's not having received his instructions in pursuance of it from the secretary of the treasury.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the 17th section of the aforesaid act of the 14th July, 1832, as far as the same relates to the duty on pulverized or crushed sugar, shall take effect on the 4th day of March of the present year.

§3. The following is the section of the law of 1832 referred to. The idea is that it will affect the revenue in the amount of several millions—some say ten millions of dollars; and at New York, only, in the sum of five millions.

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That the several articles enumerated in this bill whether imported before or after the passage thereof, may be put into the custom house stores, under the bond of the importer or owner, and such of said articles as shall remain under the control of the proper officer of the customs on the third day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-three, shall be subject to no other duty, than if the same were imported, respectively after that day. And if the duties, or any part thereof, on the articles deposited as aforesaid, have been paid previous to the said third day of March, the amount so paid shall be refunded to the person importing and depositing the said articles: Provided, That this section shall apply to merchandise in original packages which may be entered, and taken into the possession of the importer or owner, upon condition that the said merchandise be placed under the custody of the proper officer of the customs, and that the same shall remain under his control, on the third day of March next: And provided further, That the secretary of the treasury be authorised to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry this section into effect.

An act to modify the act of the fourteenth of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, and all other acts imposing duties on imports.

Be it enacted, &c. That, from and after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, in all cases where duties are imposed on foreign imports by the act of the fourteenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, entitled "an act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," or by any other act, shall exceed twenty per centum on the value thereof, one-tenth part of such excess shall be deducted; from and after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five, another tenth part thereof shall be deducted; from and after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven, another tenth part thereof shall be deducted; from and after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine, another tenth part thereof shall be deducted; and from and after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, one-half of the residue of such excess shall be deducted; and from and after the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, the other half thereof shall be deducted.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the second section of the act of the fourteenth of July aforesaid, as fixes the rate of duty on all milled and filled cloths, known by the name of plains, kerseys, or Keudal cottons, of which wool is the only material, the value whereof does not exceed thirty-five cents a square yard, at five per centum ad valorem, shall be, and the same is hereby repealed. And the said articles shall be subject to the same duty of fifty per centum, as is provided by the said second section for other manufactures of wool; which duty shall be liable to the same deductions as are prescribed by the first section of this act.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That until the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, the duties imposed by existing laws, as modified by this act, shall remain and continue to be collected. And from and after the day last aforesaid, all duties upon imports shall be collected in ready money; and all credits now allowed by law, in the payment of duties, shall be, and hereby are abolished; and such duties shall be laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the government; and from and after the day last aforesaid, the duties required to be paid by law on goods, wares and merchandise, shall be assessed upon the value thereof at the port where the same shall be entered, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the articles now exempt by the act of the fourteenth of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, and the existing laws, from the payment of duties, the following articles imported from and after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, and until the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, shall also be admitted to entry, free from duty, to wit: bleached and unbleached linens, table linen, linen napkins, and linen cambricks, and worsted stuff goods, shawls, and other manufactures of silk and worsted, manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be the component material of chief value, coming from this side of the Cape of Good Hope, except sewing silk.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That from and after the said thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, the following articles shall be admitted to enter free from duty, to wit: indigo, quicksilver, sulphur, crude saltpetre, grindstones, refined borax, emery, opium, tin in plates and sheets, gum arabic, gum senegal, lac dye, madder, madder root, nuts and berries used in dyeing, saffron, tumeric, wood or pascal, aloes, ambergris, burgundy pitch, cochineal, cannone flowers, coriander seed, catsup, chalk, coculus indiens, horn plates for lanterns, ox and other horns and tips, India rubber, unmanufactured ivory, juniper berries, musk, nuts of all kinds, oil of juniper, unmanufactured rattans and reeds, tortoise shell, tin foil, shellac, vegetables used principally in dyeing and composing dyes, weld, and all articles employed chiefly for dyeing, except alum, copperas, bichromate of potash, prussiate of potash, chromate of potash, and nitrate of lead, aqua fortis and tartaric acids. And all imports on which the first section of this act may operate, and all articles now admitted to enter free from duty, or paying a less rate of duty than twenty per centum ad valorem, before the said thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, from and after that day may be admitted to entry subject to such duty, not exceeding twenty per centum ad valorem, as shall be provided for by law.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act of the fourteenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, or of any other act as is inconsistent with this act, shall be, and the same is hereby repealed: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the passage, prior or subsequent to the said thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, of any act or acts, from time to time, that may be necessary to detect, prevent or punish evasions of the duties on imports imposed by law, nor to prevent the passage of any act, prior to the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, in the contingency, either of excess or deficiency of revenue, altering the rate of duties on articles which, by the aforesaid act of fourteenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, are subject to a less rate of duty than twenty per centum ad valorem, in such manner as not to exceed that rate, and so as to adjust the revenue to either of the said contingencies.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 4—VOL. VIII. BALTIMORE, MARCH 23, 1833. [VOL. XLIV. WHOLE No. 1,122

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

¶ We insert the speeches of Messrs. Clay and Grundy, on the land bill—as presenting a general view of both sides of this great question. We shall, in our next, give the corrected speech of Mr. Clay on his tariff bill, and that of Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, in the house of representatives, against it. A subsequent number will contain the debate on the bank. Next, in order, the report of the minority of the committee on manufactures, signed by Messrs. Adams and Condict, &c. In the arrangement and publication of the valuable “stock copy” which remains on hand and must be inserted, we shall endeavor to give it “the spice of variety.”

The proceedings of the re-assembled convention of South Carolina fill a considerable space in the present sheet, and we have added some things to shew the spirit which prevails. It will be seen that the “action of the convention” is regarded as having produced an abandonment of the principle of protection! It appears most probable that the convention will nullify the “enforcing law,” and prescribe a new oath to be taken by persons holding office under the laws of the state, and by voters. We shall make a due record of all that is done.

It will be seen that the grand committee of the South Carolina convention have had the late act of the congress of the United States under consideration, and been pleased to recommend an acceptance of the same—having “cause for congratulation and triumph.”

The debate on accepting the report of the committee appears to have been pretty hot, on the part of Mr. B. B. Smith. He said the report was false, in expressing a love for the union, &c.—which he explained so far as it regarded himself—after his meaning had been demanded by gen. Hamilton; who, on the present occasion, behaved with much moderation.

The convention had been addressed by Messrs. Miller, Barnwell and McDuffie, stating the reasons which had induced them to vote for the new tariff law, &c.

A decent respect for the action of Mr. Clay, and others who went with him in support of his bill concerning the tariff, we think, ought to keep down the song of triumph in South Carolina—for no one will affect to believe that terror, because of the ordinance, had any influence over the proceedings of Mr. Clay, and the gentlemen more directly alluded to. They had their fears—but not on account of “major general Hamilton, commanding the state troops at Charleston.”

The supreme court of the United States terminated its annual session on the 15th inst.

Late advices from Europe are noticed. The most important thing that has happened is the decisive victory of the Egyptians over the Turks. It seems admitted, that the dominion of the sultan at Constantinople must speedily cease—unless preserved by the interference of some of the European powers. The aid of Russia has been asked, and appears to have been partially granted, in the way of negotiation, between the sultan and the pacha. In other respects the prospect is—that the peace of Europe will not be suddenly, or extensively, disturbed.

We have inserted various interesting articles to shew the present state of Ireland—which is, indeed, in an awful condition. If the present reign of outrage be not stopped—a terrific depreciation in the moral character of the people must ensue. There is no other security than force, for the preservation of property or life, in many parts of the island! O’Connell has issued a long and ardent proclamation to the people. His purposes are to put down the “protestant ascendancy,” and “repeal the union”—but he exhorts his countrymen to avoid the perpetration of crimes, that they may not give their enemies any advantages over them. He speaks of the robberies and murders committed, as he ought; but will, perhaps, find that it was easier to raise an excitement than to direct it!

The proceedings of the first reformed parliament of Great Britain are looked for with much earnestness, and no small degree of anxiety, by certain classes of placemen, and pensioners, and priests—and persons interested in property and slaves in the West Indies. It is even thought that the corn laws may be successfully attacked! With these prospects realised—important changes, indeed, will follow in succession; and it is possible, that, the value of labor being increased, the burthens of the poor rates may be reduced. We have made a collection of important papers relative to slavery in the British West Indies—but are compelled to defer its insertion. The ministers, as well as the people of England, seem determined to end it—in one way or another. The subject is one of great interest to a large portion of the United States, and on many accounts.

Exchange on London was lately quoted at Boston as at only 5 per cent. premium. But it is not said whether the pound sterling was placed at its new comparative (or real) value of 480 cents. If so—the exchange is considerably against us. The average of the par of the pound sterling, for several years past, has been about 488 cents.

We are exceedingly harrassed, and much injured, by the long-enduring irregularity of the mails, and the excessive carelessness or gross ignorance, or something worse, in a good many of the post offices. It is useless to complain—but proper that our subscribers should understand, that we can do nothing more than is done, to insure the regular and safe arrival of their papers.

THE ENFORCING ACT—OR “BLOODY BILL.” We expressed an opinion in the last REGISTER, (depending altogether on a recollection of things long past), that the old laws to enforce the embargo, which was laid in the administration of Mr. Jefferson, contained provisions at least as strong as any in the act lately passed “further to provide for the collection of duties on imports;” but have since observed that a correspondent of the “Richmond Enquirer” had already examined into this matter, and settled the question—certainly shewing that the measures recommended and adopted in 1808-9, to “regulate commerce with foreign nations,” in the absolute prohibition of all commerce with them, were more decided and severe than the law of the late session, to “regulate” such commerce so far as to collect duties on goods imported—South Carolina having “ordained” that such duties should not be paid within her “sovereign” limits!

Previous to quoting a couple of sections from the law to enforce the embargo, in 1809, and that to enforce the collection of duties in 1833, it may be well to remark—that those who doubt Mr. Jefferson’s “democracy,” cannot have faith in his opinion, that “NULLIFICATION IS THE RIGHTFUL REMEDY!” It is not worth the while to go into particulars. The sections of the two laws will speak for themselves.

Act to enforce the embargo—
Jan. 1809.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the owner or owners, consignee or factor, of any ship, vessel or boat, as described in the preceding section, which may at the time when notice of this act shall be received at the several custom houses respectively, be laden in whole or in part, shall, on notice given by the collector, either discharge such cargo or give bond for the same, in the manner and on the conditions mentioned in the preceding section; and if the cargo shall not be discharged within ten days, or the bond given within three days after such notice, the ship, vessel or boat and cargo shall be wholly forfeited. But the collectors are hereby authorized Act to enforce the collection of duties—March, 1833.

Sec. 1. That whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the president, to execute the revenue laws, and collect the duties on imports in the ordinary way, in any collection district, it shall and may be lawful for the president to direct that the custom house for such district be established and kept in any secure place within some port or harbor of such district, either upon land or on board any vessel; and, in that case, it shall be the duty of the collector to reside at such place, and there to detain all vessels and cargoes arriving within the said district until the duties im-to order or to cause the cargoes of such vessels to be discharged for the same causes [these causes, as before recited, are, "whenever in their opinion there is an intention to violate the embargo," &c.] as they may refuse permission to put any cargo on board of vessels not yet laden in whole or in part. And they are likewise authorised in the meanwhile, and until the cargoes shall have been discharged, or bonds given, as the case may be, to take possession of such vessels, and to take such other measures as may be necessary to prevent their departure.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the president of the U. S. or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces or militia of the United States, or of the territories thereof, as may be judged necessary, in conformity with the provisions of this and other acts respecting the embargo, for the purpose of preventing the illegal departure of any ship or vessel, or of detaining, taking possession of, and keeping in custody any ship or vessel, or of taking into custody and guarding any specie or articles of domestic growth, produce, or manufacture, and also for the purpose of preventing and suppressing any armed or riotous assemblage of persons resisting the custom house officers in the exercise of their duties, or in any manner opposing the execution of the laws laying an embargo, or otherwise violating, or assisting and abetting violations of the same.

posed on said cargoes, by law, be paid, in cash, deducting interest according to existing laws; and in such cases it shall be unlawful to take the vessel or cargo from the custody of the proper officer of the customs, unless by process from some court of the United States, and in case of any attempt otherwise to take such vessel or cargo by any force, or combination, or assemblage of persons too great to be overcome by the officers of the customs, it shall and may be lawful for the president of the United States, or such person or persons as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces, or militia of the U. States as may be deemed necessary for the purpose of preventing the removal of such vessel or cargo, and protecting the officers of the customs in retaining the custody thereof.

Sec. 5. That, whenever the president of the United States shall be officially informed, by the authorities of any state, or by a judge of any circuit or district court of the United States, in the state, that, within the limits of such state, any law or laws of the United States, or the execution thereof, or of any process from the courts of the United States is obstructed by the employment of military force, or by any other unlawful means, too great to be overcome by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshal by existing laws, it shall be lawful for him, the president of the United States, forthwith to issue his proclamation, declaring such fact or information, and requiring all such military and other force forthwith to disperse; and if any time after issuing such proclamation, any such opposition or obstruction shall be made, in the manner or by the means aforesaid, the president shall be, and hereby is, authorised, promptly to employ such means to suppress the same, and to cause the said laws or process to be duly executed, as are authorised and provided in the cases therein mentioned by the act of the twenty-eighth of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, entitled "an act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrections, repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for that purpose;" and also, by the act of the third of March, one thousand eight hundred and seven, entitled "an act authorising the employment of the land and naval forces of the United States in cases of insurrection."

These are the chief forcing sections in both bills. Those in the act of 1809 are, by far, the most "arbitrary" and "despotic," and "tyrannical" and "bloody"—for the mere suspicion of an intention to violate that law justified the use of an armed force. This bill originated in the senate, (reported, if we remember rightly, by Mr. Giles, of Virginia), and passed that body 20 to 7—and the house 71 to 32. The following are the yeas,—which took in the whole "democratic" force in both houses.

Yeas in the senate—Messrs. Anderson, Condit, Cranford, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Kitchell, Milledge, Mitchell, Moore, Pope, Robinson, Smith, of New York, Smith, of Maryland, Smith, of Tennessee, Sumter, Thruson, Tiffin and Turner—20.

Yeas in the house of representatives—Messrs. Alexander, L. J. Alston, W. Alston, Jr. Bacon, Bard, Barker, Bassett, Bibb, Blackledge, Jr. Blake, Blount, Jr. Boyd, Boyle, Brown, Butler, Calhoun, G. W. Campbell, Clay, Clifton, Cuts, Deane, Desha, Eppes, Fisk, Franklin, Gholson, Jr. Green, Heister, Holland, Holmes, Howard, Humphreys, J. G. Jackson, Johnson, Jones, Kenan, Kirkpatrick, Lambert, Macon, Murton, J. Montgomery, N. R. Moore, T. Moore, Jer. Morrow, John Morrow, Nelson, Newbold, Newton, Nicholas, Porter, Jr. Rhea, of Penn. Rhea, of Tenn. J. Richards, M. Richards, Seaver, Shaw, Smilie, J. K. Smith, J. Smith, Storer, Story, Taylor, Troup, Van Allen, Verplanck, Wharton, Whitehill, Wilbour, D. R. Williams, A. Wilson, Winn.

Now—let any old democrat "dumb" these names, and he will find that every "true man" of his party, in either house, voted, not only so far for the "regulation of commerce" as to prohibit all commerce, but for a law of enforcement more arbitrary, more "bloody," than is the bill of 1833. We have marked a few names in italic to which we invite particular attention.

It may be added, that Mr. Gallatin, then secretary of the treasury, in reply to a letter from Mr. Giles, chairman of a committee of the senate, as to what measures would be most effectual to enforce the embargo laws, proposed to forbid the lading of any vessel without the permission of the collector—to give power to seize unusual deposits—to use the whole naval force and ten or twelve additional cutters—to call out the militia—to put down writs of replevin issued by states' courts or officers, and so forth! And the law also contained a provision authorising collectors, or other officers of the United States, to seize upon carts, wagons or sleighs, or other carriages, "if apparently on their way towards the territories of a foreign nation,"—and the whole "democracy" of the south supported this bill! There is, indeed, a great difference in the character of self same things, happening on the north and on the south side of the Potomac—in the opinion of "generous and chivalric" men!

But enough. "The play is not worth the candle." Nullification was resisted and put down in the east, as well by the returning good sense of the New England people, themselves, as in being discountenanced every where else; but has it not succeeded in the small state of South Carolina? The "Columbia Telescope," the organ of the nullifiers, says—

"This little state, in the mere panoply of courage and high principles, has foiled the swaggering giant of the union. Thirty thousand Carolinians have not only awed the wild west into respect—COMPELLED Pennsylvania stolidity into something like sense—New York corruption into something like decency—Yankee rapacity into a sort of image of honesty; but all this has been loftily and steadily done, in the face of 17,000—what shall we call them? What epithet is of a shame wide, lasting and deep enough, for the betrayers of the liberties of their own country—the instigators of merciless slaughter—the contrivers of irretrievable servitude, against their own struggling state?"

EQUAL AND EXACT JUSTICE TO ALL MEN. The case of Dr. Watkins has been trumpeted in every corner of the United States. The newspapers have contained more than ten thousand columns of matter, setting forth his offences. He, in an evil hour, appropriated to his own use three or four thousand dollars of the public money. The act cannot be justified; but no one who knew this unfortunate man will believe that he intended to retain it. For this, and in consequence of this, he has been confined in the penitentiary as a criminal, and yet remains in jail—for a period of about three years and a half, without any present prospect of being released; his character blasted, and an amiable family cast upon the cold charity of the world—deprived of the near endearments, and protection and aid, of the husband and father.

On the other hand we see it stated, that a certain person in the west, "rewarded" with a place in the land office at about the time when Watkins was arrested and tried as a felon, has defaulted to the amount of sixty-three thousand dollars; and it is added, that he had further used his official situation to appropriate portions of the public lands, (as well as of the public money), for his own benefit, in a manner not less criminal than Watkins used to obtain the three or four thousand dollars above mentioned. And it is hinted that several other like cases have happened. But this single case involves a larger amount than all the alleged defalcations or frauds that was so loudly proclaimed in the summer of 1829—and out of all which an action was sustained against poor Watkins, only. And the person in the land office above alluded to was "rewarded" in the "punishment" of an honest man dismissed, for opinion's sake.

That, in the multitude of its agents, the government should be sometimes defrauded, must be expected; but a refusal to kiss, or a lowly kissing of the "black stone" of political party, should not aggravate and emblazon the sins of one man, nor expiate and conceal those of another. But had this "affair" happened in one placed in office by president Adams, by the turning-out of another person because of political preferences—what would the "kennel presses" have said of it? The name of the defaulter, in flaming capitals, would have been gibetted at every cross-roads tavern in the United States; and, as he had fled, his person would be described with all possible accuracy, that individuals might not be contaminated by giving him a crust of bread or cup of water.

THE LAND BILL. We publish the speech of Mr. Clay, in favor of his bill, and that of Mr. Grundy against it—and intend, speedily, as promised, to give a congressional history of this very important bill—adding such remarks as certain strange proceedings concerning it so richly merit. Its beginning and ending were in acts of arbitrary power.

With respect to the bill which the president, in familiar phrase, "put into his pocket," the "National Intelligencer" of the 19th says:

It has been the subject of much conversation, since the adjournment of congress, whether Mr. CLAY'S LAND BILL be not in fact now the law of the land. The argument on the subject, we discover, has travelled to New York. We copy it below, from the journal in which we find it, for the information of our readers. We have not ourselves made up a judgment upon it. We have italicized, however, the points on which the question turns, which, if not conclusive, are at least sufficiently plausible to afford a case for a moot court.

From the New York Courier and Enquirer.

But we learn from Washington that a question has been raised, which, in our opinion, is well taken, and, if so, then is the land bill the law of the country—the executive's detention of it to the contrary notwithstanding.

The constitution, sec. 7, says—"If any bill shall not be returned by the president within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless congress by their adjournment prevent its return; in which case it shall not be a law."

Now, it is contended, that inasmuch as the constitutional term for which the late congress was elected expired on the 3d of March, they did not "by their adjournment prevent its (the bill) return." It is argued that this provision only relates to cases where congress might, by an adjournment, attempt to coerce the executive into a premature action upon a bill, and that it cannot apply to any case when the adjournment is in fact compulsory under the constitution. When the executive received the bill, he well knew that the late congress would cease to exist, as such on the 3d of March, and therefore it was his duty to have returned it to the house in which it originated before that period, with his objections in writing. This view of the subject is strengthened by the fact that he cannot return it to the next congress, in consequence of its being a different one from that "in which it originated," and that therefore the president, and not "congress by their adjournment," prevented the bill being returned.

It is plain from the whole reading of the constitution, the framers of that instrument intended that all bills not returned to the congress in which they originated, unless such return should be prevented by their own act, should become the law of the land. They intended that the executive's veto should not be of any avail unless so returned and sanctioned by a vote of more than one-third. The question then arises, who prevented the return of the bill in question. Did "congress by their adjournment" prevent its return?—if so, the constitution says it shall not be a law. But we contend that they did not, and that the executive, knowing congress must adjourn on the 3d March, prevented its return to them, and consequently, that it is as much the law of the land as if he had retained it in his possession ten days during their session.

We have no hesitation in saying, that a bill which passed both houses of congress with such overwhelming majorities, and would probably have passed by two-thirds, in despite of the president's veto, had it been given—ought not to have been nullified in the manner that it was; yet we believe that the constitution will bear out the proceeding, whatever may be thought of the proceeding itself.

INDIAN OUTRAGES. A company of traders were attacked on their journey from Santa Fe to Missouri, on the Canadian fork of the Arkansas, about three months since, by a large body of Cananche Indians, with whom they had a long fight. The traders at last escaped in the night, with the loss of two of their number killed, and leaving 10 or 12,000 dollars in the prairie; and some of them had arrived at St. Louis, after almost unparalleled hardships and privations. They were 42 days in reaching a settlement, encumbered with several wounded men, and the whole nearly starved, for they had lost their horses.

PAUPER STATISTICS. During the year 1832—342 persons were received into the poor house of New Castle county, Delaware, of whom 38 died, 173 were discharged, and 131 remained. Of those admitted 80 were foreigners, and 60 persons of color. The average expense for each pauper was $43 54 per annum, or 84 cents a week. This includes clothing furnished, &c. The population of New Castle country was 29,720, by the census of 1830.

The whole of the expenditure of the Chester county (Pennsylvania) alms house, including all salaries, for the last year, was $7,176 89½. The average number of paupers in the house for the year was 168. Average cost of each pauper $42 70. The population of Chester county in 1830, was 50,910.

In these establishments the poor are well taken care of—plentifully fed and comfortably clothed, though not enjoying many of the luxuries of life! A rigid economy is observed, and nothing is wasted by neglect. Hence it would appear that about forty dollars, per annum, may be considered as the minimum average cost of the subsistence and clothing of persons, of all ages and either sex.

"PALPABLE HITS." The following thrusts were given and taken during the discussions on federal relations in the Virginia house of delegates:

Mr. Moore having concluded his second speech—Mr. Dickerson of Caroline, rose and said: "That the gentleman from Rockbridge (Mr. Moore) was mistaken, when he said that he, (Mr. D.) had boasted of having stabbed the member from Rockbridge under the fifth rib—it was a much greater Ox (Gen. Jackson) than him (Mr. M.) that he gored."

Mr. Moore in reply said, "It was possible he might have been mistaken but still he was strongly under the impression that the gentleman had said something about stabbing the Delegate from Rockbridge under the fifth rib. However that might be, he entertained no doubt but that the great Ox to which the gentleman (Mr. D.) had just alluded, would be as little apprehensive as he (Mr. M.) was, of being gored by an animal more remarkable for its ears than its horns."

A MOST EXCELLENT REASON! The Vandalia, (Illinois) paper of the 27th February, had the following article:

"A bill has passed the house of representatives, incorporating a company with a capital of $500,000, and the privilege of increasing it to a million, to construct a rail road on the surveyed canal route, between the Illinois and lake Michigan. The company is allowed to commence operations as soon as — of the stock is taken, and is required to have the work in progress within two years and completed within ten—otherwise the charter is forfeited. At the expiration of ten years, (if the work be finished and the assent of congress be obtained) the lands granted to the state for the construction of a canal, are to be transferred to the company: The state then becomes a joint stockholder to the present value of the lands, estimated at $275,000.

The terms are very favorable to the state: perhaps too favorable, to induce capitalists to make investments in the stock; of this, however, adventurers must judge. Owing to the late period of the session at which the question was brought forward, it doubtless will fail in the senate for want of time to discuss it, and consequently this jaded hobby of ten years service, will be forced to run another two years heat, with some half a dozen or more riders.

93—The rail road bill above alluded to, was, on motion of Mr. Davidson, laid on the table (8 o'clock last evening) till the 1st Monday in Dec. 1834—so the bill is dead. The last argument we heard against it, was "we don't want our tolls taken out of the state by New England speculators."

[Now a more excellent reason why this rail road company should not be chartered, we think, could not have been given! What—suffer New England to expend half a million of dollars in Illinois—to scatter so large a sum among her people? Its not to be thought of! They would be "foreign stockholders" and those, in the "entire" devotion of the day, are not to be endured. New York made a great mistake in accepting the use of foreign capital, for her canals;* it is true, that, without it, her canals might not even yet have been made; and, though they may have added more than 100 millions to the value of property in New York, and do save several millions a year in the cost of transportations, giving also a clear profit to the state government of more than half a million, annually—it would be more patriotic—more purely democratic, to fill up these canals, than to pay the interest of the "foreign" debt which was incurred by the digging of them.

"THE EITHER-NEITHER-SIDEAN" SCHOOL. The following from the "Albany Argus" of the 9th inst. is one of the best specimens of its kind that we have ever met with: "Among the important and responsible duties which devolved upon the "Great Pacificator," so called, at the close of the late session of congress, was the bringing about of a reconciliation between Messrs. Poindexter and Webster, an account of which we publish to-day. Of the value of these mutual professions of returning kindness and personal respect, they will be best able to judge, who have remarked the degree of asperity which characterised the objectionable passages between the two combatants on the floor of the senate. If the whole affair should chance to be regarded as farcical, or as the evidence of insincerity rather than of voluntary reconciliation, it certainly will not be a matter very surprising or very unnatural."

All which may be read backwards or forwards, without materially affecting the sense of the paragraph.

THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.—The franking privilege to members of congress, has been extended during the late session, to sixty days before the new member takes his seat, to the end of the term for which he is elected, and to the meeting of the congress following.

"Good!"—Mr. Beebe, of Ithaca, New York, who was lately reproved by the speaker of the house, for an attempt to bribe a member, has commenced a suit against the speaker for false imprisonment, and lays his damages at $20,000.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.—The election for representatives to congress took place in this state last week. The following gentlemen were undoubtedly chosen, as there was no opposition ticket, viz: Henry Hubbard and Joseph M. Harper, of the last congress, and Benning M. Bean, Franklin Pierce, and Robert Burns, new members, in the place of John Brodhead, Thomas Chandler, Joseph Hammons, and John W. Weeks. This state loses one member under the new ratio of representation.

THE ITALIAN OPERA COMPANY, which has been performing at New York, and now at Philadelphia, is supported at a very heavy expense. The following may serve as specimens:

Pedrotti and her husband—40,000 francs per annum, or $8,000, and the entire receipts of two benefits, which have produced upwards of two thousand dollars: all dresses to be found by the managers, as well as a coach to and from the theatre.

Montresor—25,000 francs per annum, or $5,000, and one clear benefit, dresses, coach, &c.

Fornasari—25,000 francs per annum, or $5,000, and two clear benefits, coach dresses, wigs, &c.

Rocca, treasurer—24,000 francs or four thousand eight hundred dollars.

Montresor, sen. manager—24,000 francs, or $4,800.

Stella—18,000 francs, or $3,600, and one clear benefit.

Orlandi—18,000 francs, or $3,600, and one clear benefit.

And other similar enormous sums to others of the company, the money to be paid monthly, whether or no performances take place.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From London papers to the 23d January.

Nothing important appears to have happened in England, except the explosion of the great powder works near Dartford, by which 8 persons were killed, and 11 pair of mill-stones, weighing 10 tons each, blown into atoms—and the reception of certain information that a civil war had broken out in the United States: the death of Miss Hannah Moore, aged 84; and some proceedings to bring about further reforms. Ireland was still in a disturbed state. The "Rockites" were serving many notices, which they required to be observed, under the penalty of death.

A London letter of the 21st mentions an important decision of the German diet—which has refused to permit the annexation of the Duchy of Luxemburg to Belgium. Austria and Prussia govern the diet, therefore that must be the opinion of those two powers. The above paper very significantly states that we shall have the king of Hanover uniting with the confederation to repel the hostilities of England. The Belgian question is therefore far from being settled; on the contrary, it appears surrounded with new and increasing difficulties.

Greater strictness is observed in the British ports with regard to the embargo of Dutch vessels, than heretofore.

The French government have ordered the Polish committee to leave Paris. It is said that very extensive intrigues have been discovered against the government of Louis Philip, in which the Polish committee, together with certain Italian refugees, were concerned.

The retirement of the Prussian army of observation to its cantonments in Westphalia, is considered as a decided indication of peaceable intentions. There seems little probability, at present, of any occurrence which may tend to bring about a general war in Europe, which was no doubt wished and expected by his Dutch majesty.

LATER NEWS.

From London papers to the 4th of Feb. received at New York.

GRAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

Parliament has met, and re-elected *Manners Sutton speaker. The king's speech was to be delivered on the 5th Feb. Cobbett seemed resolved to take a prominent part in the proceedings of the house of commons. He made two speeches on the same day; and attempted a third as the house was adjourning—not a word of which was heard, owing to the noise made by the members leaving the house.

A great excitement prevailed because of a report that ministers would introduce a bill for the immediate emancipation of the slaves in the West Indies—and a deputation having waited upon lord Grey, he informed them that the report was true. This resolution, taken in connection with the present disturbed state of Jamaica, &c. is, indeed, important, and closely interesting to the southern parts of the United States.

The weekly report of the cholera in Ireland, issued in Dublin for the week ending 26th Jan. is as follows: New cases, 558; deaths 243; recoveries 312.

The customs' receipts in Ireland for the year 1832, amounted to £1,227,066, being an excess over the receipts of the previous year of £56,106.

There is a considerable emigration from England to the United States.

U. S. bank stock, London Feb. 2, £22 5s. a £22 10s.

Many troops were arriving in Ireland—but the public peace was exceedingly disturbed.

Since the accession of the present king, the following has been the mortality among the officers of the naval service:—admirals of the fleet, 2; admirals, 12; vice admirals, 9; rear admirals, 12; retired rear admirals, 4—total number of flag officers, 39. Captains, 22; commanders, 25; lieutenants, 349; masters, 28; surgeons, 13; assistant surgeons, 32; pursers, 12.

The customs' duties received at Liverpool during the last year have amounted to nearly the sum of £4,000,000, being an excess over the preceding of £325,000. The increase upon the entire receipts of the country was only £223,167.

Trade and manufactures are very lively in England—and in part because of expected modifications of our tariff laws. Cloths, especially, had advanced in price.

A convention of the clergy had been convened at the chapter house, at St. Paul's, by a mandate from the archbishop of Canterbury. The meeting was opened with much form and ceremony; none of the ancient pomp was forgotten. It is expected that lord Grey's proposed alterations in church property will be submitted to their consideration.

In the Dublin Evening Post of Jan. 24th, there are no less than 22 distinct cases of attack upon houses and persons, reported as having occurred within the preceding week, in the counties of Wexford and Kilkenny only. The attempts upon the habitations were in every instance for the plunder of arms—those upon life or person seem to have been from motives of revenge.

FRANCE.

The total amount of the budget proposed was 18,661,540*fr.* being 286,840*fr.* more than the preceding year. The reductions made during the discussion amount to 312,175*fr.*; leaving the total sum granted 18,349,365, which is 25,833*fr.* less than the preceding year.

The duchess of Berri is sick, and her release is spoken of—with that of the ministers of Charles X. It is pretty plainly intimated that the illness of the duchess has been caused by her amours. The Bourbon party in France are said to be active, and encouraged with a hope of another restoration to power!

It is said that the young duke of Orleans has solicited the hand in marriage of the archduchess Maria Theresa of Austria, now in her 17th year, and eldest daughter of the archduke Charles.

A naval force of four ships of the line and frigates was being fitted out with great expedition at Toulon, destined, it is understood, for the Levant. The topics which now absorb the attention of the French politicians are the conduct and views of Russia, with regard to the contest which is now in progress in Turkey.

The recal of the duke of Revigo from the government of Algiers is talked of, and marshal Clausel is mentioned as likely to be his successor.

Two brothers, clerks in the Spanish house of Alcoher & Co. in Paris, have absconded from that city, with 650,000 francs. One of them was cashier to the house.

A pension of 500 francs has been ordered, by the chambers, to be given to every survivor who assisted at the destruction of the Bastille. The claimants are rather numerous, and are likely to give the dispensing minister considerable trouble. There will be no slight difficulty in settling their pretensions.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

The [Amsterdam] Handelsblad contains the notices that the Dutch government has sent orders to the officer commanding his majesty's naval force in the Scheldt, to allow ships of all nations to enter or to leave the river to or from Antwerp, till arrangements are made settling the terms upon which passage will be permitted. The English, French, and Belgian flags are excepted from this measure, and remain till further orders subject to the second article of the royal decree of the 26th November, 1832.

[Brussels papers, Feb. 2.]

PORTUGAL.

The accounts are very contradictory. No military movements of importance have recently taken place. The result of the negotiations of lord Hervey, to place Donna Maria on the throne, is unknown. Some additional troops had arrived from England and Ireland, and joined Don Pedro.

SPAIN.

For some royal matters see page 54. A conspiracy is said to have existed of a very formidable description. Ferdinand was to sign his own abdication; Don Carlos to be seated on the throne, and the queen was to be banished.

The probability is, that disturbances will happen in Spain—especially because of the intrigues of the priests, lusting for power and money. Carlos is the pet of these.

ITALY.

The Augsburg Gazette of the 15th, has the following of the 6th from Ancona: 'The arrests in the Romagna, especially at Ravenna, continue; many persons of rank, and some literary men, have lately been apprehended. Mr. Vicini, an advocate at Bologna, has been exiled. The French transport vessels in our port have at length received positive orders to sail for the Morea on the 10th inst. to receive on board part of the French troops in Greece.'

MEXICO.

The state of the country is represented to have been, at a late date, in a high degree gratifying to the friends of liberty and order. Certain difficulties which had been apprehended, had ceased to threaten; and the government of Pedraza had become more universally popular and successful than its warmest advocates had anticipated.

The roads between the capital and sea coast were deemed safe, and besides the convoy of a million of dollars which reached Tampico according to previous accounts, one of a much larger amount, (viz. $2,300,000), was on the way, and expected there in a few days, while a third one of very considerable value might reach Vera Cruz about the 1st of March.*

The elections had taken place in the state of Mexico and the federal district, entirely in favor of the patriotic cause.

TURKEY AND EGYPT.

A great battle had taken place at Koniah, in which Ibrahim gained a complete victory, making the grand vizier his prisoner. The Turkish force was about 42,000 men, chiefly Albanians.

*1,200,000 have since arrived at Vera Cruz, and 2,000,000 more were soon expected. These operations shew a more settled state of affairs. The money immediately proceeds either to England or the United States.

The fight was dreadful—the field was bravely contested, but the Egyptian was the victor, and the Turkish army seems to have been totally routed—destroyed. Ibrahim has shewn himself not only a brave general, but an able one. The greatest gloom prevailed in Constantinople. A Russian minister had proceeded to Alexandria to try to make peace, by threatening Mehemet Ali with the displeasure of the emperor, if he perseveres.

A letter of the 19th Jan. from Vienna, states that the draught of a treaty between England, France and Austria, to resist the threatened aggression of Russia on the Turkish frontier, had been drawn up with the concurrence of the Austrian government, and that there was every likelihood of its being duly concluded.

THE IRISH VOLUNTEERS.

Dublin, Sunday, January 13. Yesterday the Irish volunteers assembled at the corn exchange, and Maurice O'Connell, M.P. was moved into the chair.

His father spoke at great length on his intended organization of the volunteers and the national rent which he was particularly anxious the tithe martyrs and their destitute families should speedily derive assistance from. He dwelt particularly on the cases of Twiss and Hennessey, in Cork, and wished he had more information from the county of Wicklow respecting the suffering of individuals there; but that was the business of Mr. Jas. Grattan, who ought then to be at home attending to the distresses of his patriotic constituents instead of disporting himself in London. (Hear.) He moved the appointment of three volunteers to take charge of each county in Ireland, and correspond with each parish on the subject of organizing the collection of the national rent, forwarding petitions to parliament, inquiring into the claims for compensation of the tithe martyrs, and commencing the enrolment of the parochial volunteers. Each man of good character, (certified by his clergyman or five of his neighbors), was admissible into his own parochial corps on payment of 1*s.*

The motion was then carried nem. con. and the details left to the standing committee.

Mr. O'Connell then spoke in terms of strong regret at the extension of the system of midnight association and outrage, which he was assured, from undoubted authority, was reviving with new energy in the counties of Kilkenny, Tipperary and Louth. In the latter county, there was some extraordinary underhand proceedings going forward. Strangers of the lower classes were seen without any visible means of subsistence by trade or occupation, yet with plenty of money, which they spent freely among the people. Midnight associations and marchings were also got up in that hitherto quiet county, and he understood that numbers of the peasantry had been prevailed on at these meetings to receive a shilling bounty and sign their names to a list. In the counties of Tipperary and Kilkenny the state of affairs was fast approaching that of Louth; the consequence was, that the police would be doubled, and crime increased in proportion, as had always been found by experience.

Mr. Finn, M.P. also stated that in his county, (Kilkenny), he could declare, on his own experience, that men known as robbers and murderers were allowed to go about the country with arms in their hands, unmolested by the magistrates; that these men had plenty of money, and were constantly seen spending it in the public houses, when, doubtless, they were inciting to fresh crimes.

Mr. O'Connell, in continuation, said he would not accuse the leaders of the government in Ireland of having made these arrangements or furnish funds to lead the people into rebellion, but he strongly suspected some of the underlings of the castle of taking the trouble to prepare a case for parliament, with the hope of introducing martial law into Ireland, and driving the people into insurrection. He strongly insinuated that the money employed in treating the peasantry, came from the conservative society. The present was a crisis very like that which preceded the formation of the Catholic association in 1828. Then there were 11 counties proclaimed in Ireland, and 7 counties under the peace preservation act. It was said that the organization of the Catholic association would inflame the peasantry still more, but what was the fact? Before 9 months after its formation all these counties were quiet, and the strong measures of government were withdrawn. The truth was, a strong government in Ireland was always productive of Whiteboyism or Whitefootism, while the hope of constitutional redress always effected the most perfect tranquillity. (Hear.) A crisis similar to that of 1828 had now arrived. The people were prevented from expressing their grievances openly, peaceably and constitutionally, they were in despair of good government, and unless the Irish volunteers immediately bestirred themselves and took the peace of the country under their own protection, and saved the people from despair, he feared that instead of three counties in a state of nightly insurrection, (Mr. O'Connell was not, it appears, aware of the state of the county of Wexford), there would next week be 12 counties in the same alarming state. (Hear.)

Mr. Steel, who felt proud to call himself 'Mr. O'Connell's principal pacificator' offered to go to either Louth or Tipperary, or wherever the liberator pleased, to exhort the people to peace, as the only means of saving the country from martial law, and promoting the measure of repeal.

Mr. O'Connell accepted the offer, and it is understood that he will start to-morrow for either Louth or Tipperary.

Letters were read from the following members of parliament, promising to attend the national council, viz: O'Connor Don, G.

S. Barry, R. M. Bellew, Fitzstephen French, W. J. O. N. Daunt and Nicholas Fitzsimon; and from the following declining: sir T. Gladstone, Mervyn Archdault, F. Jones and N. A. Vigors.

Mr. O'Connell made humorous expose of Mr. Blake Foster's conduct at a former Galway election. Three candidates had started, and Blake Foster sold all his 40s. freeholders to each! "When I," said Mr. O'Connell, "taxed him with this, he admitted the charge, but declared that it only proved his impartiality; for he had, after making his own bargain, allowed each of his freeholders to sell themselves to any of the candidates as high as they could." In conclusion Mr. O'Connell undertook on this day, "after mass," to prepare an address to the peasantry of Ireland, beseeching them to keep the peace, or their country never would become a nation.

From the Dublin Evening Mail, of January 16. Regiments are arriving daily at several of our ports, with a hope, on the part of our misguided rulers, that their appearance will operate as a check upon the rebellious manifestations which are assuming so fixed and formidable an appearance. Nothing can be more preposterous than such a hope. "The people," as they are called, sneer at the military displays of the marquis of Anglesea, and laugh outright at his sham fights and stage spectacles. Already have the priests commenced regular approaches towards the soldiery, through the columns of their acknowledged journal in the south of Ireland, which contains the following conciliatory paragraph, presenting, as the Register of this day says, a "very national view of the subject." It says—

"We would like to have the troops here, by all means—the majority of them are our own countrymen—and they would spend among us some of the taxes which are raised from our sweat and industry."

There is no mistaking the meaning of this patriotic appeal to the national prejudices of such of the soldiers as may happen to be Irish. Whether the bait take or no, just depends upon the number of Papists that each regiment may contain, or the quantum of influence that the priests may be permitted to exercise. If they be treated with the same deference at military headquarters that they receive at those of the civic authorities—at the castle of Dublin, the worst consequences may be apprehended.

In fact, there is but one course now open to any government—whichever it may be—a suspension of the habeas corpus act, the proclamation of martial law, and the arming and calling out the Protestant yeomanry.

Dublin, Jan. 13.—The accounts from the country are terrific; and those counties which have been hitherto tranquil, are now the scene of the same system of outrages which have lately characterised the more southern parts of Ireland. A novel addition to the catalogue deserves to be noticed. The tenantry have systematically commenced refusing to pay rent except to the landlords in person. The avowed object of this is to compel the return of the absentees; but the consequences are obvious. A privy council was held at the castle yesterday, but I have not heard the result.

Lord Anglesea leaves this country on the 25th instant—possibly never to return in the capacity of viceroy.

STATE OF IRELAND.

The search for arms, and the midnight marches in the counties of Louth and Kilkenny, are going on with the same reckless determination on the part of the unfortunate peasantry. In the former county they call themselves Rihanduen, and seem intent on more serious and extensive work than their brethren in Kilkenny are occupied with. When they enter houses their principal business is to obtain arms; but the Kilkenny "Regulators," as the Whitefeet sometimes call themselves, are also occupied in dictating terms to landlord, tenant, employer and laborer. The nightly assemblies in the county of Louth are composed of multitudes, notwithstanding the inclement season of the year.

In the county of Kilkenny the list of outrages continues undiminished, either by the presence of an increased constabulary force or the approach of cavalry. Details of attacks on 12 houses are given between the 7th and 13th Jan. inclusive, in various parts of the country. In these visits the Whitefeet severely beat and wounded three of the inmates, houghed two cows and a horse, and burned some stacks of wheat and out offices. Some wheat and bread were also carried off from a mill and a bakery. On Thursday night between 200 and 300 men assembled in a field near the village of Paulstown and spent some hours in military manoeuvres, without committing any actual mischief.

In the county of Cork, on Thursday night, four cows were houghed, and sheep killed and carried off; 100 police have withdrawn in these three days been added to the constabulary there.

The neighborhood of Ballina also displays a Whitefoot spirit. On Friday the mills of George Irwin, of Gouran, were entered, and the machinery destroyed, and his brother John was severely beaten. The miller had voted for the present conservative members. The house of Mr. Suddart, of Dulestake, in that neighborhood, was also robbed of fire arms on the same night.

IRISH NATIONAL COUNCIL.

O'Connell's national council met at Dublin Jan. 17. Twenty-nine Irish members of parliament were present, including four by the name of O'Connell. The hon. col. Butler, M. P. for the county of Kilkenny was called to the chair.

Mr. Thomas Steele attended as Mr. O'Connell's private secretary, and Maurice O'Connell, M. P. acted as secretary of meeting. At 12 o'clock Mr. Staunton was called before the council, and informed the chairman that he had undertaken to submit to them some financial information on the following subjects, viz: on the present amount of the Irish funded debts; on the consolidation of the exchequers, and on the effects of that consolidation; on the burdens endured by Ireland; also the progress of revenue in Ireland since the union.

He then entered into a long financial detail on these subjects, on which he was interrupted by Mr. O'Connell, who requested that he would have the goodness to get his information printed, as it was impossible to follow him in conversation. Mr. Staunton, however, continued his statement at great length, the principal points of his expose have already been printed in the Morning Register, (about three months since), on a motion passed by the national political union. One of his positions was that the consolidation of the exchequers was illegal (vide act of union); another was that £2,000,000 clear surplus were due to Ireland, on a balance of accounts with England; another, that all Irish expenses were paid out of Irish taxes; and, lastly, that Irish revenues had improved from 1792 to 1800, and declined since to 1827. The thanks of the council were then given to Mr. Staunton for his communication, and he undertook to print his statement for the use of the Irish members.

The convention was expected to continue for several days. On the 19th, the latter part of the day was chiefly occupied with the discussion of four resolutions on the abolition of tithes, which had been previously agreed on at London last session, by a meeting of Irish members, viz: "That it is essential to the people of England that the system of tithes in that country should be extinguished, not in name only, but in substance and reality."

From the Dublin Evening Post.

"There is a 'suppressed insurrection' in every county, and almost in every parish, not a day, not a single day, passes over our heads without receiving an account of a murder, or of an outrage of some kind or other. There is no safety. The very roots of the community are loosened. The frame of society is almost going to pieces. The constabulary, when not actually mischievous, as in the horrible case at Kanturk, have become powerless, and the troops of the line, the only force upon whose prudence and devotion confidence can be placed, are harassed to death by the inglorious duty they are obliged to perform. It is also quite notorious that plundering for arms is not confined to one district, or county, or province, but that the system has spread in all directions, from Dublin to Cork, to Limerick, to Waterford, and even to Galway. There is no safety for life or property in twenty counties out of the thirty-two. And here we may exemplify this state of things by an incident which occurred on Sunday, in the broad day-light, near Shannon harbour. The canal boat from Ballinasloe was stopped, the insurgents having previously ascertained that it contained fourteen stand of arms belonging to the water guards; a party, well armed, entered, smashed through the cabins, placed the commander of the boat under arrest, with two bayonets at his bosom, and possessed themselves of the arms. This occurred, we are assured by a gentleman who was present, within a quarter of a mile of the police station."

ROYAL MATTERS IN SPAIN.

Royal decree.—Being recovered from my illness, I have determined to charge myself with the despatch of public business from this day, and wish to be assisted therein by my dear and beloved wife, in order that those affairs in which she is engaged may be more satisfactorily concluded, as well as to give a proof of my satisfaction with the zeal and wisdom with which she has rewarded my sovereign confidence. Let it be done and made known to the secretaries of state.

With the rubric of the royal hand of the king our lord.

In the palace, the 4th of January, 1833.

I THE KING.

To the first secretary of state, president of the council of ministers.

To my dear and beloved wife, the queen.

In the most grievous and severe illness with which it pleased Divine Providence to afflict me, the inseparable company and incessant care of your majesty have been to me a sole comfort and consolation. Never did my eyes open without seeing you at my side, and finding in your looks and soothing words lenitives to my pains. Never did I receive any assistance which did not come from your hand. To you I am indebted for consolation in my affliction, and relief in my anguish.

Debilitated by so protracted a suffering, and only recovering by slow and delicate amendment, I confided in your hands the reins of government, in order that no interruption should be given to the despatch of the public business, and I have seen, with delight, the singular diligence and wisdom with which you have directed it, and so completely answered my confidence. All the decrees which you have made, either for the promotion of public instruction, or to dry up the tears of the unfortunate, or to advance the general wealth and produce of my revenues——in a word, every action of yours, without exception, has been to me the most satisfactory, because they have been made wisely and opportunely for the happiness of the people.

Restored again from my malady, and charging myself once more with the affairs of the state, I render to your majesty my most fervent thanks for your assistance in my illness, and for your intelligence and activity in the government. The gratitude for these actions, which shall ever live in my heart, will be a new stimulus to, and a justification for, the love which from the beginning your talents and virtues inspired me with. I rejoice myself, and congratulate your majesty, that having been the delight of the Spanish nation since your coming to the throne, for my good and that of my people, you will be from the present moment, an example of conjugal tenderness to all wives, and a model in administration of queens.

In the palace, the 4th of January, 1833.

FERDINAND.

Royal decree.—Desirous to manifest my gratitude and love for the incomparable attention which I owe in my illness, to my dear and most beloved wife, and my satisfaction for the wisdom and tact with which she has rewarded my sovereign confidence during my indisposition, I order that a medal shall be struck, to perpetuate the memory of such splendid actions.

Make it known, and order it to be done.

With the rubric of the royal hand of the king our lord.

In the palace, 4th January, 1833.

To the count Ophalia.

ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES.

HEAD QUARTERS OF THE ARMY,

Adjutant general's office, Washington, March 11, 1833.

ORDER NO. 15.

1. Colonel Henry Dodge, of the United States' dragoons, will continue in command of the battalion of mounted rangers, and will now repair to the frontiers; thence, as soon as circumstances will permit, he will proceed to inspect the several companies of the battalion, and see that they be prepared and equipped agreeably to law, and that they be held in readiness for any active service which may be required of them, until relieved by companies of the regular cavalry.

2. Lieutenant colonel Stephen W. Kearney will superintend the recruiting for the regiment; and the several company officers, whose appointments have been announced in general order No. 14, will report to him for orders and recruiting instructions. Lt. col. Kearney, until further orders, will be stationed at Jefferson barracks; he will establish as many recruiting stations as he may judge necessary, and at such places, within the interior, as may be deemed most likely to recruit healthy, active, respectable men of the country, being native citizens of the United States, not under twenty, nor over thirty-five years of age; and whose size, figure, and active pursuits in life, may best qualify them for the duties and active service of mounted soldiers.

3. The lieutenant colonel, as superintendent, and all officers employed in recruiting for the regiment of dragoons, will strictly observe, and be governed by the established recruiting regulations: and the monthly returns, muster and descriptive roll, reports, &c. will be regularly made, and be transmitted to the adjutant general of the army.

4. Jefferson barracks is the station designated for the concentration of recruits enlisted for the dragoons, at which post the regiment will be organised by the field officers, under such instructions as they may receive from the general-in-chief.

5. The general-in-chief hopes that it is unnecessary to remind the officers appointed to the regiment now ordered to be raised, of the necessity of devoting their undivided attention to the important service in which they are about to enter—but he would remark, that the president expects that every officer will repair to his post without delay, and that all will immediately assume their respective duties, and proceed with alacrity in the discharge of them; and that the regiment will be recruited, organised, instructed and equipped for service in the field, by the earliest day practicable.

6. The head quarters of the United States' regiment of dragoons, are established at Jefferson barracks.

Major Richard B. Mason will report for orders and instructions to lieut. col. Kearney.

By order of major general Macomb:

R. JONES, adj't gen.

PENNSYLVANIA LEGISLATURE.

Harrisburg, March 12. At 12 o'clock the two houses met in convention, for the purpose of again attempting to elect an United States senator, in the place of George M. Dallas. One ballot only was taken, of which the following is the result:—Samuel McKean, 46; Richard Rush, 39; John Sergeant, 17; H. A. Muhlenburg, 16; Walter C. Livingston, 7; George M. Dallas, 3.

Mr. Breck then moved that the convention adjourn, sine die. Messrs. Miller and Lacoek attempted to speak upon the question of adjournment; but the president (Mr. Burden), decided the question not debatable. Mr. Miller appealed from the decision of the chair. Upon this question a long and animated debate arose, in which Messrs. Miller, Lacoek, Breck, Packer, Wallace, Lewis, and Read, took part. Mr. Lacoek, in the course of his remarks, took a wide range, and spoke upon the propriety of adjournment, when Mr. Burden called him to order, and wished him to confine himself to the question. Mr. L. defied the power of the president—said he had no right to call him to order, and that the president could enforce no rule which the convention itself had not established. Mr. Burden said he should attempt it—Mr. L. "come on;" but the altercation stopped amid cries of "order," "order," and Mr. Lacoek sat down.

Mr. Packer then suggested to the senators the propriety of withdrawing to discuss the question in their own chamber; but the proposition was not favorably received, and order having been established, the convention adjourned to meet again this day three weeks, (April 2d.) The convention refused to sustain the decision of the chair, on the question whether a motion to adjourn was debatable, by a vote 97 to 27.

SOUTH CAROLINA CONVENTION.

FROM THE CHARLESTON MERCURY.

Columbia, March 11th, 1833.

DEAR SIR: The convention of the state was re-assembled to-day, at noon. The president called the assembly to order, precisely at that hour; the rev. Mr. Ware (a member) officiating as chaplain.

The roll being called, 137 members appeared to be in their places.

Mr. Turnbull rose, to tender the excuse of a venerable friend for his absence. If it had been possible, he said, for the strong wishes of the heart to triumph over the wishes of the body, his friend would have been in his seat on this floor. He had begged, however, to say, that in spirit, in sympathy with the high motives, that directed their acts—in the full confidence which he gave to their course, in all that the public necessities might demand—he was with them still; and would gladly, if the forms of such an assembly permitted it, ask permission to record, upon their journals, his concurrence in all that the spirit, which he knew directed that body, could lead them to do. The name of his friend, Mr. T. said, was James Hamilton, sen.

The president then addressed the convention in a speech explaining the motives of his re-assembling them. It was as follows:

Gentlemen—In exercising the power of calling you together, which you were pleased to place in my hands at your adjournment, I have regretted the inconvenience to which I must have subjected many of you in being compelled to leave your homes at a season so essential to the success of the agricultural labors of the whole year. It must however have been manifest to you from the nature of the proceedings of this body at its former meeting, that its re-assembling after the adjournment of congress, was an event of highly probable occurrence. Before however this necessity was demonstrated, I was officially apprised by the governor of South Carolina, on the 5th Feb. of the arrival of a commissioner on the part of the state of Virginia, bearing certain resolutions adopted by the general assembly of that state, respectfully soliciting of this state, a suspension or rescinding of the ordinance of her convention until the adjournment of the next session of congress. These resolutions were accompanied by an application on the part of the gentleman in this commission that this convention should be convened at an early moment. The high source from which this mediation emanated, the friendly dispositions by which it was obviously dictated, borne too, and advocated by a gentleman so long and so advantageously known among the most able and devoted champions of the rights of the states, left me by what I was quite sure would be your own decision, no other alternative (if my own inclinations had been wanting) than a compliance with the wishes of that distinguished commonwealth as communicated by her representative. As I was however perfectly satisfied that no decision on the propositions of which he was the bearer could be made prior to the adjournment of congress, the period of your assembling has been arranged to meet both contingencies.

You have thus assembled, gentlemen, and the proposed mediation of Virginia is met concurrently by the passage of an act by the congress of the United States, modifying the tariff of the 14th of July last, and by an act entitled "an act more effectually to provide for the execution of the revenue laws."

In bringing both these laws to your view, and invoking your mature consideration of their provisions and objects, it would not become me to make any suggestions as to the course it behoves you to pursue in reference to these measures. If the first is not in all respects satisfactory, as coming up to that measure of justice, to which the south had a fair claim, and is liable to some important objections, it nevertheless, provides for the commencement of an early though gradual amelioration of that system, against which we have so long complained, and for an ulterior recognition of the constitutional principles upon which our rights are assumed to rest. In forming your estimate, however, of whatever may be its intrinsic value, you will not be insensible to the fact, that it is a compromise of extreme vexatious and conflicting interests made in the spirit of peace, as an offering to the concord and tranquillity of our common country. In such a spirit our representatives in congress voted for it, and in such a spirit must we consider it whatever may be our final decision on the measure. This adjustment, however, comes to us, at least with this compensation for the justice which it yet withholds—that all that has been beneficially accomplished by it for the country, is to be attributed to the action of this convention, and the energy, decision, and love of liberty, of that people, by whom our proceedings have been sustained. We may surely say this without any unworthy vaunting, when the most able of our opponents has borne testimony to the truth of this fact.

It is greatly to be regretted, with a single view to the harmony and repose of the country, that this adjustment should be accompanied by the other measure to which I have invited your attention.

If we could regard the act, which provides by its title, "for a more effectual execution of the revenue laws," but which, in fact, provides for the coercion of a sovereign state in this union, as an empty defiance got up as a mere salvo for the wounded pride, or to gratify a worse passion of the executive, we might permit it silently to pass by, with that reprobation with which, not posterity alone, but at an early moment, a contemporary age, will visit it, standing impotently, as it will stand a dead letter on our statute book; but as a mere precedent engrafted on our laws, it is of the most serious and portentous import, furnishing, as it does, the most unequivocal evidence, that as far as the authority of law extends (independently, thanks be to God, of the spirit of a free people) by a single act of legislation, the character of our government is changed and a military despotism placed at the disposal of the executive, when he shall determine in his own discretion, that a fit exigency has arisen for its exercise. The broad usurpation in this law of the right on the part of congress to coerce a sovereign state in this union, when this power was solemnly withheld by the convention, that formed the constitution, the utter annihilation of our judiciary in cases clearly within their exclusive jurisdiction, and the still more revolting circumstance that in obeying the laws of their own state, and executing the mandates of their own courts, the lives of our citizens are placed at the mercy of the standing forces of the union, all concur to present an epoch in the public liberty of the country, which ought not to be allowed to pass without your animadversion. And you will permit me further to remark, whether the adjustment of the tariff be deemed satisfactory or not, that much remains for you to do, in making of constitutional record in an enduring form those great conservative principles, which have borne us yet through this contest, to say nothing of the necessity of providing those securities which may in all future time, command the fealty and obedience, of those who receive the protection of our laws.

You will now I trust, allow me to refer to a matter which is personal to myself. The distinguished station I now occupy, I owe to the accidental circumstance of my having been the chief magistrate of this state, when the convention first assembled.

Another individual now on this floor fills that post. I feel that I am not alone paying a proper deference to an established and valuable precedent, but a just homage to superior personal claims and more eminent qualifications, when I signify in the presence of this convention, that it is my purpose, after the reading of the correspondence I now communicate, between the commissioner from Virginia and the public authorities of this state, to resign this seat.

In making this declaration, permit me to superadd to it my unfeigned acknowledgments for your past kindness and confidence, and my fervent prayer, that the God of all mercy and truth may so order and govern our proceeding, that they may redound to the liberty, peace and happiness of our country.

The clerk then read the correspondence of the governor and president of the convention, with the commissioner on the part of Virginia.

A further communication from the governor was also submitted, which conveys a communication from the Virginia commissioner, which will be sent.

According to the intimation given in his speech, the president then requested the convention to regard the chair as vacated, by his resignation; and to proceed to ballot for a president.

The ballot was accordingly made, and governor Hayne elected; who, being conducted to the chair, by judge Johnston, and col. Thomas Pinckney, addressed the assembly in a short and unadorned speech of thanks.

On motion of gen. Hamilton, a seat within the bar of the house was assigned to the Virginia commissioner. He was introduced by Messrs. Heyward, Earle and I'On, the assembly receiving him uncovered and standing.

On motion of col. I'On, seats were also assigned to such of our members of congress and of the legislature, as may be present.

Judge Colcock, for the purpose of the speedier despatch of the business before the convention, moved that a general committee of twenty-one be appointed to which the subjects placed before them, by the president's speech, should be referred. The motion was adopted.

The committee is the same as was that of the former sitting, except only that four other gentlemen will be substituted, for gen. Hayne, col. Manning, Mr. Robert Barnwell, and Mr. Middleton; the latter three of whom are absent.

Judge Harper moved the printing of the documents submitted by the president of the convention. It was ordered.

The convention then adjourned to 1 o'clock to-morrow, Tuesday, March 19th, 1833. The hon. C. J. Colcock, from a select committee of twenty-one, reported to the convention an ordinance and an accompanying report, on the subject of the act of the late congress of the United States, entitled "an act to modify the act of the 14th July, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties on imports."

The report and ordinance were as follows: The committee to whom was referred the communication of the honorable B. W. Leigh, commissioner from the state of Virginia, and all other matters connected with the subject, and the course which should be pursued by the convention at the present important crisis of our political affairs, beg leave to report, in part,

That they have had under consideration the act passed at the late session of congress to modify the "act of the 14th of July, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties upon imports;" and have duly deliberated on the course which it becomes the people of South Carolina to pursue at this interesting crisis in our political affairs. It is now upwards of ten years since the people and constituted authorities of this state, took ground against the protective system, as "unconstitutional, oppressive, and unjust," and solemnly declared, in language which was then cordially responded to by the other southern states, that it never could be submitted to "as the settled policy of the country." After remonstrating for years against this system in vain, and making every possible effort to produce a redress of this grievance by invoking the protection of the constitution, and by appealing to the justice of our brethren, we saw during the session of congress, which ended in July last, a modification effected avowedly as the final adjustment of the tariff, to take effect after the complete extinguishment of the public debt, by which the protective system could only be considered as rivetted upon the country forever. Believing that, under these circumstances, there was no hope of any further reduction of the duties from the ordinary action of the federal government; and convinced that under the operation of this system the labor and capital of the plantation states must be forever tributary to the manufacturing states; and that we should in effect be reduced to a condition of colonial vassalage, South Carolina felt herself constrained, by a just regard for her own rights and interests, by her love of liberty and her devotion to the constitution, to interpose in her sovereign capacity for the purpose of arresting the progress of the evil, and maintaining, within her own limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties appertaining to her as a sovereign state. Ardently attached to the union of the states, the people of South Carolina were still more devoted to the rights of the states, without which the union itself would cease to be a blessing; and well convinced that the regulation of the whole labor and capital of this vast confederacy by a great central government must lead inevitably to the total destruction of our free institutions, they did not hesitate to throw themselves fearlessly into the breach, to arrest the torrent of usurpation, which was sweeping before it all that was truly valuable in our political system.

The effect of this interposition, if it has not equalled our wishes, has been beyond what existing circumstances would have authorised us to expect. The spectacle of a single state, unaided and alone, standing up for her rights—influenced by no other motive than a sincere desire to maintain the public liberty and bring about a salutary reform in the administration of the government, has roused the attention of the whole country, and has caused many to pause and reflect, who have heretofore seemed madly bent on the consummation of a scheme of policy absolutely fatal to the liberty of the people, and the prosperity of a large portion of the union—though reviled and slandered by those whose pecuniary or political interests stood in the way of a satisfactory adjustment of the controversy—deserted by many to whom she had a right to look for succor and support, and threatened with violence from abroad, and convulsions within, South Carolina, conscious of the rectitude of her intentions and the justice of her cause, has stood unmoved; firmly resolved to maintain her liberties, or perish in the conflict. The result has been a beneficial modification of the tariff of 1832, and even before the time appointed for that act to go into effect; and within a few months after its enactment, accompanied by a provision for a gradual reduction of the duties to the revenue standard. Though the reduction provided for by the bill, which has just been passed, is, neither in its amount or the time when it is to go into effect, such as the south had a right to require; yet such an approach has been made towards the true principles on which the duties on imports ought to be adjusted under our system, that the people of South Carolina are willing, so far to yield to the measure, as to agree that their ordinance shall henceforth be considered as having no force or effect. Unequal and oppressive as the system of raising revenue by duties upon imports must be upon the agricultural states, which furnish more than two-thirds of the domestic exports of the United States; yet South Carolina always has been, and still is willing to make large sacrifices to the peace and harmony of the union. Though she believes that the protecting system is founded in the assumption of powers not granted by the constitution to the federal government, yet she has never insisted on such an immediate reduction of the duties as should involve the manufacturers in ruin.

That a reduction to the lowest amount necessary to supply the wants of the government might be safely effected in four or five years, cannot, in our estimation, admit of a reasonable doubt; still, in a great struggle for principles, South Carolina would disdain to cavil about a small amount of duties, and a few years more or less in effecting the adjustment, provided only she can secure substantial justice, and obtain a distinct recognition of the principle for which she has so long contended. Among the provisions of the new bill, which recommend it to our acceptance, is the establishment of a system of ad valorem duties; and the entire abandonment of the specific duties, and the wine—namely, "Tyrannical provisions, by which duties, rated nominally at twenty five per cent. were in many cases raised to upwards of one hundred per cent. and by which the coarse and cheap articles, used by the poor, were taxed much higher than the expensive articles used by the rich; an unjust and odious regulation, against which we have constantly protested in the most earnest terms. The reduction before the expiration of the present year of one-tenth part of the duties on all articles "exceeding twenty per cent. on the value thereof," embracing the entire mass of protected articles, and a gradual reduction thereafter, on such articles, down to twenty per cent. the duties upon which under the tariff of 1832, range from thirty to upwards of one hundred per cent. and average upwards of fifty per cent. are great and manifest ameliorations of the system to the benefits of which we cannot be insensible. But, great as must be the advantage of these reductions, they are small in comparison with the distinct recognition, in the new bill, of two great principles, which we deem of inestimable value—that the duties shall eventually be brought down to the revenue standard—even if it shall be found necessary to reduce the duties on the protected articles below twenty per cent. and that no more money shall be raised than shall be necessary to an economical administration of the government.

These provisions embody the great principles in reference to this subject for which South Carolina has so long and so earnestly contended; and if the pledge therein contained shall be fulfilled in good faith, they must, in their operations, arrest the abuses which have grown out of the unauthorised appropriations of the public money. We should consider the reduction of revenue to the amount "necessary to the economical administration of the government," as one of the happiest reforms which could possibly take place in the practical operation of our system; as it would arrest the progress of corruption, limit the exercise of executive patronage and power, restore the independence of the states, and put an end to all these questions of disputed power, against which we have constantly protested. It is this aspect of the question which has reconciled us to the provisions of the new bill, (certainly not free from objections), which provide for the introduction of linens, silks, worsted and a number of other articles, free of duty. The reduction of revenue which will thereby be effected, and the beneficial influence of a free trade, in several of these articles, which are almost exclusively purchased by the agricultural staples of the southern states, and which will furnish an advantageous exchange for these productions, to the amount of several millions of dollars annually, are considerations not to be overlooked. Nor can we be insensible to the benefits to be derived from the united efforts of the whole south, aided by other states having interests identified with our own in bringing about the late adjustment of the tariff, promising, we trust, for the future, that union of sentiment, and concert in action, which are necessary to secure the rights and interests of the southern states. On the whole, in whatever aspect the question is contemplated, your committee find in the late modification of the tariff cause for congratulation and triumph. If we have not yet succeeded in the complete establishment of the great principles of free trade and constitutional liberty, such progress has been made towards the accomplishment of the former, as must serve to rekindle our hopes, and to excite us to fresh exertions in the glorious work of reform in which we are engaged. Influenced by these views, the committee is satisfied that it would not comport with the liberal feelings of the people of South Carolina, nor be consistent with the sincere desire by which they have always been animated, not only to live in harmony with their brethren, but to preserve the union of the states, could they hesitate, under existing circumstances, in recommending that the ordinance of nullification, and the acts of the legislature consequent thereon, be henceforth held and deemed of no force and effect. And they recommend the following

ORDINANCE:

Whereas, the congress of the United States, by an act recently passed, has made such a reduction and modification of the duties upon foreign imports as amount substantially to an ultimate reduction of the duties to the revenue standard; and that no higher duties shall be laid than may be necessary to defray the economical expenditures of the government—

It is therefore ordained and declared, That the ordinance entitled "an ordinance to nullify certain acts of the congress of the United States, purporting to be laws laying duties on the importation of foreign commodities," and all acts passed in pursuance thereof, be henceforth deemed and held to have no force or effect; provided that the act entitled "an act further to alter and amend the militia laws of this state," passed on the 20th day of December, 1832, shall remain in full force until it shall be repealed or modified by the legislature.

On motion of col. Wilson, these were ordered to be printed, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Col. Wilson, after a few explanatory remarks, introduced the following resolution, to wit:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to wait on our senators and representatives lately in congress, and now in the town of Columbia, to give us genuine information relative to the late proceedings of the federal government towards South Carolina, in consequence of the ordinance of nullification, passed by the people of this state, in convention, in November last; and that the committee report what arrangements may be made as to the manner and time of giving the information desired.

On motion of Judge Colecock, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

After a short interval, col. Wilson moved to take it up for immediate consideration.

Gen. Hamilton moved to postpone it until to-morrow.

After some slight debate, the vote was taken on the question of postponement, and the motion failed—ayes 66, noes 69.

The resolution was then adopted, and col. Wilson, general Hamilton and chancellor Johnston, were appointed the committee.

Col. Wilson then introduced the following resolutions, to wit:

Whereas, a convention of the people of the state has been called to place the state of South Carolina upon its sovereignty, and consider of and do such acts as may, in the opinion of this convention, serve more effectually to perpetuate the same. And whereas, protection and allegiance are reciprocal duties, and a fundamental principle of all governments; be it therefore

Resolved, That it is expedient and proper that the constitution of this state be so altered and amended, as to require every elector who may claim to exercise the elective franchise, in addition to the qualification now prescribed, to take an oath of allegiance to the state of South Carolina; and upon the refusal of any elector to take such oath, the managers of election shall not be permitted to receive his vote.

Resolved, That it is expedient and proper, that all officers hereafter to be elected to any office of honor, profit or trust, civil or military, be required to take an oath of paramount allegiance to the state of South Carolina.

These resolutions having been laid before the convention by the president—

Mr. Turnbull stated the committee of twenty-one already had the subject to which they referred, under consideration; whereupon,

Mr. Wilson moved that they should be referred to that committee; which was agreed to.

Gen. Hamilton then moved, that the gentleman who offered these resolutions should be added to the committee; which being agreed to, the hon. John L. Wilson was added to the select committee of twenty-one.

On motion of col. Elmore, the convention adjourned until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The Columbia correspondent of the Charleston Mercury says: Neither Clay's nor Wilkins' bill has yet reached the greater part of the members in its final form. With the former, there is a discontent, among some few, amounting to thorough repugnance. These are ultras, of course.

As to Wilkins' inquiry, it excites an unmingled indignation. I have little doubt that it will be nullified. If it is not, the doctrine of nullification may be considered as abandoned.

I am glad to perceive a general and most hearty horror of the conduct of Blair, Mitchell and Drayton, upon this detestable bill. They are regarded as ultra pariahs.

Our members all agree that the passage of Clay's bill was looked upon on all sides, as the effect of nullification alone. The question among the northern men was—"will this satisfy South Carolina?" The tariff men, who opposed it, all joined in execrating nullification, as the worker of the mischief; and swore that they would back the people, and rally them against it. So general and avowed was the feeling, that when, after the passage of the act, a rumor had arisen, that the president would veto it, at its being suddenly announced to the house, by the private secretary, that the bill had received the president's assent, Judge Clayton, (of Georgia), sprung up from his seat, and, clapping his hands, cried out exultingly, "hurrah for nullification!"

Messrs. Calhoun, Miller, McDuffie, Barnwell and Nuckolls, members of congress, were at Columbia.

By the following article from the Charleston Courier, of the 12th instant, it will be seen, that the meeting of the UNION CONVENTION has been indefinitely postponed:

"The committee appointed to determine the time and place for the reassembling of the union convention, taking into consideration the late passage of a tariff bill, which has been regarded as a conciliatory measure by both parties, and the assurances given by the leading politicians from this state, that its adoption would prove satisfactory to the convention now in session at Columbia; not doubting that the pledge given by them will be honorably redeemed by that body, rejoicing in the prospect of returning peace, and desirous of removing, as far as depends upon them, all further cause of agitation in the state; hereby give notice, that the sacrifice, which the attendance upon the union convention in this city on the 18th day of this month, would impose upon their fellow citizens, is no longer regarded as necessary, and the meeting of said convention hereby postponed. The committee beg leave to assure their fellow citizens of the union and state rights party, that if, contrary to all reasonable expectations, new acts of tyranny by the dominant party in the state, should call for united opposition from the friends of the union, the convention shall be promptly convoked, in order to take such measures as the exigency may demand to vindicate the rights of the people.

THE "GLORIES" OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

From the Columbia Telescope, March 12, 1833.

The convention of South Carolina has once more assembled. Expectation will be strongly fixed upon its proceedings. We will endeavor to say what they are like to be.

The convention will accede to the present arrangement of the tariff, by Mr. Clay's bill. The state feels that the present adjustment is less than was due. But she will not, for the degree by no means important, in which this bill falls short of a perfectly fair settlement, disturb the peace of the confederacy.

The adjustment, indeed, is one, at which all men must feel bound to rejoice, while it is impossible to be contented with it. Yet it is much to have been gained, at a single effort, and against such vast odds. Never was there a prouder instance of the might of just principles, backed by a high courage. This little state, in the mere panoply of courage and high principles, has foiled the swaggering giant of the union. 30,000 Carolinians have not only availed the wild west into respect,—compelled Pennsylvania's stolidity into something like sense—New York corruption into something like decency—Yankee rapacity into a sort of inage of honesty; but all this has been lofty and steadily done, in the face of 17,000—what shall we call them? What epithet is of a shame wide, lasting and deep enough, for the betrayers of the liberties of their own country—the instigators of merciless slaughter—the contrivers of irretrievable servitude, against their own struggling state?

The tariff, then, is overthrown; the corrupt majorities in congress have yielded. The madness of the government has, at last, found a slight lucid interval. It is an interval only. For, as if in the mere wantonness of folly, they have joined to the concession, thus wrung from them by mere fear and interest, ANOTHER ACT, capable in its consequences of utterly defeating the compromise, at which they grasp.

We speak of Wilkins' bill; the "bloody bill;" which they have passed, we believe, in mere bravado—only to cover the shame of their defeat. They may find it, however, in the hands of the chief of this atrocious administration, not the mere brutem fulmen that it was intended to be.

Whether or not he seize at once upon the dangerous powers of this act, and brandish them, to drive this state into a conflict, it is quite certain that the bloody bill will not be submitted to by this state. The convention, we make no doubt, will nullify it. Such seems distinctly the public view.

We have as little doubt, too, that the state, taught by the recent events, will adopt an oath of paramount allegiance to her authorities. This whole contest, indeed, has been nothing else than one of allegiance. If we ever consent again to place ourselves in the same difficulty, in any future struggle with the general government, we shall almost deserve that loss of liberty, which had so nearly been the fruit of our past omission of that which no civilized state ever yet omitted, that had been visited, (as all states must sooner or later be), by a domestic contest for liberty.

The legislature will probably have to assemble, in order to repeal such of its late laws as are founded on the ordinance of the 24th November. It may also have to provide statutes for carrying into effect acts of the present sitting of the convention.

It would seem as well, since "our father gen. Jackson" appears determined to attack us, that he should begin to think of — the who, and the how, and the where and the when.

Let us see. He has 700 men, (all told), in the Charleston forts. At Augusta, he has just 260.

While the Indians threaten the north western frontier, how many more men, of the present army, can be sent against us?

Our information is strong and clear, that he cannot add 300 to the troops upon our borders.

To make his forces, then, any thing beyond a mere garrison, he must recruit. How long will it take to raise an army, in that way? Can it be done in 3 months?—by the first of June? It is clearly impossible.

The militia, then, must be his resource.

Suppose, even, that Georgia and North Carolina agree to send their militia against us. (We will even grant that which is impossible.) How long will it take to organize them and send them out on a campaign? Can it be done in three months.

We have found it impossible, with a population full of alacrity and zeal, to put ourselves even in a posture of defence, in less than three months. Will the near states be promptier than we? Or must they equipt and discipline and transport a New England army? Will that be more expeditious?

Our convention met yesterday. Its decision cannot be known nor acted upon, at Washington, before the 1st of April. How many Yankees or Pennsylvanians or Tennesseans can be enlisted to come here a-fighting, in the month of June? We will ourselves engage to eat every one of them, without skinning or scaling—horns, tail and all.

The three union members of congress from this state, Blair, Mitchell, and Drayton, voted for the "bloody bill." What unnatural wretches—what mere miscreants they must be! What all was pacified—every thing adjusted; the north abandoning its wrongs; the south redeemed, at once, and reconciled—then to join in this last desperate and unprincipled attempt to embroil every thing anew!

The president's inaugural speech, which we give to-day, will be found to be in the true non-committal vein. It does not contain the expected creed. If Mr. Ritchie can find it there, he shall be our Magnus Apollo. Ritchie is credulous for another year.

DEBATE ON THE LAND BILL.

SENATE—MONDAY, JAN. 7, 1833.

The question being on the amendment reported by the committee on public lands to the bill to appropriate for a limited time the proceeds of the public lands, &c.

Mr. Clay rose and stated, that he had a few observations to make to the senate before the question was taken. The senator from Illinois had, in the commencement of his remarks, told the senate that it was not necessary to occupy their attention long, and he (Mr. C.) concurred in a similar declaration on his part. The bill had undergone an ample discussion at the last session; there had been but a slight change since that time in the construction of this bill; and it would be unnecessary again to go over the whole ground of argument, which had once and so recently been employed. The bill which he had introduced at the present session, and which had been sent to the committee on public lands, was identically the bill which had already once passed this body, and the grounds being the same, it would not be necessary to consume much time in the observations he felt himself called upon to make. He would, however, avail himself of the opportunity to offer a few general observations, with a view to a comparison of the bill which he had introduced, with the amendment of the committee on the public lands.

In the first place he would describe the bill which he had brought forward.

By this bill it was proposed to set apart for the benefit of the new states twelve and a half per cent. out of the aggregate proceeds, in addition to the five per cent. which was allowed to them by compact, before any division took place among the states generally. It was thus proposed to assign, in the first place, seventeen and a half per cent. to the new states, and then to divide the whole of the residue among the twenty-four states. And, in order to do away any inequality among the new states, grants are specifically made by the bill to those which had not received, heretofore, as much land as the rest of the new states, from the general government, so as to put all the new states on an equal footing. This twelve and a half per cent. to the new states, to be at their disposal, for either education or internal improvement, and the residue to be at the disposition of the states, subject to no other limitation than this, that it shall be at their option to apply the amount received either to the purposes of education, or the colonization of free people of color, or for internal improvements, or in debts which may have been contracted for internal improvements. And with respect to the duration of this scheme of distribution proposed by the bill, it is limited to five years, unless hostilities shall occur between the United States and any foreign power; in which event the proceeds to be applied to the carrying on of such war with vigor and effect against any common enemy with whom we may be brought in contact. After the conclusion of peace, and after the discharge of the debt created by any such war, the aggregate funds to return to that peaceful destination to which it was the intention of the bill that they should now be directed, that is, to the improvement of the moral and physical condition of the country, and the promotion of the public happiness and prosperity.

Such are the general features of the bill, which was reported by the committee on manufactures, under circumstances to which he would not now advert, at the last session, and was passed; and which was introduced by him again at the present session, had been referred to the committee on public lands, and reported by that committee, with the amendment now under consideration.

The first remark which seemed to him to be called for in reference to this subject, was, as to the expediency, he would say the necessity, of its immediate settlement. On this point he was happy to believe that there was a unanimous concurrence of opinion in that body. However they might differ as to the terms on which the distribution of these lands should be made, they all agreed that it was a question which ought to be promptly and finally, he hoped amicably, adjusted. No time more favorable than the present moment could be selected for the settlement of this question. The last session was much less favorable for the accomplishment of this object; and the reasons were sufficiently obvious, without any waste of time in their specification. If the question were not now settled, but if it was to be made the subject of an annual discussion, mixing itself up with all the measures of legislation, it would be felt in its influence upon all, would produce great dissensions both in and out of the house, and affect extensively all the great and important objects which might be before that body. They had had in the several states some experience on that subject; and, without going into any details on the subject, he would merely state that it was known, that for a long period the small amount of the public domain possessed by some of the states, in comparison with the quantity possessed by the general government, had been a cause of great agitation in the public mind, and had greatly influenced the course of legislation. Persons coming from the quarter of the state in which the public land was situated, united in sympathy and interest, constituted always a body who acted together, to promote their common object, either by donations to settlers or reduction in the price of the public lands, or the relief of those who are debtors for the public domain; and were always ready, as men always will be, to second all those measures which look towards the accomplishment of the main object which they have in view. So, if this question were not now settled, it would be a source of inexpressible difficulty hereafter, influencing all the great interests of the country in congress, affecting great events without, and perhaps adding another to those unhappy causes of division which unfortunately exist at this moment.

He was very happy to find in the message of the president, some reference made to the subject of the public lands; and especially an expression of the opinion that it was time this question should be put to rest. He was also glad to see it asserted, from the same high authority, that congress had a full and uncontrolled power over the subject, to dispose of these lands or their proceeds, for the common benefit of the whole country, according to its sound discretion.

Next to the settlement of this great question, it was undoubtedly of the first importance that it should be equitably settled, so as to comprehend the interests of all, and to show that those interests have not been lost sight of by the general government. And, he would ask, could any mode of settling the question, so as to consult and protect the interests of all, be offered, which would be more worthy of the acceptance of congress than that which was proposed by the bill of the last session, which had been sent to the committee on public lands. In determining upon the merits of that bill, it would be necessary in the course of the few remarks which he should feel himself called upon to make, to contrast it with the bill which had been reported by the committee on the public lands, and to make some observations on the argument in which the senator from Illinois had advocated that plan, in order to induce the senate to take it, in preference to the bill which had already once received their sanction.

In the first place, the gentleman from Illinois contended that the whole of the public lands were ceded to the general government for the purpose of paying the debt incurred in the prosecution of the revolutionary war—that this debt had now been paid—and that as the land had now performed its office, it ought to be set free from further claim on the part of the general government, and to follow the sovereignty of the different states in which they are located. And the gentleman from Illinois, in order to enforce his argument to the senate, appealed to the message of the president, to show that such also was the view taken of the subject by the executive. Now he, (Mr. Clay), felt himself constrained to say that both the president and the gentleman from Illinois had taken a much too limited view of the subject. All that portion of the public lands which lies beyond the river Mississippi, and below the state of Mississippi, and all Florida—were they thus conditionally ceded? Were they ceded to the general government for the purpose of paying the revolutionary debt? No: they were purchased by the common treasure of the whole United States. But, supposing that the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois were conceded; that the debt being paid, the mortgage lifted, these lands ought to be applied to promote the interests of the new states alone in which they are located. Was this a true history? Did the lands which were ceded by the several states pay the debt of the revolution? What was the debt of the revolution? That debt amounted, principal and interest, to not less than 400 or 450 millions of dollars; and the whole of the public lands which had been sold, had only produced about forty millions. The lands then had not paid the debt of the revolution. They had not performed their office. The debt had been paid by the pockets of the people, and not by the public lands, and to perform their office the lands must repay this debt to the people. He, (Mr. Clay), would have no objection to adopt the principle of the gentleman from Illinois, that the lands should be applied to the payment of that debt so long as any of it remained unpaid; and, afterwards, to the reimbursement of the pockets of the people of the money drawn from them, by taxes, to make up the deficiency of the public lands. If the honorable gentleman would apply his own principle, he (Mr. Clay), would be satisfied. If he had mortgaged his estate, and the mortgage was lifted by a friend, he was bound to reimburse that friend. So, if the debt of the revolution, which the public lands are pledged to pay, was paid by the people, they ought to receive back from the lands both the principal and interest. If the gentleman would bring forward a proposition to pay all the revolutionary debt out of the public lands, situated on this side of the Mississippi, and to reimburse the people to the amount which had been taken from their pockets, he (Mr. C.) would vote for the proposition; but that was substantially the object of the bill which he had introduced. The only difference was, that instead of keeping an account which would be complex in its character, and almost impracticable, a simple form was adopted, in the bill, by providing for the division of the funds among the people of the United States, upon the most equitable of all principles, that of federal representation. With respect to that largest portion of the public domain, which was acquired by treaties, it could not be contended that it was incumbent on the government to appropriate any part of that to the payment of the debt of the revolution.

The gentleman from Illinois had said that the scheme which he, Mr. C. had presented was extremely fascinating, addressing itself powerfully to the states, and to every individual in the states. And was not the scheme of the honorable senator also fascinating? Did it not address itself powerfully to those who occupy the public domain in the new states? The difference between us is this: he would, from that which was made by the deeds of cession, and the treaties of acquisition, the common property of all, take what remains, and appropriate it for the exclusive benefit of a few—he would take the property of the twenty-four states, and appropriate it for the benefit of the seven new states, and of such as may hereafter become members of the union. This, said Mr. C. is a plan of broad, liberal and comprehensive justice; while his is a narrow, partial and unjust scheme of appropriation, looking to the interests only of a part, and that, although a highly respectable, an inconsiderable part of the whole.

But it was said by the gentleman, that the new states were not on an equality with the old states; that they could exercise no authority over the public domain; that they could not take it for state purposes; that they had not the power of taxing it; and, in short, enjoyed no benefit from it whatever. Now he, Mr. C. took it, that the property of the United States, every where, was beyond the control of the states in which it was situated. Had Pennsylvania any control over the mint or the arsenal, over any part of her territory which she had ceded to the United States; over the public ships, or over public property of any description, within her limits? Had any state any control over the property of the United States? The difference, every where, was merely one of extent of national property, and this difference existed among the new states, as well as between them and the old. Ohio had only five millions of acres, for example, of public lands within her limits; while Missouri had thirty-eight millions. According to the doctrine of the gentlemen, they ought to have the right of control over this property, in order to place them on an equality. The inequality of Ohio and Missouri as to the extent of lands, was as 5 to 38, while, as to population, the inequality stood as one million to 150,000, for Ohio against Missouri: the smaller number, having under this principle, the control over the greater extent of the public domain. That which belongs to the general government is not subject to state legislation. There were some states in which the United States held no property. In Kentucky there was no United States property; while in the maritime states there is much of this property which is beyond the control of the states. The gentleman from Illinois, therefore, could derive no strength to his argument from his ground as to the extent of the public domain. It should be recollected that the time was coming, as it had almost already come in the state of Ohio, when the public domain will be disposed of, and then there will be a perfect equality, as indeed there is now, between the states, in their rights and powers over whatever may be in their respective limits.

The gentleman from Illinois had asked, but without dwelling much upon the point, where was the power to make this division? He, Mr. C. would refer him to an authority which, he believed, the honorable senator would be the last member on that floor to controvert or depreciate—the authority of the president. He would also refer him to the deeds of cession; to the acts of congress; to the understanding of all men; but especially he would refer him to his own amendment, and the report of the committee on the public lands. What! had they a right to give away the public lands by a partial and unjust distribution, and none to establish a broad and comprehensive scale of ap-proportion, doing justice to all portions of the United States? But he would not dwell on this part of the subject, which had been fully discussed during the last session.

He would now beg leave to call the attention of senators to what was the present condition of the new states—what would be the effect of the operation of this bill upon them, and what would be the subsequent advantages which they would derive from its passage.

What was the complaint of the new states at present? It was that a vast amount of their money was drawn from their limits, to be expended in other portions of the union, to their impoverishment and ruin. Continue the present system, and the evil is perpetuated. The money of the west will still flow into eastern states, and still be expended there. But what would be the condition of the new states, if the bill which had been stricken out by the committee were to pass? They would, in the first place, receive 17½ per cent. of the amount of the proceeds of the sales of the lands. This 17½ per cent. was probably equal to the amount annually paid by the resident population of the new states themselves, exclusive of what is paid by emigrants going into the new states. He derived this inference from a letter which was laid before the senate at the last session, from which it appeared that the thirteen states of the union, in which there are no public lands, had increased only 17½ per cent. within the ten years from 1820 to 1830. If you give 17½ per cent. to the new states, before you divide the proceeds, it would be a proportion quite as great as the increase of their population, if it were not augmented by emigration. Or, if there was no tide of emigration to the new states, and migrations from them similar to those which take place in other states, the amount which the people of the new states would expend in the purchase of the public lands, would not probably be equal to more than the 17½ per cent. If, therefore, you give them 17½ per cent. before you give any thing to the other states all complaints on the score of the drain of money on public account, must be put at an end.

But this is not all. You not only give this 17½ per cent. but after assigning this particular amount to their exclusive benefit, you then divide the residue of the proceeds among the whole of the twenty-four states, including those which have already received the 17½ per cent. This additional dividend is about 16 or 17 per cent. more. Thus there would be a total amount payable to the new states equal to near one-third of the entire aggregate derived from all the public lands of the United States, wherever situated. About one-sixth of the population of the U. States, which the new states contain, would receive near one-third of the whole amount of the proceeds of the public lands. Now, if this was done, would not the condition of these new states be greatly bettered?

If the bill should pass, and the new states should thus acquire the amount to which they would be entitled according to its provisions, they would not merely obtain the 17½ per cent. and by a participation in the residue of the fund, some indemnity for pecuniary contributions made by them to the general government, but they would still enjoy their present proportion of the expenditures of the general government within their limits. There would still be large expenditures in the event of war, as was the case during the last year; and there would still be the annual disbursements to Indian agents, and on Indian annuities, &c. All these would continue.

The gentleman from Illinois spoke of the new states as if he expressed the sentiments of all of them, and as if their wants and wishes were only known to him, and his construction of them was the only one deserving of respect. Now, at the last session, when this bill was passed, the senators from the seven new states were equally divided on this subject. There were, if he mistook not, two from Ohio, two from Indiana, two from Louisiana, making six, and one from Mississippi, making exactly half of the representation in that body of the seven new states. Regarding the subject in the light in which he did, that there would be, if things remained as they now are, no reflux of the money of the west drawn from it by the federal government, and that large and liberal grants of money were made to the new states, by the provisions of this bill, it ought to be satisfactory to the most ambitious western heart. The senate would recollect that according to a table presented at the last session, the new states had increased at the rate of eighty-five per cent. during the ten years from 1820 to 1830, and that the state of Illinois, during the same period, had increased at the rate of one hundred and eighty-five per cent. while many of the old states had increased only at the rate of twenty-five per cent. The average increase of thirteen, having no public lands, was only seventeen and about a half per cent. while some had scarcely any increase at all. The settlement of the new states is already sufficiently rapid; and any fresh impetus given to it would only be productive of mischief.

A struggle always takes place at first among the new settlers as to preponderance, and this struggle is in proportion to numbers, and the variety of the places of their origin. It requires some time before the new settlers can become acquainted with each other, the laws, customs and habits, religious and political, of the respective states and countries from which they emigrated. It sometimes happens that the most opprobrious epithets are interchanged, until they become well acquainted with each other, perceive the good which each bring to the general stock, and, becoming reconciled to their condition, proceed harmoniously in advancing their new settlements in the wilderness. If emigration were more rapid, there would be still more of this spirit of discord, and all must agree that an increase in the ratio of eighty-five per cent. ought to be sufficient to satisfy the wishes and ambition of any man. All that is wanted is money, assistance, aid from some quarter or other, in making roads, providing for education, promoting the general improvements, and turning to advantage all those blessings which abound in those states, and which are designed for the prosperity of society. He must repeat, that a comparison of the condition of those states, under the operation of this bill, and without its advantages, ought to enlist in favor of the bill, every mind which was not prejudiced by other objects, and which was not looking too intently at the possibility of grasping, in some form or other all the public domain.

It must be clear to every unbiassed and impartial mind, that it was better to accede to the arrangements of this bill, than to remain in their present condition, with the mere possibility of getting something more at a future day. If the views of gentlemen who supported the amendment could even be admitted, was it likely that future harmony would be the result? Other new states would spring up beyond the Mississippi; and as they successively arose, following the example of the new states of this period, would lay claim to all the public lands within their limits.

This consideration should induce the new states to feel an interest in the passing of his bill. Those new states beyond the Mississippi never would, never ought, never could, agree to an exclusive appropriation of these lands. They constitute a common fund, purchased by the common blood and treasure, and are the common property of all. It was the duty of congress so to regard it. It resulted from the treaties of acquisition, and was declared by the deeds of cession, to be for the common benefit of all; and he would venture to say that the day will never come when congress, for the sake of partial benefits to a comparatively small and inconsiderable portion of the people, will abandon this exhaustless source of public income. Kentucky included no part of the public domain, and enjoyed very few of those advantages which flow from the disbursements of the general government. Her benefit in the common concern was chiefly indirect, consisting in beholding the prosperity of the whole, and the security of all from the union. But, if this bill passed, she would participate in the more direct advantages of the common government.

As an original part of that state which made such a vast cession to the federal government, he, in her behalf, entered his solemn protest against any violation of the terms of that munificent grant by which Kentucky shall be stripped of what belongs to her in common with Virginia and the other members of the confederacy.

As it respects the new states themselves, he could not but think that, if they would dispassionately examine the project under consideration, they would find that it possessed the strongest recommendation to their acceptance. And he would repeat the assurance to them of his settled conviction, that, if they deceived themselves by the hope of obtaining the whole of the public domain, and refuse what was now offered, they would have just occasion hereafter to reproach themselves; or if not, they would be reproached by their posterity, for throwing away the practical blessings within their reach, in order to obtain an object which he solemnly believed would never be accomplished. He would now call the attention of the senate to the provisions of this bill, and their equitable character as it respects the whole of the common union. Having already shewn that the fund itself was derived from the common blood and common treasure of the country—he would ask if it ought not still to be held for the common benefit? The country enjoys, he was willing to admit, unexampled prosperity. But did we hope that we should exist as a nation for centuries to come? Did we hope that our union would last as long as the republics of antiquity, if not much longer? And are we, on the strength of such expectations, to make a wasteful disposition of the rich patrimony which has been bequeathed to us? Are we always to be free from wars and troubles, and difficulties? What nation had always been exempt from them? Look at Europe from which we sprang. It had enjoyed, he believed at this time, one of the longest intervals of peace which had been experienced for several centuries. It was only seventeen years and a half since the battle of Waterloo was fought, which terminated the wars of the French revolution—and we now see the whole of Europe apparently on the eve of general war. And do we expect to be forever at peace? Never to want money again? Never to be in debt? But to be free from all embarrassments and debts hereafter? No thinking man could indulge these chimerical ideas—these vain speculations. What then was it our duty to do? Now was the time, above all others, when we should nurse and take care of our resources. What nation of antiquity—what nation of modern times—has ever possessed such vast resources as the immense public domain—the capacious womb of unborn republics? He had had occasion to remark either in his observations last session, or in the report of the committee on manufactures, that five hundred years hence, if we discharged our duty and took care of this important interest, they who will come after us may be legislating in this very hall, which he hoped would then be standing, as it would stand upon this great and absorbing subject of the public domain.

He recollected, during the late war, when the distress of the country was at its height—when we wanted money—wanted credit—when our arms were paralyzed for want of the necessary means for sustaining the war: he recollected how it then gladdened every patriotic heart—when the exhaustless nature of this immense national resource was eloquently depicted by a member of the other house. Enough not only for that, but for fifty or a hundred other wars, should we unfortunately become involved in them. And now we are out of debt; and it would seem that we are never again to be in debt—that we are out of difficulty, and never again to be in difficulty: and a hundred schemes are suggested to dispose of these lands, because of our unbounded prosperity; as if we could not too soon get rid of the fund. Happier would it be for us, and happier too for posterity, should we be wise enough to husband well this resource. He trusted the senate would not be deceived by these vain projects. It was said that there is some discontent in the west; and how was it proposed to allay this discontent?

He denied the fact however—there never had been any general discontent on the subject of the public lands; there was nothing like discontent there. It was true, that some gentlemen, in various states of the west, had held out to the people of that quarter of the union, alluring projects of the aggrandizement of their own states, by setting up a claim to the lands within their limits; and it was very likely that some of the people may have indulged a dream that something like these projects might one day be realised: but there was nothing like discontent, with the great body of the people, on the subject of the public lands. But if there were discontents, what would be the proper course to pursue? We ought to examine calmly into the causes—to endeavor in a parental manner, to investigate the extent of the disaffection. Should it appear to be well founded, it would be our duty to endeavor to alleviate it as far as possible. But if there was no foundation for it, if you discovered that it was merely one portion of the union demanding that which belonged to the whole; if there was no just ground for complaint; would you, to gratify this murmuring portion of the union, give to it that which was the property of all?

Would you behave like the weak and foolish parent, who seeing one child crying for the bauble which another possessed, would unjustly take it away from the possessor, and by giving it to the other, set the one who had been bereaved crying also?—Would you allay discontent, if discontent existed in a new state, by raising a more formidable and greater discontent in the other states? and would you not do this, if you adopted a partial, narrow scheme of distribution which was proposed by the substitute of the committee on public lands? Beware, Mr. President, on this, as on other great subjects of contention, that you do not shift the theatre of discontent.

It becomes us to take care that we do not raise a storm full of menace, not only to the integrity of the union, but to every great interest of the country. He could not conceive of a more happy disposition of the proceeds of the public lands, than that which was provided by this bill. It was supposed that five years would be neither too long nor too short a period for a fair experiment. In case a war should break out, we withdrew from its peaceful destination a sum of from two and a half to three and a half millions of dollars per annum, and apply it to a vigorous prosecution of the war. A sum which would pay the interest on sixty millions of dollars, which might be required to sustain the war, and a sum which is constantly and progressively increasing. It proposes, now, that the general government has no use for the money—now that the surplus treasure is really a source of vexations embarrassment to us, and gives rise to a succession of projects, to supply for a short time a fund to the states which want our assistance—to advance to them that which we do not want, and which they will apply to great beneficial national purposes; and should war take place, to divert it to the vigorous support of the war; and, when it ceases, to apply it again to its peaceful purposes. And thus we may grow from time to time, with a fund which will endure for centuries, and which will augment with the growth of the nation, aiding the states in seasons of peace, and sustaining the general government in periods of war.

The bill proposes to nurse and preserve this fund, to apply it when wanted to the purposes of the general government; and when its application is made to the states, what are the objects? The honorable senator complains about colonization; and asks what interest Illinois has in it? He, Mr. Clay, was somewhat surprised at the question. He supposed every part of the union was interested in the humane object of colonizing the free blacks. He supposed that if any part were exempt from the evils of a mixt population, it would still not be indifferent to the prosperity of less favored portions. The darkest spot in the map of our country is undoubtedly the condition of the African race. And every benevolent and patriotic mind must hope that at some distant day it will be effaced. Colonization has opened the only practicable scheme which, by draining first the country of free blacks, and then, either by the authority of the states, or by individual emancipation of those now held in slavery, holds out a hope of the ultimate deliverance of our country from this great evil. Suppose that fifty or a hundred years hence, the country could be entirely rid of this African race, would the gentleman from Illinois—would any gentleman say that he should be indifferent to such an auspicious result? In his judgment, if the people of the United States were ready to unite heartily in any practical scheme, if there could be one devised, by which this country could be delivered from all portions of the African race amongst us, both free and bond, it would be the happiest of all events for the union. But why did the gentleman from Illinois restrict his view to this single point? The bill did not confine the states to colonization. What was the bill? It presented three great objects for the consideration of the states, out of which they were at liberty freely to select. It proposed colonization, education, and internal improvement, in the reimbursement of such debts as may have been incurred for internal improvements in the states. The gentleman objects to this latter clause. But Mr. C. would ask, why those states which have gone ahead in the cause of internal improvement, Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, should not be allowed to rid themselves of the debts which they may have contracted? If they had outstripped the other states, why should they be required to remain under burthensome debts, and engage in new objects perhaps not wanted.

With regard to education and internal improvement, these are objects in which all parts of the union are interested. Education and internal improvements in any part of the union, are objects which affect, more or less, the interests of all other parts of the union. There was a restriction upon the states. They were not left without limitation. The fund was directed according to the views of congress, and the states were not left unrestricted as to its application. They were required to apply it to one of three great objects in which all parties were interested, as objects of national importance.

Thus it had been shown that, according to the plan of the bill, the fund was to be applied, in times of peace, for the benefit of the states, which may stand in instant need of the means which the general government does not want, for the improvement of their moral and physical condition; and in war, the fund was to be resumed, and applied to the general objects of the war. Thus, it was to be applied, in peace or war, and according to the provision in the various acts of cession, the great object of the common benefit of all the states would be kept in view. This ample resource would be preserved for all the vicissitudes to which this nation may be exposed, and we should be enabled, if free from war for 20 or 30 years, to accomplish most of the great objects of internal improvement, in the completion of which the country feels an interest, should the states determine so to apply it.

But there was another and the greatest object of all connected with the passage of this bill, to which in conclusion of this part of the subject, he was desirous to refer. He alluded to the effect of this measure on the durability of our union. He hoped he should not be mistaken, when he made the suggestion that, above all former periods in this country, this was the moment when it was most imperative upon every American statesman to bend all the efforts of his mind to the infusion of new vigor into the union. It was a melancholy fact that in all parts of the country the sentiment of union appeared to have been greatly weakened. It was a melancholy fact that there was every where springing up, daily and hourly, an apprehension of insecurity, a fear that our republic cannot last,—that it is destined to premature dissolution. He did not speak of one part of the union, but of all parts. This was a policy which unhappily prevailed. Whatever course could restore confidence, produce harmony, create anew an attachment to the union in all its parts, and which could prevent the greatest calamity that could befall this people, ought to receive the favorable attention of the legislature. He would ask if there was any project conceivable by man which was better calculated to strengthen the union than the bill which was now on the table? What was it? It proposed that a sum amounting to about three millions of dollars, and annually increasing; which, twenty years hence may be six millions, and forty years hence, twelve millions—the source from which the fund is drawn being specifically ceded or acquired for the benefit of the whole union—shall be annually and parentally distributed by this government through the whole confederacy, amongst all parts of it for the purpose of improving the moral and physical condition of the whole. Let this project go into operation: let all the states be satisfied that it will last as long as the fund from which it is to be distributed, as long as the almost exhaustless public domain shall continue, and we shall cement this union by the strongest of ties for five hundred years to come. What state will then be disposed to go out of the confederacy, and sacrifice the great advantages administered by this government? What state in the union will be disposed to give up the advantage of this annual dividend, with all the rich fruits which are to result from the improved moral and physical condition of its people, and go forth in its forlorn, weak, and destitute condition, an outcast without hope, the scorn of its neighbors, an object of contempt with foreign powers, and exposed to the insults of the meanest of them, and even to the aggressions of lawless pirates? Pass this bill, and satisfy the states of this confederacy that this fund, which is constantly increasing, is to be applied forever, in time of peace, to them for the great objects which are specified, and in time of war, to free them from that taxation which would be incident to a state of war, my life, (said Mr. Clay), on the sufficiency of the security which this would present for the continuance of the union. No section, no state, will be found so lost to its own interest, as to be induced to cut itself loose, and to abandon its participation forever, in this rich and growing resource.

One or two words on the question immediately before the senate, and he would conclude. That question was to substitute a new proposition, by adopting the amendment proposed by the committee on the public lands, in lieu of the other bill. And what was this new project? It was at one stroke to cut down three-fifths of the revenue derived from the public lands. The minimum price of these lands is now $1.25 per acre; and it is proposed to reduce it to 50 cents per acre, on all the lands which, remain unsold at public auction. It thus proposes, by a single provision, to take three-fifths from this fund, and what does it propose to do afterwards?

[Here Mr. Clay read a clause from the bill of the committee.] Now this was not a project for the poor. No such thing. Any man, without any regard to the amount of his wealth, or his condition, may settle down on the lands, and require a right to them by five years cultivation, but he has to settle upon the lands. By the proclamation issued by the king of Great Britain in the year 1763, and afterwards by the royal colonial governments and by several of the states which subsequently became independent, this condition of cultivation has been required to perfect the title to waste land, and yet invariably, as far as his knowledge went, this provision had been dispensed with, or been considered a mere nullity. There were various kinds of settlements formerly required by Virginia.

[Here Mr. Clay specified the various conditions, but was not distinctly heard.]

She required that the individual should settle on the land. Now what did they do? They went on the lands and put up a small cabin, somewhat resembling those which are set up in Kentucky as traps to catch wild turkeys, and this was considered an improvement! Well, with regard to the cultivation of the soil; sometimes they turned up the earth and planted a few hills of corn; and this was considered cultivation. The settlers gained their object, and there was no attempt to exact a too rigid observance of the conditions. No one sat down upon his property with a view to make it his permanent residence. Now, at this moment, old James Masterton, who lives near Lexington, and is eighty years old, excepted, he did not recollect a single individual, or the descendants of any individual, who had remained on the lands which they had originally settled. The settlers acquired their lands, made their entries, and then disposed of them for bear skins, rifles, or any other marketable commodity.

With regard to the settlement and the cultivation of the soil, in the project of the committee, there is no specification of any improvement required—there is no condition for the cultivation of any specific quantity, nor in any defined mode. What does the amendment propose? It allows any man, whether rich or poor, to acquire the right of settling the land, by paying fifty cents an acre. Here is a man who will send one son or substitute, to set up a cabin and cultivate half an acre on one side of his farm; another who may set out his potatoes, or plant some corn, and raise a few pumpkins on the other side, and so on, to acquire their patents; and they will afterwards find their way into the market, and be sold, as cheap as military patents have been sold at the brokers in Pennsylvania avenue.

How many of the soldiers, during the late war, are now to be found residing on their lands? All their patents were disposed of for a mere song, and go into the hands of speculators in our great cities. He had heard of a single individual in New York, holding at this moment a principality in Illinois, and who is retarding the settlement of that part of the country by holding up the lands at an extravagant price. Land is not the only want of man; he must have money to meet his necessities, and gratify his pleasures; and many have less inclination to the occupations of agriculture than to other pursuits. He regretted that every man did not appreciate farming as he did. But it is impossible to change the characters of men. Many who are eager for land, desire it not for the purpose of cultivation, but will part with it as soon as they have nominally complied with the conditions which the laws prescribe. He objected to the amendment because its benefits were not confined to the poor settlers; and on account of its inequality. What chance would the people of Virginia, Kentucky, New York or Pennsylvania, stand with the people of Illinois, who were well acquainted with the vacant land around them?

We had been told by the president as well as by the gentleman from Illinois, that population is more important to the country than land, and the sentiment is undoubtedly true. It should be recollected, however, that the mere transfer of population from one section of the country, or from one part of a state to another, adds nothing to the sum total. If it be so important to augment and not to shift the population of the United States, the privilege of settlement should be held out to foreigners to induce them to come here and increase our numbers. When Georgia distributed her lands by a lottery, although one man might obtain more lands than he possessed before, it produced no increase in the population of the state. It was not a shifting, but an increasing population which was desirable. He wished that our country was densely populated, from the shores of the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean; and that all were endowed with our principles and our love of liberty and devotion to human rights. But he could not, because he felt this sentiment, consent to be caught by a project which, altogether delusive, whilst its tendency is to sacrifice the public domain, leaves the total amount of our population identically the same.

Pass the amendment of the committee and the lands will be swept by those who are on the spot; but the population will remain precisely as it is now. The scheme, while it would destroy the public domain, would engender speculation, and lead to numerous frauds and evasions, and while fraught with palpable injustice to the people in all other parts of the union, would be found to be far less conducive to the prosperity of the new states than the proposed distribution of the proceeds of the lands.

He had not intended, when he came into the senate, to make more than a very few observations; and regretted that he had been induced to take up so much time. He hoped, however, that the senate would excuse the length into which he had been betrayed by the deep feeling which he entertained of the vast importance of the subject which was now under consideration, resulting from a thorough conviction that no measure which does not embrace the interests of all the people of the United States, ought to receive the favorable consideration of congress. He trusted that the senate would reject the amendment, and settle forever on the basis of comprehensive equity proposed by his bill, this important question; which, if not speedily and permanently settled, was more likely to produce dissension throughout the country, than any other subject which at this time pressed itself upon the consideration of congress.

In conclusion, he should only invoke the senate to extend to his bill the same favor which it had received at the last session.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 17, 1833.

Mr. Grundy said: Upon this subject it is manifest that there are two opinions rising up in different quarters of the country, directly in opposition to each other and both of them, in my humble judgment, founded in error. One portion of our politicians think that the new states in which the lands are situated, have a claim to the exclusion of all other portions of the country upon that principle of national law which confers on the sovereignty of a state a right to all the soil within its limits. Against this opinion, I have heretofore, and now contend, let it come from what authority it may. Another set of politicians say, and the bill on your table is predicated on that idea, that the states, as such, have some other, and different kind of claim to these lands, or their proceeds, than they have to the money in the treasury of the U. States, arising from other sources of the public revenue. I differ from those who entertain this opinion likewise. My proposition is, and I shall endeavour to maintain it, that the lands belong to neither the new nor the old states, nor to both of them combined; but to the federal government, and that their proceeds cannot be applied to other objects than those to which the United States can constitutionally appropriate money. In order that I may be able to establish my proposition, I ask the attention of the senate to the mode in which the titles were acquired, and I call upon the advocates of the title of the new states to show upon what they found their claim. Did the new states purchase these lands from the original proprietors or owners? Have they made any contract or agreement, which would authorise them to put up this claim? Nothing of the kind is pretended.—Their sole reliance is upon the principle that sovereignty conveys the title. This principle it is admitted exists, and is unquestionable between nations or states, foreign to each other, and between whom there are no stipulations or compacts to the contrary—but it is wholly inapplicable, as between the general government and the new states; to adopt it would be in direct violation of the agreements and compacts entered into by each of them, in the most solemn manner. When about to become members of this union, they disclaimed all right and pretence of title to the lands of the federal government, within their respective limits; it is their own declaration, it is engrained in the constitution of every state; the very charter which gave them their existence acknowledges that they have no right or claim to these lands. There is no state in which it was supposed the general government owned land, which has not, in its constitution, relinquished that right which sovereignty confers, except the state of Tennessee. She was admitted into the union without any such stipulation or condition, and therefore stands in a different situation in relation to this subject from the other states in which there may be vacant and unappropriated lands. When the new states, some years since, came forward and put up their claim to these lands, I took the liberty of saying that it appeared to me to be a violation of good faith and the sacredness of a solemn agreement, and gave the reasons at length in support of the opinion I then expressed, and will not detain the senate by a repetition of them, but with this short view of the subject shall take it for granted that the new states have no right to these lands, more than the other states in the union. At the same time, I wish it to be understood, that I do not object to the appropriations which have or hereafter may be made to the new states of portions of the land within their limits, for internal improvements; this, however, is not because they have a better claim than any other portion of the country; these appropriations are made upon the ground that it is sound policy to improve the country, and thereby add value to the residuum of the public lands; hence a right as well as a duty is created on the part of the general government to enhance the value of the public domain.

The next inquiry is, what right have the states as such to put a claim to these lands? To ascertain this, we must look to the derivation of the title and see to whom it has been made. During the revolutionary war it was urged by several of the states in strong and impressive language that it was unjust that the wild and uninhabited tracts of land contained in the charter of Virginia and other states similarly situated, should be conquered and secured by the joint arms of all the states, and then not be disposed of for the benefit of all; they therefore remonstrated with the old congress against this injustice, as they considered it. Congress acknowledged the justice of their demands, and applied to the several states within whose limits the lands were situated, to relinquish their title in support of the common cause in which all the states were engaged. The states yielded to this application, and Virginia surrendered all her territory west of the river Ohio, including the present states of Ohio, Indiana

Illinois, and Michigan territory; the other states followed her example, but for what purpose did they make these grants? Was it that the proceeds should be given away either to the states or individuals, or scattered to the winds? Such an idea never entered the minds of men at that period. What was the great and important object which operated upon a portion of the states in demanding, and on the others in surrendering these lands to the disposition of the old congress? It was known that we were engaged in an expensive war, and were deeply involved in debt. The issue of the controversy was doubtful, but if we succeeded, one thing was certain, that we had a large accumulation of debt existing against the old congress, which it would be difficult to discharge however prosperous the termination of the war might be. In order, then, to promote the public credit and to provide a common fund to meet the various engagements which the prosecution of the war necessarily created, almost all the states which had vacant and unappropriated lands came forward. And what is the declared intention of each of the states in making the surrender? I have examined all the acts of cession, the same language is used, they all say for the common charge and expenditure, for the common benefit we surrender the lands; and to whom did they surrender them? To the congress of the United States, to be applied for the common benefit; for, in discharge of the debt incurred by the war of the revolution. It is true, the debt of the revolution, as it is usually denominated and considered, is discharged; there is still, however, a heavy incumbrance upon the public lands, which cannot be discharged for many years. I refer to the pensions allowed by law, to the officers and soldiers of the revolution—these constitute a charge upon this fund, and form a part of the common expenditure for which these lands were pledged, and until fully paid, the lands cannot be released and applied to other purposes. It is supposed that not less than three millions a year will be necessary to meet this demand. The sales of the public lands will probably not amount to that sum; we know the net proceeds will not—at present, this fund is answering the purpose of its original destination, and it ought not to be diverted from it.

But let us see by what means the debt proper has been paid. The proceeds of the public lands have discharged a very small portion of it; all the other sources of revenue have been resorted to, and the monies arising from them applied to the extinguishment of this debt. When the money thus expended from other sources to this object shall be replaced in the public treasury from the sale of the public lands, surely it should not be used or employed in any other way or for any other purposes than those to which monies arising from any other sources could be legitimately appropriated. To make my ideas upon this subject still plainer; we have taken money arising from the duties upon imports to pay the public debt, instead of using the land for that purpose; now, when we sell the lands and receive the proceeds of the sales, the money should be substituted in the place of that which was received from imports. The treasury of the United States has furnished all the means, by which the lands acquired from Georgia, by her cession, have been paid for—Louisiana was obtained from the emperor of France, by the federal government, and paid for by its own money. The Floridas were purchased from Spain, and paid for in the same manner. To none of these lands, can I discover the least color of claim on the part of the states.

It is not argued by the friends of this bill that congress can give away the public money or distribute it to individuals or states, ad libitum. Unless, therefore, its advocates can succeed in showing that congress has more power over this source of revenue arising from the public lands than it possesses over other public monies, this bill must fail. This brings me to the provisions of the bill under consideration; and I will endeavor to show to the senate that this bill is calculated to put down the policy of this government as now administered. That it is doing that indirectly which we cannot do directly, and we know it to be so. We are to give this money to the states, and for what purpose? To make internal improvements, and can we make such internal improvements as the states will make if you give them this money? There is a difference among politicians as to the powers of the general government upon this subject. Great national objects of internal improvement, it is conceded by both parties, may be carried into effect by this government; but local objects are not conceded; and as this government is now officered, we know that no bill for such improvements can become a law. Whatever congress might be disposed to do in such cases, the executive sanction cannot be obtained. But grant the states the money to make any improvements they please, however local or unimportant, and you evade the settled policy of the present administration, which you cannot overcome by direct action. In short, by giving the money to the states and making them your agents, you expend it upon objects which the most zealous friends of internal improvements by the general government would never dream of. Is this not doing, as I have said, that, indirectly, which you cannot do directly? Would you not by the instrumentality of the state legislature, he doing acts which you have not the constitutional power to perform yourselves? The second object to which the money is to be applied by this bill, is education. I admit the full value of this object; but has it entered into the mind of any public man, that congress could establish a system of education in the different states? Such a proposition has never been made, and if made at any future period, it surely can meet with no favor in this body; and I ask senators to reflect and consider whether there be any substantial difference, in point of constitutional power, between this government's doing it itself, and giving the money to the states, and directing them to do it.

As to the third provision in the bill, which is to expend the money in transporting the free people of color to Liberia, on the coast of Africa, I consider it perfectly visionary, and this provision in the bill would be harmless were it not for the infraction of the constitution involved in it; because I do not believe that the state legislatures would so apply the money; they would expend it on objects in their own states. From what part of the constitution is the power thus to expend money derived? How can it be contended that this government can furnish money to better the situation of the free man of color, when it is admitted that you cannot give money to a poor man to better his situation? No—not even to remove him from one part of the United States to another.

I will now proceed to another branch of this subject. If I were in favor of this measure; if I believed it authorised by the constitution; if I believed it wise and politic, I would not at this time, give my assent to it. It is, and it cannot be conceived, a tariff measure. It is to keep up the duties on imports, and here I wish to be distinctly understood; I have contributed nothing by any vote or act of mine to produce the present state of excitement which exists in the country. I will do nothing to increase or aggravate it. I will yield nothing to intimidation or to that hostile array which is displaying itself in the south. I will neither go faster nor slower. I will neither be accelerated or retarded in my movements by any occurrence of that kind; but there are considerations to which I am prepared to yield much. To that deep sense of injustice long continued, which is felt by the whole south, and by a great portion of the west, I would yield much. To the apprehension that oppression, long persisted in, which is heavy and cannot be always borne, might weaken and in time alienate the affections of any great portion of the community from this government. I am ready to yield any thing which will not produce injustice to others. However, whether the tariff be reduced or not, I am in favor of executing the laws and preserving the union; and so far as my voice will go, the executive shall be furnished with all the means necessary to accomplish these objects. Under this view of the subject, let us examine the effect to be produced by the passage of this bill, and ascertain whether, instead of alleviating the public burdens and removing the grievances now felt and complained of, we are not giving a certain assurance, that they never shall be removed? The public sentiment seems now settled, and we scarcely hear a voice to the contrary, from any quarter, that the public revenue must be brought down to the wants of the government; if you, however, give away annually near three millions of your money, arising from the sale of the public lands, you thereby create the necessity of keeping up a tariff to that amount, higher than would be necessary if the proceeds of the public lands were placed in the treasury, to defray the expenditures of the government; therefore, instead of reducing the public burdens, instead of doing away the just causes of complaint which exist in the country, you are fastening them upon the community. Make, if you please, the most liberal allowance for the support of the government of the United States, a tariff, producing twelve millions added to the three millions arising from the sales of the public lands, will support the government; but give this three millions away, and you create the necessity of adding three millions to the tariff; this, therefore, is a tariff measure. It is to create a demand of necessity for more money, and when this necessity is created, I should myself feel bound if it depended on my single vote, to fix the rate of duties high enough to produce the requisite amount. I have been compelled to give my opinion in reference to the tariff, because it is connected with the subject matter of this bill. There is another reason why I object to this measure; it will operate deceptively; it looks like a gift upon its face to the states, but at the same time the people of the states are taxed to make up the amount; it looks as if the states were getting something from the general government, but when it is recollected that a tax is imposed to supply the deficiency in the treasury, occasioned by this measure, the deception is at once discovered and the delusion vanishes.

The politicians of the U. States have been speaking and writing about state rights and state independence from the very foundation of this government, and according to my humble judgment nothing that could be invented by congress, would operate so fatally against these doctrines as this measure. If the states are to receive annually from this government large sums of money which may be withheld at pleasure, can you expect that manly spirit and strong language of remonstrance from state legislatures, which we have sometimes witnessed. It is with communities as with individuals, that man loses his independence, who is in the habit of living upon the bounty of another. He knows that to incur the displeasure of his benefactor may produce a withdrawal of that bounty which he has enjoyed, and the fear of this lessens his independence; he loses his own will and adopts that of another as the rule of his conduct. The true mode upon which to administer this government, is to keep the operations of the federal and state governments distinct and separate. In this way, that confliction which produces discord, is avoided. The state governments possess certain means of raising revenue to enable them to perform their respective functions, and the state governments should never depend upon the general government for the means of acting upon the subjects confided to them. So long as each government depends upon its own means, it is independent, and no longer. We already see the effects produced in some of the states by this anticipated reliance upon the national treasury. Pennsylvania and Ohio have contracted large debts for internal improvements, and they are now pressing this measure with a view to obtain money to meet the annual interest falling due upon their state treasuries. Is there not danger that you will place all the states in a similar condition, if you encourage them to undertake expensive internal improvements beyond their own means of payment?

Further, I am opposed to this bill, because it will retard the improvement and settlement of the western country. In what I say upon this subject, I know I feel, and shall speak as a western man. There is a greater portion of my affections, of my regards, than can exist elsewhere. If you say that the price of the public lands, (which is evidently the design of this bill), even of poor quality shall never be reduced, but at all times remain at the sum now fixed by the laws of the United States, for the purpose of distributing among the several states, you thereby prevent a dense population, and the cultivation of soil of inferior quality. It cannot be expected, under this new system, that any favors or indulgence will ever be extended to the settlers in the new states; a feeling in opposition to a liberal spirit towards the inhabitants of new states will be engendered in the different states; and avarice, the most unfeeling passion amongst those who most need them. I readily admit that the shifting of population from one section of country to another, does not increase the population; but I by no means admit that it may not increase the national strength and prosperity. The government owes it to its citizens as a duty, to furnish all the means in its power, to render them collectively and individually happy and independent. When you put it in the power of every man, however poor and humble he may be, to acquire a freehold of forty, eighty or one hundred and sixty acres of land, the government has done its duty, and if idle and dissipated men will not take care of themselves and household, will not embrace and enjoy the bounty of their country, the government is not responsible for their failure.

At the last session I was told, that my argument upon this subject was not sound, because those who worked in the manufactures were as good citizens as those who cultivated the soil; that may be so: my principle, however, is this, make your citizens independent, and no man is so independent as he who gets his own livelihood upon his own soil, and is not dependent upon the will of others. A man thus situated is dependent upon Providence and his own exertions alone; he is not subject to the whim and caprice of others by whom he may be employed: his livelihood cannot be endangered by the failure of capitalists, which is the case with all those employed in manufacturing establishments; I, therefore, prefer that this government should provide, by its laws, that every man of industry may acquire, at a cheap rate, a portion of the public domain. With respect to the policy which I advocate, taking off a portion of the population of the old states, I can fully appreciate it. Tennessee will be deprived of many of its most valuable citizens; with me, however, this forms no objection; I will never legislate to keep men where they are, that others may be benefited by their labor. Should any of my fellow citizens consult me upon the subject of their removal, my language to them would be, "we should be glad if you could find it to your interest to remain amongst us, because we are unwilling to part with you; but if you can make yourself more happy and independent, if you can better provide for yourselves and families, by going to a new country, go; and prosperity attend you." This is the way I feel, and this is the way I incline to act towards the citizens of my own state; and why should we feel any prejudice against this policy? The new waste lands are to be the homes of our children and children's children; let us then adopt a liberal policy for their improvement; it should also be recollected that we have a very extensive exposed frontier in the west: we have gathered all the Indian tribes together; we have concentrated that which makes a formidable force, which may at some future period, be employed against the United States. How can we provide against attacks from that quarter in any way so effectually as by having a dense population in the immediate neighborhood? By this means you will also lessen the expenditures of the government and give security to those who are now most exposed to danger. Another consideration of great weight upon this subject is, that New Orleans, the great commercial city of the west, will always be the point of attack aimed at by a powerful foreign enemy, with whom we may be at war. The best security you can afford it, will be found thickly lining the banks of the Mississippi, and filling up the adjacent country with freemen, interested in the soil. An opportunity to do this is now presented by the recent acquisitions of territory from the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians. It has been said that these preference or occupant rights have not proved beneficial to the early adventurers of the western country. Gentlemen who make this statement possess less knowledge than I do or a different language would be used by them. The state of Virginia gave to each of the early settlers of the now state of Kentucky four hundred acres of the settlement right and pre-emption of the North Carolina, actuated by a similar liberal spirit, gave a pre-emption of six hundred and forty acres to each of the early settlers in what is now West Tennessee; and although it is true that but few of these men remain at the present day, having been slain by the hostile savages, or having died by reason of great exposure and hardships and from other causes, yet I will venture to say, that the descendants of no class of men in that vast region of country, are more respected, or have more distinguished themselves in the learned professions, or have been greater ornaments to the benches of justice, or have acquired more fame in legislative halls. In regard to what is called the Green river country, in the state of Kentucky, it was settled upon the principle of occupancy, and there is no portion of that state, considering the quality of soil, which contains a better or more substantial population. As to Tennessee, this has been her uniform policy, and by its wisdom we have changed tenants and day laborers into independent freeholders. I am inclined favorably to the amendment proposed by the committee on public lands, and will vote that each settler upon the public domain shall be entitled to a preference right at fifty cents per acre, upon condition that he reside on it for five years in succession; this latter provision will prevent all fraud and speculation, and secure to him who needs it, a home at a cheap rate.

Upon a full view of the whole subject, my reflections result in this—that the new states have no exclusive claim to these lands, and that the states, as such, taken altogether, have no other claim to them or their proceeds than they have to monies arising from other sources of revenue, and of course congress has no power to give it to the states, or apply it to any other objects or purposes than those conferred on congress by the constitution. By giving this destination to this fund, we fulfil the design and expectation of the original donors, as well as the intention of the old congress, to whom the donations were made. By the constitution of the United States the title to these lands is transferred to the new government, on which, by that instrument, the burden is placed, of paying the national debt—of carrying on our foreign intercourse with all nations—of raising and supporting the army and navy—of sustaining the executive, judicial and legislative branches of this government. These are legitimate subjects of public expenditure, and to these should this fund be applied; they are for the common benefit of all, and therefore within the meaning of the deeds of cession. Upon the subject of graduating the price, I think the government should adopt the same rule which any prudent man, who owned a large quantity of land, and was anxious to sell it, would pursue—that would certainly be to lower the price, whenever all the lands of first quality were sold, and he could not find purchasers who would buy lands of inferior quality at the price originally fixed, after the public lands have remained in market at the minimum price for ten or fifteen years. Surely it would be sound policy to offer them at a lower rate; this would not only be beneficial to the general government, but the advantage to the new states would be incalculable, as thereby the whole lands within their respective limits would become subject to state taxation. I therefore, am willing at this time to vote for giving settlement rights to occupants at fifty cents per acre, and to graduate the price according to the different qualities of land, and to reject at once the proposition contained in the original bill. Still, my impression is, that this is not the proper time to act finally upon the subject. At the next session of congress the new states will have a full representation in the other house. They are more particularly interested in this subject than the other states. I am willing they should have the benefit of their additional numbers. It has been urged that this subject has been before congress at the last session, that it was then amply discussed, that the different able reports of the committee on manufactures and the committee on public lands have been published and submitted to the people for their consideration. This is all true; but has the subject been considered? has it been decided by the people? I think not. It was lost sight of in the all absorbing topic of the presidential election. That, like Aaron's rod, swallowed up every other consideration. I am, therefore, prepared to vote for an indefinite postponement of this bill, whenever that motion shall be made.

LEGISLATURE OF NEW JERSEY.

Preamble and resolutions respecting the public lands.

Whereas the public lands of this union having been acquired by the united exertion, and at the common expense of those who achieved our independence, and established this government, it is proper and just, that in the future disposition of this splendid domain, the wishes and interest of those who acquired it, should be expressed and consulted; and whereas, the people of New Jersey, feeling a deep interest in the decision which is about to be made upon this subject, (involving in its result as well a most sacred principle of justice, as an immense amount of revenue), we, their representatives, consider it due to them to express our sentiments upon this important measure—therefore,

Resolved by the council and general assembly of this state, That the public lands having been acquired by the common blood and common treasure of the country, sound policy and equal justice require that they should be held or disposed of for the common benefit.

Resolved, That we consider the land bill, now before congress, as embracing and providing for the interests of all the people of the United States and that the impartial justice and comprehensive equity of its provisions deserve the support of our senators and representatives in congress.

Resolved, That the governor of this state be requested to forward a copy of these resolutions to our senators and representatives in congress.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

Mr. Clay's corrected speech in favor of his tariff bill, and the brief one of Mr. Davis (of Massachusetts), against it, will be found in the present sheet. The high and honorable character of these gentlemen will insure, for both, an attentive perusal. There is another of Mr. Davis' speeches that we desire to make room for—and several others: but the "stock" is large, and current things must not be neglected.

It appears by the "National Intelligencer" of Thursday last, that a corrected speech of Mr. Webster, (and which, in its order, should have preceded that of Mr. Clay), may be expected. We shall insert it, of course.

We publish sundry instructions from the treasury department with relation to the tariff laws—and are apprehensive that these laws, unless speedily amended, will rest more upon the interpretations or instructions of the department, than on the statutes themselves; for it seems impossible that the meaning of the statutes should be generally understood and uniformly applied, without the exertion of an extraordinary power in the secretary concerning the revenue, generally, and as to the amount of duties payable on particular articles.* This should not be so. It is the business of the department to execute—not make the law; but things are so conditioned, perhaps, that the law, to be executed, must be settled—by construction! The general tariff law of the last session, with the act explaining the 18th section of the act of 1832, and the law suspending the operation of the provisions of the 10th and 12th clauses of the act of 1832, (in which latter the principle of Mr. Clay's "compromise bill" was swiftly violated), taken together, present a tangled web, or "Gordian knot," easier "cut" than unravelled or untied.

As to the act concerning the 18th section, we have the following from the "New York Journal of Commerce," It is well ascertained, we think, that there will not be much "surplus revenue" in the present year—unless the importations should be excessive.

Government deposits.—We understand the much talked of measure of withdrawing the government deposits from the United States bank has at length been accomplished. What is more remarkable, this has been done, not by the order of the president or secretary of the treasury, but by an order of congress adopted by a very large majority of both houses. And this notwithstanding the house of representatives voted at just about the same time by an equally large majority, that the deposits might safely remain in the bank. If any thing can add to the remarkable character of this remarkable transaction, it is that no other place of deposit has been fixed upon, or is likely to be, and that in fact the very balances have disappeared altogether, having been paid to the merchants as return duties under the 18th section.†

And another New York paper, the Commercial Advertiser, says:—"We are told that the reduction of the duty upon iron, has already been followed by a rise in the market of 10 per cent. and also that some staple articles of hardware have risen 20.

* Some think that the minimum on cotton yarn, and cloths, will remain even after 1842, to protect their manufacture; and others contend that specific duties will be untouched till then! As for instance, the intelligent editor of the "Nantucket Inquirer" says—"The operation of Mr. Clay's bill upon the article of olive oil is to retain the duty unchanged for ten years!" The present duty is 20 cents per gallon. If this opinion be correct, iron, coal, spirits, sugar, &c. will remain as they are, "for ten years!" But, we must believe that we are to have a new tariff every two years until 1842, in respect to all articles on which the present rate of duty exceeds 20 per cent. on the foreign cost of them. Is the secretary of the treasury to have entire command over the revenue and the tariff, and determine, from time to time, and at all times, what duties shall be collected on this or that article? This power is not conferred, and surely it never will be; but how else are the collectors to know what they shall charge upon cottons subject to the minimum; on glass, which pays both a specific and an ad valorem duty; and on sugar subject to a specific duty only—the kinds of each having different values in foreign places?

We have not yet met with any person who pretended to an ability to answer this question, except in referring the whole matter to the secretary of the treasury.

†These payments to the merchants have been since suspended—and claims must be made on the treasury.

VOL. XLIV—SIG. 5.

The market has also advanced in Europe—partly from an increase of consumption there—but chiefly by the belief that the demand for the foreign article is to be greatly increased in the United States.

It should be recollected, that the duty on "hardware" was much reduced by the suspension of the provisos above alluded to. We wish that some friend in New York would make particular inquiries into the matters just stated, and give us the result of them. That most of the leading articles will rise in price as the duties on them shall be reduced, and the wages of laboring persons diminished—we surely believe, because of the want of an excited and steadily increasing competition. But of this more hereafter. We have carefully obtained and laid aside about thirty specimens of American cotton and woollen goods, with the present fair wholesale cash prices, &c. marked upon them, by one of the oldest and most respectable dealers in them—to be compared with goods of like quality at a future day, that the nullifiers may find out how much they shall have saved by reduced duties.*

The words "to be continued" are so offensive, in numerous cases, that we have sometimes incurred the expense of a supplement that we might avoid the use of them; and, when an extra number of pages cannot be given, various exertions are made to preserve interesting articles from injury by divisions of them. An instance of the latter is now present. We give the reports, resolutions and ordinances of the South Carolina convention, complete, we believe; but an account of the proceedings of that body, with sketches of some of the speeches, are postponed. The parts are separated; but each may be considered sufficiently full in itself.

This convention adjourned on the 18th inst. Among other things, the act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, is "nullified"—so nullification is not dead, though nearly every state, in the United States, has declared itself against that heresy.

A collection of the proceedings had in the several states, on this subject, would be interesting. Perhaps, we shall make one.

We have given more than usual attention to foreign articles and news—for a general record of events should be kept. It will be seen that the affairs of Ireland have reached a crisis. They cannot remain as they are—much longer. The British ministry has resolved to preserve the peace of the country, by the operation of laws which are justified only on the "plea of necessity," and nothing is left to the Irish people but a quiet submission to arbitrary edicts, or open organised resistance in arms.

THE CHOLERA has broken out at Havana, with great violence. The deaths were already from 100 to 150 per day, principally among the blacks. Many had fled from the city—business was completely at a stand, and goods were left at the custom house day after day—the merchants not wishing to take them out. Not many deaths had occurred on board of the vessels in port. Some very respectable white persons, of correct habits and robust frames, had died.

This terrible disease has also appeared at Oporto, and was committing considerable ravages. Several of don Pedro's staff officers had died.

*A late Boston paper says—The tariff of 1832, which is now in operation, greatly reduces the duties on some protected articles. It is hoped some competent persons will prepare and publish an exact statement of the reduction on each article, that the nullifiers may know what they save, for they will never find out by the prices!

But we have the cholera nearer home. It continues at Nashville, and in the neighborhood of Gallatin, Tennessee.

AWFUL CATASTROPHE. The New York Redactor of Saturday contains an article from the Constitutional del Cauca, stating that in the month of July last, while mass was being celebrated in the church of Sigchos, near Tacuma, in the republic of Ecuador, South America, on the day of the solemn festival del corpus, fire was communicated to the building by means of a rocket, and that in the rush of the audience to the door, it became shut, and the whole congregation perished in the flames except the curate, who escaped through a window! The number of lives lost was estimated at more than five hundred, besides children.

ANOTHER. The ship Martha, arrived at N. Y. on Sunday, fell in with the wreck of a vessel that had been burnt, and 14 dead bodies floating round her.—Picked up some spare, trussel-tree of the mizzen mast, on which was written, M. H. Taylor, mate of ship, [the rest obliterated.]

FOREIGN NEWS.

From London papers to the evening of February 5.
GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

London, Feb. 5. This being the day for the delivery of the king's speech, his majesty arrived at the house of lords shortly before two o'clock; and on alighting from his carriage was received by the cabinet ministers and great officers of state.

His majesty immediately proceeded to the robing room, and from thence to the interior of the house of lords. On his majesty taking his seat on the throne, the usher of the black rod summoned the house of commons to hear the royal speech. Shortly afterwards, the speaker, attended by a great number of members, appeared at the bar, when his majesty delivered the following most gracious speech:

"My lords and gentlemen:

"The period being now arrived at which the business of parliament is usually resumed, I have called you together for the discharge of the important duties with which you are entrusted. Never at any time did subjects of greater interest and magnitude call for your attention.

"I have still to lament the continuance of the civil war in Portugal, which for some months has existed between the princes of the house of Braganza. From the commencement of this contest, I have abstained from all interference, except such as was required for the protection of British subjects resident in Portugal; but you may be assured that I shall not fail to avail myself of an opportunity that may be afforded me to assist in restoring peace to a country with which the interests of my dominions are so intimately connected.

"I have also to regret that my earnest endeavors to effect a definitive arrangement between Holland and Belgium, have hitherto been unsuccessful. I found myself at length compelled, in conjunction with the king of the French, to take measures for the execution of the treaty of the 15th November, 1831. The capture of the citadel of Antwerp has in part accomplished that object, but the Dutch government still refusing to evacuate the rest of the territories assigned to Belgium by that treaty, the embargo which I had directed to be imposed on the Dutch commerce has been continued. Negotiations are again commenced; and you may rely on their being conducted on my part, as they have uniformly been, with the single view of ensuring to Holland and Belgium a separate existence, on principles of mutual security and independence.

"The good faith and honor with which the French government has acted in these transactions; and the assurances which I continue to receive from the chief powers of Europe of their friendly disposition, give me confidence in the success of my endeavors to preserve the general peace. I have given directions that the various papers which are necessary for your information on the affairs of Holland and Belgium should be laid before you.

"The approaching termination of the charter of the bank of England and of the East India company, will require a revision of these establishments, and I rely on your wisdom for making such provisions for the important interests connected with them, as may appear, from experience and full consideration, to be best calculated to secure public credit, to improve and extend our commerce, and to promote the general prosperity and power of the British empire.

"Your attention will also be directed to the state of the church, more particularly as regards its temporalities and the maintenance of the clergy. The complaints which have risen from the collection of tithes appear to require a change of system, which, without diminishing the means of maintaining the established clergy in respectability and usefulness, may prevent the collision of interests, and the consequent derangement and dissatisfaction which have too frequently prevailed between the ministers of the church and their parishioners. It may also be necessary for you to consider what remedies may be applied for the correction of acknowledged abuses, and whether the revenues of the church may not admit of a more equitable and judicious distribution.

"In your deliberations on these important subjects, it cannot be necessary for me to impress upon you the duty of carefully attending to the security of the church established by law in these realms, and to the true interests of religion.

"In relation to Ireland, with a view of removing the causes of complaint which had been so generally felt, and which had been attended with such unfortunate consequences, an act was passed during the last session of parliament for carrying into effect a general composition for tithes. To complete that salutary work, I recommend to you, in conjunction with such other amendments of the law as may be found applicable to that part of my dominions, the adoption of a measure by which, upon the principle of a just commutation, the possessors of land, may be enabled to free themselves from the burthen of an annual payment.

"To the further reforms that may be necessary, you will probably find that, although the established church of Ireland is by law permanently united with that of England, the peculiarities of their respective circumstances will require a separate consideration. There are other subjects hardly less important to the general peace and welfare of Ireland, affecting the administration of justice, and the local taxation of the country, to which your attention will also be required.

"Gentlemen of the house of commons:

"I have directed the estimates for the service of the year to be laid before you. They will be framed with the most anxious attention to all useful economy. Notwithstanding the large reduction in the estimates of the last year, I am happy to inform you that all the extraordinary services which the exigencies of the times required, have been amply provided for. The state of the revenue as compared with the public expenditure, has hitherto fully realised the expectations that were formed at the close of the last session.

"My lords and gentlemen:

"In this part of the United Kingdom, with very few exceptions, the public peace has been preserved; and it will be your anxious but grateful duty to promote by all practicable means, habits of industry and good order among the laboring classes of the community.

"On my part, I shall be ready to co-operate to the utmost of my power in obviating all just cause of complaint, and in promoting all well considered measures of improvement. But, it is my painful duty to observe, that the disturbances in Ireland to which I adverted at the close of the last session, have greatly increased.

"A spirit of insubordination and violence has risen to the most fearful height, rendering life and property insecure, defying the authority of the law, and threatening the most fatal consequences, if not promptly and effectually repressed.

"I feel confident that to your loyalty and patriotism, I shall not resort in vain for assistance in these afflicting circumstances, and that you will be ready to adopt such measures of salutary precaution, and to entrust to me such additional powers as may be found necessary for controlling and punishing the disturbers of the public peace, and strengthening the legislative union between the two countries, which, with your support, and under the blessing of Divine Providence, I am determined to maintain by all the means in my power, as indissolubly connected with the peace, security and welfare of my dominions."

In reading the speech, (says a London paper), the king laid particular emphasis on the passage relating to the disturbed state of Ireland, and was particularly emphatic when he expressed his determination to uphold the union of England and Ireland. The troubles in that kingdom evidently caused much uneasiness. A London paper remarks:—"We have reason to believe that the government have decided upon strong measures being used for the tranquilization of that country; and also that the marquis of Anglesey will return to Dublin."

It does not appear from the speech that any measures of direct interposition, in the affairs of Portugal, are contemplated. Six hundred unmarried females, (not convicts), have lately been imported into New Holland, from England.

TURKEY AND EGYPT.

It is reported that Ibrahim had assented to a cessation of hostilities with a view to a definite arrangement with the sultan, who seems to have accepted the offer of assistance made by Russia.

Commercial letters from Smyrna, to the 6th January, assert that a treaty had been concluded between Russia and the porte, in which the emperor Nicholas agrees to succor the sultan with a fleet, and with an army of 60,000 men.

FRANCE.

The accounts from Paris are to February 4th. The naval preparations at Brest continued to be prosecuted with undiminished energy, and some of the ships of war were already in a condition to put to sea.

The army of the north, the head quarters of which were at Compeigne, had been restored to the same footing as that upon which it was placed before its recent entry into Belgium.

Several of the knights templars, have been seen walking the streets of Paris, with their white mantles, ornamented with a red cross.

The Journal du Commerce of Lyons, of the 27th January, says—"Two days ago a mercantile house was opening some bales of cotton, when to the astonishment of those engaged in the operation, there was found in one of them the body of a negro, bent double and carefully packed in the middle of it."

SPAIN.

It is said that some partial disturbances in that kingdom had been effectually put down, and that don Carlos, (the king's brother), was under arrest in his own apartments.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.

We learn with regret that news has been recently received by the way of England, from the South Sea Islands, of a melancholy character. A bloody war has broken out between Tahaa and Raietee, and many lives had been lost. The missionaries had not been able to allay the troubles, and it was feared their "influence was on the decline."

HUNGARY.

The family estates of the princes Esterhazy, who are at the head of the Hungarian nobility, yield an annual revenue of more than two hundred thousand pounds sterling.

LATER NEWS.

London papers of the 14th and Paris of the 19th Feb.

From Great Britain and Ireland the most interesting intelligence is that which relates to the people of Ireland, in whose favor there has been a sudden and strong manifestation in the house of commons of England. In that body on the 11th, the chancellor of the exchequer having moved the adoption of the answer to the king's speech, Mr. Lalor, and other Catholic members protested against a declaration volunteered in a preceding sitting, that they were prevented by their oaths from legislating on affairs of the church. Mr. O'Connell declared that he had an equal right with any other member to legislate on church affairs, and, if it were not so, he might as well be at once expelled from the house. The reading of the address to the king was interrupted by a motion from Mr. Cobbett, proposing a substitute. The substitute was lost 23 to 323. On the 12th, the address was presented at Windsor, the house having adjourned until 4 o'clock.

On the return of the speaker, ministers, and twenty members, who had proceeded to Windsor with the address, the speaker communicated the king's answer in substance as follows: "I thank the commons for their loyal and respectful address, and for the assurance which they give me of their disposition to aid my efforts for the preservation inviolate of the union between Ireland and England, and for the repression of violence; in short, the house may be assured that I shall continue my efforts for the removal of all just grounds of complaint throughout my kingdom." The answer was received with great applause.

The London papers are almost exclusively occupied with the discussion in parliament on the king's speech. Mr. Cobbett has been very loquacious, and has not failed to attempt strengthening his arguments by facts and assertions relative to this country, and has made some egregious errors; for instance, he declared that Washington signed the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. O'Connell denominated the king's speech a "brutal and a bloody speech." The debates are of the most piquant kind, if indeed a broader and blunter word would not be more expressive.

The London Morning Chronicle, of the 8th says:

In the house of lords last night, lord King, in moving for an account of the sums paid out of the livings held by ecclesiastical corporations to the clergy, took occasion to deal out some very hard blows to the dignity of the church. After specifying a number of cases in which, notwithstanding the enormous increase in the value of the tithes, the allowances to the officiating ministers by the deans and chapters [the friars and monks of Protestantism], were not more now than they were two hundred years ago—his lordship contended that this was a most scandalous abuse, and ought to have been remedied long ago. But "experience has proved [said his lordship] that from the reformation down to the present time, the protectors of the church had shown themselves more disposed to protect the many abuses of the church, than that a reformation should take place; and they had used all their influence and power, and the first estate of the realm holding seats in that house, to prevent reform. It was their duty to see that there were no abuses, and if there were—and they had not the means to correct them—they ought to apply to parliament. The king's speech recommended an equitable distribution of the revenues. He hoped that this equalization would take place; he hoped that pluralities would be done away with; and he wished in addition, in order that ecclesiastical persons might not neglect their duties, that they might be confined to their spiritual functions."

The bishop of London made a very naive defence of the church. When [said the right reverend father in God] the noble lord said that not much had been done, and referred to experience, he seemed to forget that it was only of late years that any expectation had been formed [heard]. The imperfections of the church had only been discovered within a few years; before that time, attention had not been directed to the subject, and it was only within a few years that an impetus had been given to the clergy."

The same paper says:

We have been led, rather prematurely, we own, to anticipate the relation in which the two houses will soon stand towards each other, in order to explain the distrust naturally entertained by many, of the ability of ministers to carry such a bill, regarding the church of Ireland, as may really satisfy the Catholic population of Ireland.

The London Courier of the 6th says:

It is with great regret that we feel it to be our duty to state, to our readers that the king's speech which we published yesterday, is generally considered to be very unsatisfactory, not on account of that which is said, but on account of that which is left unsaid.

A large number of notices of motions have already been given regarding the ballot, triennial parliaments, the abolition of slavery, the regulation of infant labor, the abolition of vestry rates in Ireland, the amendment of the Irish jury system, &c. Work is, therefore, carved out in abundance for the house.

At the same time, some important changes in the mode of conducting the house were announced.

On the 12th Feb. the communication from the ministers was made relative to the reductions and changes in the Irish church establishment. The following are the principal alterations proposed by the chancellor. Ten bishoprics to be abolished (after the death of the present incumbents) out of the twenty-two which at present exist. Those to be reduced being—Dromore, Clogher, Kildare, Cork, Waterford, Ossory, Kilmore, Tuam, and two other sees, the names of which did not reach the gallery. This diminution would produce a direct saving of £60,000 per annum, besides what would accrue from the renewal of leases, &c. The entire income of the bishops in Ireland might be calculated at £150,000 a year, that of the deans and chapters at £23,000; as to the benefices, his lordship said that as yet he had no accurate returns, but he would set them down at £600,000; making the entire ecclesiastical income in Ireland about £800,000 per annum. He proposed to abolish the system of first fruits, now applied to the augmentation of poor livings, and to replace it by an annual per centage upon all preferments of £500 a year, at the rate of 5 per cent. £700 to be made to pay 7 per cent. and beyond, 10 per cent. Bishop's sees to be regulated by a different scale; those above £10,000 paying 15 per cent. those below that income 10 per cent. below £6,000 7 per cent. and below £5,000 5 per cent. All the proceeds of this per centage to be given to augment the incomes of the poorer clergy. Church rates government propose to abolish altogether; deans and chapters likewise to be abolished, or to have the cure of souls attached to them. His lordship then stated various other changes, both present and prospective, in connection with the establishment. The statement was received with much cheering, and was even applauded by Mr. O'Connell.

The chancellor of the exchequer, in bringing forward the measures proposed in Irish affairs, on the 12th, stated that the ministry had, in this undertaking, done their utmost to provide a remedy for all the abuses pertaining to the ecclesiastical laws. They had appointed magistrates, without any distinction of sects, and among the sheriffs and lord-lieutenants of counties, there were quite as many catholics as protestants. They sought, in reference to the tithes, he said, to relieve the tenant, without despoiling the landlord; they proposed to distribute the burdens more equitably, and to regulate the contracts between the tenant and proprietor.

As to the taxes for the support of the church, he said the new plan differed entirely from that of the tithes, and was far less onerous to the catholics; the tithes, he said, they were disposed to abolish entirely. (Burst of applause.) The change would afford relief to the people of about £70,000 per annum. The denaries are abolished, and the number of bishops is reduced from 22 to 12, and thus a further retrenchment of £60,000 would be effected. He concluded by expressing the hope that these measures would vindicate the good intentions of the government, and be approved by the house. (Prolonged applause.)

Two other Dutch vessels from the East Indies had been detained and sent into England.

France. Paris is in commotion in consequence of duels fought by the friends of the duchess Berri and the republicans. Eleven of these duels took place within two or three days.

It is expected that ministers will require of the chamber of deputies the credit of a million for the dowry of the queen of the Belgians.

Turkey and Egypt. The Augsburg Gazette of the 1st Feb. brings the following important intelligence, of the 28th ult. from Vienna:—"According to accounts from Constantinople, which have been received by express, an armistice for 40 days has just been concluded between the Egyptians and the Turks. The negotiations for the final settlement of the differences, are carried on with the utmost ardor by the representatives of the European powers. They have, it is asserted, solemnly protested against any further advance on the part of Ibrahim. Perfect tranquillity prevailed at Constantinople, and the people anxiously wished for peace. The exchange of couriers between Paris and Constantinople, is exceedingly active."

Letters from Bucharest to the 29th January, announce the approaching arrival of a Russian corps d'armee of 25,000 men, in the principalities. Its object is no doubt provisional, and intended to give weight to the offered mediation of Russia.

Portugal. Portsmouth, (England), Feb. 6. This day arrived the Osprey cutter, Abnet, master, with wounded and passengers from Oporto. I learn by one of them, that a severe affair took place on the 24th ult. by a part of the army embarking in boats to attack St. John's, and two forts on the Douro. The troops engaged were 1,400 English, 700 French, and three regiments of Cacadores, under Colonel La Place. They were completely successful, driving the Miguelites by the bayonet. One of the forts mounted eight guns. They retained possession; took some pipes of wine. Pedro's loss is very great—850 killed and wounded—15 officers. Colonel Bacon commanded the cavalry. I am grieved to learn that the severely wounded—in fact, those who cannot help themselves—are left to perish; such is the miserable state of the hospital staff.

Pedro's army suffers for want of provisions and clothing. The surf is so great, that two ships are now off with provisions, and have been for the last week. Captain Davis who went to join, is arrived by the Osprey.

My informant saw a French ship, with 400 quarters of wheat, sink off St. Johns.

Spain. News had been received at Paris of the very unsettled state of affairs in Spain. The Carlists, it is said, are to make a stand against the government so soon as they shall have obtained a sufficient quantity of arms, ammunition, &c. Should Ferdinand resort to the more liberal system of government, which, it is said, he has already evinced a strong desire to carry into effect, the revolutionists will stand but little chance.

The Indicateur, of Bordeaux, gives the following extract of a letter of the 31st Jan. from Madrid. "M. Zea Bermudez has just concluded a treaty with sir Stratford Canning, in virtue of which Donna Maria da Gloria is to be acknowledged absolute queen of Portugal. Her husband is to be chosen from the house of Naples. By the same treaty, the cabinets of Paris and London have engaged to acknowledge the young princess of Spain, whose right to the crown is to be established by the cortes, which will assemble on April 1."

Holland and Belgium. There is much talk about projects and counter-projects, for settling the matters in dispute between these kingdoms—but there is no appearance of an adjustment of them.

YET LATER NEWS.

London papers to the 19th Feb. inclusive.

Great Britain and Ireland. On the 15th Feb. earl Grey introduced a bill "for the more effectual suppression of local disturbances and dangerous associations in Ireland." The "N. Y. Commercial Advertiser" gives a synopsis of this bill, and says—"It will be perceived that all power is committed to the lord lieutenant, and that the bill is framed with such precaution as to leave very little chance of evading it. That it is a violation of the British constitution is evident; and indeed it is admitted so to be by lord Grey; but the public safety is held to be of paramount authority. Courts martial are established in the disturbed districts—their proceedings and punishments are summary and without appeal—the habeas corpus act suspended—and all persons required to remain within their houses between sunset and sunrise, on pain of being sentenced to transportation. This brings us back to the days of William the conqueror, when the Curfew told the knell of parting day;—but perhaps the present condition of Ireland may render such severe enactments as necessary now, as that of England did in the days of the Normans."

Earl Grey's speech in favor of this bill is also inserted. The condition of Ireland as described by him, (and we fear, too truly), is awful; and he justified the bill on the principle salus populi suprema lex. The duke of Wellington warmly supported the general provisions of the bill—he considered them "imperatively necessary." So did lord Brougham—he said, that "the crown was an usurper instead of a government, if it claimed allegiance without granting protection." On the 18th, the bill was read a second time, nem. con. [O'Connell has placed Ireland upon the alternative of abject submission or open rebellion; and, at the cost of the people, may find that it was much easier to raise an excitement than to direct it. The murders and robberies, and all sorts of outrages which so generally prevail, must be checked. He had however threatened that, if the bill passed, he would use his influence to cause a demand for gold, on all the banks—which created some alarm.]

Mr. Cobbett seems to be making one or more speeches every day—and braves all attempts to stop him.

The ministers persist in carrying out their projects relative to slavery in the West Indies—[concerning which we intend to publish a considerable collection of articles.]

Holland and Belgium. Much excitement prevailed in the latter, because of the regulations established by the king of Holland for the navigation of the Scheldt. It was believed that England and France would open the navigation by force, unless these regulations were speedily withdrawn. Holland exacts a transit duty on the cargoes of all vessels passing her forts. [Other accounts say that no tolls are demanded.]

Turkey and Egypt. Ibrahim had gained another victory over the Turks and made himself master of the magazines of ammunition and provisions which had been collected at Ashkir. Resistance of his arms seemed at an end—in Asia, at least.

Portugal. The government has given satisfaction for firing upon a French brig-of-war, at the mouth of the Tagus. The French consul forced his way into the chamber of the duke of Cadaval, after midnight, and compelled him to sign a paper which was presented, in his bed, being an invalid—refusing to depart without it.

*To exemplify the condition of Ireland, Mr. Stanley, (in the house of commons), noticed the two counties in which the system of agitation commenced, thus—

"The two counties are Kilkenny and the Queen's county. In Kilkenny alone, within the last twelve months, there have been 32 murders and attempts to murder, 34 burnings, 512 burglaries, 36 acts of houghing of cattle; and the number of illegal notices and violent and serious assaults, by which I mean assaults attended with danger to life and limb, has been 170. In Queen's county the number has been even more. There have been sixty murders or attempts to murder; burglaries, 626; malicious injuries to property, 115; and serious assaults upon individuals, 209."

LATEST NEWS.

London papers to the evening of the 23d Feb. inclusive.
Great Britain and Ireland. The money market had assumed more activity, and prices had advanced. Consols 87½ to 87¼. Belgian stocks had risen 2 per cent.

Earl Grey's bill relative to disturbances in Ireland, was agreed to in the house of lords on the 21st Feb.

The house of commons had resolved to meet at twelve at noon, for the reception of petitions and the transaction of private business, and adjourn at 3 o'clock. The regular sessions will commence in the evening, as heretofore.

Great agitation was manifested at Dublin on the 20th, in consequence of the suppression bill. The trades and the volunteers had suspended their political operations to deliberate on their personal security. A great general meeting was to take place the next day. A run had been made upon the bank of Ireland for gold, but not to a great extent.

A letter from Mr. O'Connell had been published in Dublin—speaking in the most severe terms of earl Grey's bill—exhorting the people to respect the laws, but to present respectful petitions against the measures proposed.

Spain. The king and queen appear to be successful in their measures—and the Carlists seem to be down.

France. Nothing important is mentioned as having happened in this kingdom. A large reduction of the army is still spoken of.

Holland and Belgium. Some new negotiations are mentioned concerning the affairs of these countries! The reports are not worth repeating.

Turkey and Egypt. Letters from Alexandria of the 10th Jan. say that the pacha was fitting out a fleet to take possession of Smyrna—he had not then heard of the armistice which his son had granted to the sultan. He was apprehensive that the English and French might interfere, and prevent his occupation of that rich and important city.

A Russian vessel had arrived at Constantinople with a cargo of seventy beautiful slaves!

Russia. Private letters from Petersburg say the influenza was raging there. It is affirmed that above 100,000 persons were suffering under it at the same time, and a still greater number in Moscow, where the theatres are closed.

China. The late rebellion seems nearly subdued. Le, governor of the Canton province, had been degraded and sent to Peking, because of this rebellion.

The Falkland Islands. Accounts from Monte Video, of Jan. 18, say—"The schr. Sun, of New London, has arrived here from the Falkland Islands, having been ordered off by the Buenos Ayrean schr. Sarandi. The captain says seals were scarce. The Sarandi has, in her turn, been ordered off by the British sloop of war Clío, and has arrived at Buenos Ayres. So there is no longer any danger of war between the United States and Buenos Ayres."

LIVE OAK.

Report of the secretary of the navy upon live oak.

Every thing which goes to throw light upon our permanent national resources, must at all times engage the attention of our intelligent citizens. For some time past, we have intended to present to our readers a synopsis of the extremely valuable report communicated to the house of representatives by the secretary of the navy relative to live oak—that unrivalled material which forms the basis of our naval strength—but have hitherto been prevented by the pressure of other matters growing out of the proceedings of congress.

This report, drawn up in compliance with a call from the house, contains a mass of important information as to the construction of vessels of war, which required a profound knowledge of the subject as well as great pains to concentrate and present in a form so striking and available.

The commencement of this report embodies all the information which has been obtained as to the extent of the supply of live oak both upon public and private lands. The amount of this supply is stated by the secretary to be about 8,000,000 cubic feet at a medium calculation of 50 feet per tree. The elements of this computation are given in the appendix in a tabular form.

One of the objects of the call was to obtain the views of the secretary upon the best mode of securing the live oak timber growing upon public lands from being plundered. The remedy proposed by him is both simple and effectual. He recommends that provision be made by law that all masters of vessels having live oak on board on private account, before they are admitted to clearance at the custom houses, shall prove that the timber was taken from private lands. This plain expedient strikes us to be worth more in effecting the object, than thousands upon thousands of dollars expended in "preventive service," and has been adopted by congress in the act for the gradual improvement of the navy.

Preliminary to the settlement of the question of the adequate supply of this material for the future wants of the navy, the secretary has presented a succinct view of the past consumption—the amount now in depot at the various yards—on the stocks—afloat, &c. which of itself forms the most satisfactory history of the rise and progress of the naval power of the United States that we have before seen. All who feel an interest in this subject will find the leading facts relative to the construction of those ships, whose career of glory has shed so much lustre upon the fame of our gallant seamen, stated in a condensed but clear manner.

As recourse will undoubtedly be had to the report itself, the extent of which excludes it from our columns, by all those who are inclined to examine this subject of supply, we must content ourselves with hastily glancing at some of its results, and recommending the report as a document of great merit, which throws strong light upon this subject, heretofore regarded as extremely obscure and difficult of satisfactory explanation.

The whole amount of live oak timber employed in the construction of public vessels since 1797, is stated at 974,363 cubic feet. Of this quantity, the vessels now in commission contain 165,480 feet; vessels in ordinary, 322,633 feet; ships on the stocks, 354,000 feet; leaving a deficit of 132,250 feet, which is thus accounted for: 8,000 feet were sold by order of congress in 1801; 68,375 feet were captured by the enemy during the late war; 44,500 feet were burned at the navy yard in this city in 1814; 3,375 feet have been lost by shipwreck; and 8,000 feet by natural decay.

The stock of live oak now in depot at the several yards, purchased for building ships under the acts for the gradual improvement of the navy, is 431,845 cubic feet. The aggregate purchases of live oak, under the annual appropriations for repairs, have amounted to 168,000 cubic feet.

The quantity of live oak timber required for the frame of a ship of the line, is estimated at 34,000 cubic feet; for that of a frigate of the first class, 25,000 feet; for that of a frigate of the second class, 18,000 feet; for that of a sloop, 8,000 feet; and for that of a schooner at 1,800 feet.

Of the amount of live oak timber estimated as growing upon public and private lands, one-fourth is estimated as suitable for ships of the line; one-fourth for frigates, and one-half for sloops and schooners.

For the ordinary repairs of the live oak frames of vessels in commission, less than one per cent. of timber originally employed is required—for replacing extraordinary losses by fire, shipwreck and great decay, 5 per cent. is estimated—so that 6 per cent. of the live oak timber of which the frames of our vessels are constructed is necessary to keep our naval force entire. This will require annually 1,700 cubic feet for ordinary repairs, and 8,500 feet to replace extraordinary losses upon the force in commission. To cover the repairs which may be required to keep up all our vessels both in ordinary and in commission, it is estimated that about 27,000 feet per annum will be sufficient. The annual purchases under the appropriations for the gradual improvement of the navy for the last ten years have been 33,000 feet, which is to be exclusively applied to building new vessels. The present system will, therefore, require about 60,000 cubic feet per year, which may be furnished at a medium calculation by about 1,300 trees per annum.

There have been already reserved from sale 67,417 acres of live oak timber lands. The secretary recommends a further reservation of 100,000 acres, which would secure an ample supply for the demands of the naval service, both for repairing old and building new vessels upon the present system, forever.

The calculations upon this subject are elaborate, and apparently conclusive. No American citizen can go through this document without feeling the highest gratification at the survey of our naval resources, which it so ably develops.

TREASURY INSTRUCTIONS.

CIRCULAR TO COLLECTORS, NAVAL OFFICERS AND SURVEYORS.
Treasury department, comptroller's office, March 7, 1833.

SIR—You will receive, herewith, for your government, the following acts passed at the last session of congress, viz:

1. "An act to explain an act entitled 'an act to reduce the duties on coffee, tea and cocoa,' passed the 20th May, one thousand eight hundred and thirty."
2. "An act to explain and amend the 18th section of 'an act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports,' approved the 14th July, 1832."
3. "An act establishing a port of entry and delivery at the village of Fall River, in Massachusetts, and discontinuing the office at Dighton."
4. "An act to explain and amend the act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports, passed the 14th July, 1832, so far as relates to hardware and certain other manufactures of copper and brass, and other materials."
5. "An act to modify the act of the 14th July, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties on imports."

The third section of act No. 2 contains the following provisions, viz:

"If a sum equal to the amount of duties levied by the said act of the 14th July, shall not have been collected, and the bond or bonds given shall amount to more than the duties imposed by said act, the secretary of the treasury shall direct that a debenture certificate or certificates, the form of which shall be prescribed by him, for such excess of duty, shall be issued to the persons placing the same in the custody of the customs, payable out of the bond or bonds given for duties on the same. The collectors to give the debtors credit on the bonds for the difference between the high and low duties, and to cancel the bonds on payment of the balance."

To carry these different provisions into effect, you are, when the importer deposits the goods, to credit his bonds with the difference between the high and low duties, and if any excess shall then appear to have been paid, such excess is to be refunded to him at the treasury; but if, upon giving such credit, the full amount of duties according to the existing laws will not have been paid, the bonds are to be cancelled only on the payment of the balance thus remaining to be paid.

But in case of goods being deposited by a person other than the importer thereof, and a sum equal to the amount of duties levied by the said act of the 14th July, shall not have been collected, and the bond or bonds given shall amount to more than the duties, imposed by said act, instead of giving a credit on the duty bonds of the importer, for the difference between the high and low duties, a debenture certificate is to be issued to the person depositing such goods for such difference, the form of which, marked A, approved by the secretary of the treasury, is herewith transmitted.

From this form you will perceive that the debentures will be payable only in case the duty bonds on which they may be predicated, shall be paid.

The same principle is to govern in the case of goods heretofore liable to duty, but which, under the act of the 14th July, 1832, will be free.

If such goods be deposited by the importer, any duties which may have been paid thereon, are to be refunded to him at the treasury, and the bonds for the balance of the duties (if any) are to be cancelled; and if such goods be deposited by a person other than the importer, and no duties thereon have been paid, he is to receive debenture certificates for the whole, payable at the same times respectively at which the bonds given for the duties will become payable: but if a part of the duties were paid, then such part is to be refunded to the person who may have deposited the goods, and debenture certificates for the balance of the duties are to be granted to him, payable as before mentioned.

The 3d section of act No. 2, also contains a provision according to which goods deposited and remaining in the custom house stores until the 1st of April next, will be entitled to the benefit of the 18th section of the act of 14th July, 1832, and if any higher duty shall have been paid thereon than would have been levied under the last mentioned act, such excess is to be refunded out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the person who may have placed the same in the custody of the customs.

The applications for a return of such excess of duties, as well as for other duties to be refunded, are, of course, to be made to the treasury, and to substantiate the claims, a certificate of the custom house officers is to be produced, agreeably to the enclosed form, marked B.

When goods which have been or which shall be deposited for the benefit of the 18th section of the act of the 14th July, 1832, by persons other than the original importers thereof as authorized by the accompanying act No. 2; the identity is to be established by satisfactory evidence of the transfer or transfers for your government, in relation to which the secretary of the treasury directs that the regulations prescribed by law, when goods are exported for the benefit of drawback by persons other than the original importers thereof, be observed.

Information having been received from sources entitled to entire confidence, that impositions have been practised, and will continue to be practised, on the revenue, by invoicing and entering the articles known by the names of "summer cloth," and "brochellas," under the name of "worsted stuff goods," when, according to the materials of which they are both composed, (say worsted or combed wool and cotton) they are not entitled to that classification, but are liable to the woollens duty, it becomes necessary that measures be adopted at the custom houses, in the examination and inspection of such goods, to detect and prevent impositions of the kind in future.

In compliance with instructions from the secretary of the treasury, you are requested to refund the discriminating duties of tonnage which have been levied by you on Mexican vessels since the 5th April, 1832, the date of the president's proclamation, directing the treaty between the United States of America and the United Mexican States, to be fulfilled.

It is deemed proper to take this occasion to communicate to you the following decisions of this office, viz:

1. That in estimating the value of wool unmanufactured, at the place of exportation—to the actual cost, if the same shall have been actually purchased, or the actual value, if the same shall have been procured otherwise than by purchase, at the time and place, when and where purchased, or otherwise procured, or to the appraised value, if appraised, are to be added all charges, except insurance, and the weight is to be regulated with reference to the pound weight as known and established in the United States. If it shall be proved to your satisfaction, that there is any difference between the pound weight in the United States and that of the foreign country of exportation, such difference is to be taken into view in the computation of the value of the wool. If the value of unmanufactured wool, estimated in the manner thus prescribed, shall exceed eight cents per pound, it will be liable to duty, and vice versa, if it does not exceed that sum per pound. An actual weighing at the time of arrival, is considered necessary in all cases, in order to ascertain whether the wool will or will not be liable to duty.

2. That an article called "fancy coral," in thin uneven pieces, about a quarter of an inch in length, with a hole midway between the two ends, is not considered as coming under the denomination of "beads," in contemplation of law, and if not entitled to the general exemption from duty of "coral," is entitled to such exemption as an article not enumerated in any law, and heretofore liable as such, to an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent. The circumstance of such coral being strung, is not considered as placing it upon a different footing.

3. That cord beads are liable to an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent. as "all other beads, not otherwise enumerated."

4. That window blinds, made of split rattans, are liable to an ad valorem duty of 15 [25] per cent. as manufactures of wood.

5. That all articles composed entirely of silk and linen, are entitled to an entry as "manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be a component part."

6. That all iron chains, which from the form and thickness of the links, are suitable for, and are generally used for cables, whether of large or small vessels, are to be subjected to the specific duty of 3 cents per pound.

7. That goat's and camel's hair camlets, are entitled to an entry at 15 per cent. being considered as coming under the general classification of "cashmere or thibet," in contradistinction to the classification of "merino shawls made of wool, and all other manufactures of wool, or of which wool shall be a component part."

8. That shawls, the body composed of silk and worsted, with the figures on the border formed with carded wool, are considered to be entitled to be placed under the classification of "shawls and other manufactures of silk and worsted at an ad valorem duty of 10 per cent."

9. That shawls of worsted or combed wool and cottons, are liable to the woolen's duty.

10. That the articles called brown rolls, or headens, dowls, platillas, creas and bretagnes, are entitled to an entry at an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent."

11. That the following articles are liable to an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent. viz: black linen, Russia sheetings, linen diapers and damasks, damask table cloths and napkins, linen sheeting, linen drillings for *pantaloon*s, linen lawns, called long lawns, linen threads, Irish linen shirtings and estoniles.

12. That sail needles, sack and yarn needles, darning needles, bent packing needles, shoemaker's, glover's and saddler's netting and tambouring needles, and all similar needles, are embraced by the general exemption of "needles." Bodkins not included.

13. That so much of the act of 20th April, 1818, as requires wines and distilled spirits to be deposited in the public stores, to be entitled to drawback, is considered to be still in force; but that the terms of credit therein allowed are virtually repealed by the 5th section of the act of the 11th July, 1832, entitled "an act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," the provisions in this respect, in the last mentioned act, being so repugnant to those in the former, that both cannot stand well together, and have a concurrent efficacy.

It may be proper to observe, however, that this decision is applicable only to the importations of wines and distilled spirits, which have been made since the 3d instant, and which may hereafter be made.

It is understood that large importations were made of the articles known by the name of plains, kerseys and Kendal cottons, and deposited in the custom house stores for the benefit of the reduction of duties which was to have taken effect after the 3d day of the present month, as authorised by the act of the 14th July, 1832, already referred to; and that orders for a large quantity of said goods have been given upon the faith that after the 3d instant they would be admitted to entry at an ad valorem duty of 5 per cent. but that under the act entitled "an act to modify the act of July, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties on imports," which, so far as relates to these particular kind of goods, having taken effect on the 2d of the month, and raised the duty thereon to 50 per cent. the importers will be compelled to advance duties, (say the difference between the higher and the lower rates), for which, upon every principle of justice and good faith, they conceive, congress will pass a law to have refunded to them, and that such advance can be prevented only in case the treasury department can extend the time for the payment of the duties on the goods in question.

It is regretted that such will be the operation of the two acts mentioned; but it is not competent for the treasury, in any case, to extend the time of payment beyond that, at which, according to law duties on goods become due and payable.

With a view, however, to facilitate any application which may be made to the next congress for relief, it would be advisable to keep a particular account of these goods, the names of the importers, the dates of payment of the duties, and the difference between the higher and lower amount of duties.

It will naturally suggest itself to you, that you are not to include in such account any goods which you are not perfectly satisfied are of that description and fabrics as to have entitled them to an entry at five per cent. in case the act, in relation to them, of 1832, had not repealed that of 1832.

Such plains, kerseys and Kendal cottons as were imported prior to the 2d instant, will be liable to the payment of the rates of duties in force at the time of importation; but if such rates be greater than the rates fixed by the act of 2d instant, and the plains, kerseys and Kendal cottons be deposited in the custom house stores as prescribed by law, they will be entitled to the benefit of the 18th section of the act of 14th July, 1832.

Respectfully, J. ANDERSON, comptroller.

Treasury department, comptroller's office, March 19, 1833.

Sir—It is deemed proper to inform you, that so much of the 27th section of the supplemental collection law of 1st March, 1833, as is not repugnant to, and consequently is not repealed by the 5th section of the tariff act of 14th July, 1832, is considered to be still in force.

Accordingly, if the duties on other goods than "manufactures of wool, or of which wool is a component part," imported into the U.

States in any ship or vessel, on account of one person only or of several persons jointly interested, exceed two hundred dollars, and are paid in cash, a discount at the rate of four per centum per annum is to be allowed, for the respective periods of three and six months, from the dates of importation, to which the tariff act of 1832 restricts the terms of credit for the duties on goods other than manufactures of wool, &c.

Although the duties on manufactures of wool, or of which wool is a component part, may be paid in cash, still no discount thereon can be allowed, the 6th section of the tariff act of 1832, expressly denying the right in such case.

Instead of paying the duties, however, on such goods in cash, it is optional with the importer to deposit the goods in the public stores on the terms and conditions specified in the 6th section referred to. Respectfully,

JOSEPH ANDERSON, comptroller.

To Jas. N. Barker, esq.

Treasury department, March 21st, 1833.

Sir—The department has instructed the comptroller upon both the points arising under the late tariff act, and upon which information is desired in your letter of the 18th instant, who will forthwith communicate the same to you and the other collectors. I am very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LOUIS McLANE, secretary of treasury.

James N. Barker, esq. collector of the customs, Philadelphia.

Treasury department, comptroller's office, March 21, 1833.

Sir—The conflicting provisions in the 21st and 24th articles of the second section of the tariff act of 14th July, 1832, the former subjecting "all manufactures of hemp or flax, except yarn and cordage, tarred and untarred, ticklenburgs, ozanahurs and burials, not otherwise specified," to an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent. and the latter authorising the admission to entry of "bleached and unbleached linens," at an ad valorem of 15 per cent. have rendered the meaning of the act somewhat obscure, and given rise to different opinions as to the correct construction of it.

The subject, however, having recently been brought to the consideration of the secretary of the treasury, he has decided that the provisions in the 21st article are to be construed in such manner as that the other provisions of the act may be effectual, and therefore not to embrace "bleached and unbleached linens."

All articles therefore, which in the known commercial sense, and in the usage of trade, have acquired the distinct appellation of linens, bleached or unbleached, are to be admitted at a duty of 15 per cent. Irish linens are believed to be of this character, and are to be charged with duty accordingly.

The secretary of the treasury has also decided that the last proviso in the 1st section of the act of 2d instant, entitled "an act to explain and amend the eighteenth section of 'an act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports,' approved the 14th July, 1832," is to be considered as having reference to the time of importation, and not to the amount of duties—consequently, goods on which the duties do not amount to $50, are to be considered to be entitled to the benefit of the 18th section of the tariff act of 14th July, 1832, provided three years from the date of their importation have not elapsed, and the other conditions, entitling them to drawback, he complied with.

I embrace the occasion to state, that palm leaves used in the manufacture of palm leaf hats, etc. copper ore, and fishing lines, made of Monilla grass, are considered to be free of duty—that shawls of silk and thibet are to pay duty as "manufactures of silk, or of which silk is a component part"—and that bodkins composed wholly or chiefly of silver, are to pay 12½ per cent. but if made of iron, steel, brass, &c. or of which either of these metals is a component material, they are to pay 25 per cent.

Respectfully,

JOS. ANDERSON, comptroller.

Treasury department, comptroller's office, March 25th, 1833.

Sir—In compliance with the request of the secretary of the treasury, the following instruction received from him, is communicated for your government, viz.

"The provision in the 14th section of the act of 14th July, 1832, intended as a substitute for that of the 4th section of the law of the 28th of May, 1830, requires the same specification in the entry, as was by the last mentioned act required in the invoice. To carry into effect the provision of that section, the form of the entry should be so framed as to refer specially to the goods enumerated in the invoice, which should be annexed thereto as a part of the entry. This will be considered as a virtual compliance with the requisition of the 5th section of the act of the 28th May 1830, requiring the invoice to be filed. Should the importer, however, prefer inserting the entire invoice in the entry, he will be at liberty so to do; but in such case the invoice must be filed as required by the act before stated." Respectfully,

JOS. ANDERSON, comptroller.

James H. McCulloch, esq.

Treasury department, comptroller's office, March 23d, 1833.

Sir—I have received your letter of the 21st inst. It appears to me that if at the time of deposition of goods after the 14th July, 1832, they were entitled to drawback, they will by the regulations of law in other respects being complied with, be entitled to the benefit of the 18th section of the tariff act of that date. Respectfully, JOSEPH ANDERSON, comptroller.

SOUTH CAROLINA CONVENTION.

This convention adjourned on Monday, the 18th inst. We have prepared a detailed notice of the proceedings, speeches, &c. but it must be postponed for the next Register. The annexed are the chief papers and acts which must be recorded:

The following was transmitted to the convention on the first day of its sitting—

Executive department, Columbia, March 11, 1833.
To James Hamilton, jr. esq. president of the convention of the people of South Carolina.

SIR—I herewith transmit you a letter which I have received from the hon. Benjamin Watkins Leigh, commissioner from the state of Virginia, which, together with the correspondence in relation to Mr. Leigh's mission, and the resolutions of Virginia, of which he is the bearer, you are requested to lay before the assembly over which you preside. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT Y. HAYNE.
Columbia, March 11.

SIR—Having at our first interview, presented to you the resolutions of the general assembly of Virginia of the 26th January last, on the subject of federal relations, I have now to request your excellency to lay these resolutions before the convention of the people of South Carolina, which, at my instance, has been re-assembled for the purpose of considering them.

The general assembly of Virginia has expressed in its own language, its sentiments concerning the unhappy controversy between the state of S. Carolina and the federal government, and its motives, its views and object, in making this intercession. In these respects, therefore, the commissioner it has thought proper to depute to S. Carolina, can have nothing to add, and nothing even to explain. The duty presented to him is simple and precise. He is instructed to communicate the preamble and resolutions to the proper authorities of this state, and "to give to them such direction as in his judgment may be best calculated to promote the objects which the legislature of Virginia has in view;" and this part of his duty he has already, by the prompt and cordial compliance of those authorities, had the happiness to accomplish, to the entire satisfaction (as he has reason to believe) of the legislature of Virginia. And he is further instructed and "authorised to express to the public authorities and people of this our sister state, the sincere good will of the legislature and people of Virginia towards their sister state, and their anxious solicitude that the kind and respectful representations they have addressed to her, may lead to an accommodation of the differences between this state and the general government."

Virginia is animated with an ardent and devoted attachment to the union of the states, and to the rights of the several states, that compose the union: and if similarity of situation and of interests naturally induce her to sympathise, with peculiar sensibility, in whatever affects the prosperity and happiness of South Carolina and the other southern states, she knows how to reconcile this sentiment with her affection and duty towards each and every other state, severally, and towards the United States. She is most solicitous to maintain and preserve our present institutions, which, though they partake of imperfections, from which no human institutions can ever be exempt, and notwithstanding some instances of mal-administration or error to which all governments are liable, are yet, as she confidently believes, the happiest frame of polity that is now or ever has been enjoyed by any people—to maintain and preserve the whole, and every part of these institutions, in full vigor and purity; to uphold the union and the states; to maintain the federal government in all its just powers, administered according to the pure principles of the constitution, without the least departure from the limitations prescribed by the compact, fairly understood, and the state governments in all their rights and authority, as absolutely necessary to the good government and happiness of their respective citizens. Consolidation and disunion are alike abhorrent from her affections and her judgment, the one involving, at the least, a forfeiture of the manifold advantages and blessings so long and so generally felt and acknowledged to have been derived from the union; and the other having an apparent, perhaps inevitable tendency to military despotism. And she is apprehensive—for reasons too obvious to need particular mention—that in case any differences between the federal government and the states, shall ever be brought to the arbitrament of force, the result, let it be what it may, must effect such a change in our existing institutions as cannot but be evil, since it would be a change from those forms of government which we have experienced to be good, and under which we have certainly been, in the main, free, prosperous, connected and happy. Therefore, in the present controversy between the federal government and the state of South Carolina; she deprecates any resort to force by either, and is sanguine in the hope, that, with proper moderation and forbearance on both sides, this controversy may be adjusted, (as all our controversies hitherto have been) by the influence of truth, reason and justice.

Virginia remembering the history of South Carolina, her services in war and peace, and her contributions of virtue and intelligence to the common councils of the union, and knowing well the generosity, the magnanimity, and the loyalty of her character, entertained the most perfect confidence that these sentiments so cherished by herself, would find a response in the heart and understanding of every citizen of this state. And that confidence induced her intercession on the present occasion. She has not presumed to dictate, or even to advise. She has addressed her entreaty to the congress of the United States, to redress the grievance of which South Carolina complains. And she has spoken to South Carolina also, as one sovereign state, as one state of this union, ought to speak to another. She has earnestly, affectionately, and respectfully, requested and entreated South Carolina, "to rescind or suspend her late ordinance, and to await the result of a combined and strenuous effort of the friends of union and peace, to effect an adjustment and conciliation of all public differences now unhappily existing." She well hoped, that this state "would listen willingly and respectfully to her voice;" for she knew and felt that South Carolina could not descend from the dignity, and would not compromise the rights of her sovereignty, by yielding to the intercession of a sister state.

If, therefore, no other considerations could have been presented to the convention of the people of South Carolina, if no other motives for compliance could have been suggested than the intercession of Virginia, offered in the temper and manner it has been, and the interest we all have in the union, the common attachment we feel for our tried republican institutions, the aversion from civil discord and commotion, and the wise and just dread of change of which no sagacity can foresee the consequences—it might have been hoped and expected, that the convention would rescind, or at least suspend for a time, the late ordinance.

But, in truth, the convention comes now to a consideration of this subject, under a state of circumstances, not anticipated by Virginia when she interposed her good offices to promote a peaceable adjustment of the controversy between this state and the federal government. There has been made that "combined and strenuous effort of the friends of peace and union, to effect an adjustment and conciliation" of this controversy, the result of which South Carolina was requested and expected to await—and that effort, it is hoped, will prove successful. The recent act of congress, "to modify the act of the 14th July, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties on imports," is such a modification of the tariff laws as (I trust) will leave little room for hesitation on the part of the convention of the people of South Carolina, as to the wisdom and propriety of rescinding its ordinance.

Forbearing, therefore, to enter at large into the many and forcible considerations of justice and policy, which, independently of this measure of congress, might, I humbly conceive, have sufficed to induce the convention to suspend, if not to rescind the ordinance, I shall rest in the hope, that the wisdom of the convention will adopt, at once, the course which the dignity and patriotism of South Carolina, her attachment to the union, so constantly expressed, and manifested by her deeds, her duty to herself and towards her sister states, and (I hope I may add without presumption) her respect for the intercession of Virginia, shall dictate to be proper; and that that course will lead to a renewal of perfect harmony.

Sensible as I am, how little any effort of mine has or could have contributed to the result I now anticipate, I shall be well content with the honor of having been the bearer of the resolutions of Virginia, and of a favorable answer to them—happy in being the humblest instrument of such a work.

I have the honor to be, with profound respect, your most obedient servant,
B. W. LEIGH.
To his excellency Robert Y. Hayne, governor of South Carolina.

Columbia, March 12, 1833.

SIR—The convention of the people of South Carolina met yesterday, in pursuance of the proclamation of the president of that body. As it had been reassembled at my instance, for the purpose of considering the resolutions of the general assembly of Virginia, on the subject of the controversy between this state and the federal government, I addressed a letter to governor Hayne, requesting him to communicate those resolutions to the convention, and indicating, in general terms, the reasons that induced this intercession on the part of Virginia, the right in which her interposition was to be regarded, and the grounds on which a compliance with her request, that the ordinance of the convention, passed at its former session, should be rescinded or suspended, was wished and expected. The actual state of things, produced by the recent measures of congress, rendered it unnecessary, in my judgment, to exhibit, at large, the various considerations of justice and policy, which, without regard to those measures, might have sufficed to recommend the course proposed by Virginia, to the good sense and patriotism of the convention; and enabled me to avoid many topics of peculiar delicacy, which a regular discussion of the subject would have involved. The governor transmitted my letter to the convention, together with the former correspondence between us, (which has already been communicated to you), and the resolutions of the general assembly of Virginia. I herewith enclose you a copy of my letter to him, and of his letter to the president of the convention, (Nos. 1 and 2).

The whole subject was forthwith referred to a committee of twenty-one members. It was expected, that the committee would make a report, in part at least, this morning; and I delayed this letter, in the hope of being able to give you the substance of the report: but on the meeting of the convention, the chairman informed the house, that the committee proposed to present three several views of the subject. 1st. In reference to the recent act of congress modifying the tariff; 2d. To the mediation of Virginia, and 3d. To the other act of congress, called the coercion law; and that a report upon one of these topics might be expected to-morrow. I have no doubt, that the convention will rescind its ordinance. I have the honor to be with the highest respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

B. W. LEIGH.

To his excellency, John Floyd, governor of Virginia.

The several reports, resolutions and ordinances inserted below, were all adopted by very large majorities. Particulars hereafter.

Report of the committee on the mediation of Virginia.

The committee to whom was referred the resolutions of the general assembly of Virginia, and the communication of Mr. Leigh to the governor of the state of South Carolina, beg leave to

REPORT:

That although circumstances have supervened since the institution of this commission on the part of the highly respected commonwealth from which it proceeds, which have enabled this convention to accomplish the object which her assembly so anxiously and patriotically had in view, we are nevertheless sensible of the friendly dispositions of her good offices at a moment when S. Carolina, denounced by the executive of the federal government, and threatened with an extremity of its vengeance, stood absolutely alone in the contest she was waging for the rights of the states and the constitutional liberties of the country.

To this interference and these friendly dispositions, S. C. desires to respond to a sister sovereign, and independent commonwealth, in a tone of candor, confidence and affection. Appreciating thus sensibly, both the motives and objects which influenced the general assembly of Virginia, to despatch, at a moment so interesting, her commissioner to this state, whose mission, even if the recent modification of the tariff had not been adopted, would have challenged her high respect and profound consideration, she cannot permit the occasion thus offered to pass without making a few declarations which she regards as due to herself and the public liberty of the country.

In the first place, S. C. desires to stand acquitted, and believes on a calm and dispassionate reflection by her co-states, she must stand acquitted of the charge of having acted with any undue precipitation in the controversy hitherto pending with the federal government. For ten years, she petitioned, protested, and remonstrated against that system of unjust and unconstitutional legislation which had equally received the reprobation of Virginia before she resorted to her veto to forbid its enforcement within her limits. In exercising this faculty of her sovereignty, she believed she rested on those doctrines which in 1798 and 1799 had conferred on Virginia and her distinguished statesmen, a renown so unfading. She now refers to this subject in no invidious spirit of controversy, but when Virginia asserted in those memorable resolutions of her general assembly, "that she viewed the powers of the federal government as resulting from the compact to which the states are parties as limited by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact, as no further valid than they are authorised by the grants enumerated in that compact, and that in case of a deliberate, palpable and dangerous exercise of other powers, not granted by the said compact, the states who are parties thereto have the right, and are in duty bound to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining within their respective limits the authorities, rights, and liberties appertaining to them," we conceived she has done nothing more or less than announce the remedy which S. C. has resorted to, through her state interposition. It is moreover asserted in the report explanatory of those resolutions, and that by this right is a constitutional, and not a revolutionary right, and by the whole context of the powerful argument embraced in that report, the right itself stands forth as separate and independent of the ordinary remedies of procuring a redress for the ordinary abuses of the federative government.

When therefore the general assembly of Virginia, in the recent resolutions, borne by her commissioner, which your committee are now considering, declares "that she does not regard the resolutions of 1798 and 99 as sanctioning the proceeding of S. C. as indices in the ordinance of her convention," with all the proper deference S. C. must nevertheless adhere with an honest and abiding confidence to her own construction. It is within the Providence of God that great truths should be independent of the human agents that propagate them. Once announced, they become the subjects and property of reason, to all men and in all time to come. Nor will S. C. feel less confidence in the conservative character of her remedy, which she believes to be in perfect harmony with a true exposition of the doctrines of the resolutions of 1798, by the recent testimony afforded of its efficacy in a pacific accommodation of the late controversy with the federal government, although that government has attempted to destroy the authority and efficiency of this remedy, by the contemporary passage of an act perpetrating a worse and more aggravated outrage on the constitution which has again demanded the interposition of this convention.

With this brief justification of the principles of South Carolina, your committee take leave of the subject, assuring the ancient and distinguished commonwealth, whose mission has been borne by her commissioner, with an ability, temper and affection entirely corresponding with her own dispositions, that in the struggles for liberty and right which we apprehend from the antagonist principles now fearfully at work, between those who support a limited and economical system of government, and those who favor a consolidated and extravagant one, which the states in a minority are destined to wage, she will find in S. C. a faithful and devoted ally in accomplishing the great work of freedom and union. If she cannot say, with Virginia, that consolidation and disunion are equivalent evils, because she believes with their own Jefferson, that consolidation is the greatest of all political curses to which our federative form of government can have any possible tendency, she nevertheless affirms, and challenges the production of any event in her history to disprove the declaration, that she is devoted to the union of these states, on the very terms and conditions of that compact out of which the union had its origin, and for these principles she is prepared to peril at all times and under all circumstances the lives and fortunes of her people.

Your committee conclude by recommending the adoption of the following resolutions.

Resolved, That the president of this convention do communicate to the governor of Virginia, with a copy of this report and these resolutions, our distinguished sense of the patriotic and friendly motives which actuated her general assembly in tendering her mediation in the late controversy between the general government and the state of S. Carolina, with the assurance that her friendly counsels will at all times command our respectful consideration.

Resolved, That the president of this convention likewise convey to the governor of Virginia, our high appreciation of the able and conciliatory manner in which Mr. Leigh has conducted his mission, during which he has afforded the most gratifying satisfaction to all parties, in sustaining towards us the kind and fraternal relations of his own state.

Mr. Hamilton's resolution.

Resolved, That whilst this convention as an offering to the peace and harmony of this union, in a just regard to the interposition of the highly patriotic commonwealth of Virginia, and with a proper deference to the united vote of the whole southern states in favor of the recent accommodation of the tariff, has made the late modification of the tariff approved by act of congress of the 2d March, 1833, the basis of the repeal of her ordinance of the 24th November, 1832—yet this convention owes it to itself, to the people they represent and the posterity of that people, to declare that they do not, by reason of said repeal, acquiesce in the principle of the substantive power existing on the part of congress to protect domestic manufactures: and hence on the final adjustment, in 1842, of the reductions, under the act of 2d March, 1833, or at any previous period should odious discriminations be instituted for the purpose of continuing in force the protective principle, S. Carolina will feel herself free to resist such a violation of what she conceives to be the good faith of the act of the 2d March, 1833, by the interposition of her sovereignty, or in any other mode she may deem proper.

Mr. Smith's resolution.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this convention that the military preparations heretofore begun by the state should be continued, and that effectual measures should be adopted and completed, for putting the state in a firm attitude of defence.

Report on the force bill.

The committee to whom was referred the act of the congress of the United States, entitled "an act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports," beg leave to

REPORT:

That they have, so far as time would allow, considered the act with such attention, as the importance of the matters contained in it would seem to require. At the present moment, when a question, which has long divided and perplexed the country, has been adjusted, on terms calculated to quiet agitation and restore harmony, it would have been a matter of peculiar gratification to be able to indulge, without restraint the feelings which such adjustment was calculated to excite. But your committee regret to say, that at the moment of returning peace, the most serious and alarming cause of dissatisfaction has been afforded by the act under consideration. Your committee do most solemnly believe that the principles sought to be established by the act, are calculated, when carried into practice, to destroy our constitutional frame of government, to subvert the public liberty, and to bring about the utter ruin and debasement of the southern states of this confederacy.

The general purpose of the whole act, though not expressed in the terms of it, is perfectly well known to have been to counteract and render inefficacious an act of this state, adopted in her sovereign capacity, for the protection of her reserved rights. Believing, as we most fully do, that the power attempted to be exercised by the state, is among the reserved powers of the states, and that it may be exercised consistently with the constitution of the United States, an opinion formed by the good people of this state, upon the fullest and most careful consideration, and expressed through their delegates in convention, your committee must, on that ground alone, have been convinced that the purpose of counteracting that act, and the means by which it is sought to be counteracted, are unauthorised by the constitution. We think that this will become more apparent by attending to the leading provisions of the act of congress.

The act gives to the president of the United States, for a limited time, an almost unlimited power of control over the commerce of the whole U. States; though certainly the power was only contemplated to be exercised against that of South Carolina.

It exempts property in the hands of the officer of the revenue, alleged to be detained for enforcing the payment of the duties, from liability to the process of the state courts.

It exempts a class of persons residing within the state—officers of the United States, and persons employed by them or acting under their direction, or any other person professing to act in execution of the revenue laws—from all responsibility to the state laws or state tribunals, from any crime or wrong, when it is alleged that the act was done in execution of the revenue laws, or under color thereof.

It gives to the same class of persons the right to seek redress for any alleged injury whatever, either to person or property, however foreign to the proper subjects of the jurisdiction, in the courts of the United States; provided the injury be received in consequence of any act done in execution of the revenue laws.

It directly supposes all the courts of the state to be inferior and subordinate to those of the United States, and provides for rendering them so, by directing to them the writ of certiorari superseding their jurisdiction.

It affects to limit and controul the jurisdiction of the courts of the state; providing for the removal of causes from their cognizance; declaring their judgments void, and providing for the discharge of persons confined under their process.

It tyrannically provides for rendering persons liable to punishment for acts done by them in execution of the laws of the state and the process of its courts, to which they are bound to yield obedience, and which they are compelled, under the highest sanctions, to enforce.

It not only provides for the punishment of persons thus acting by the civil tribunals, but authorises the employment of military force, under color of executing the laws of the United States, to resist the execution of the laws of the state; superseding with the quick execution of the sword, the slower process of courts.

The act authorises the confinement of persons in unusual places; which can only mean on board ships; in which persons from the most remote parts of the state may be confined.

The committee believe that all these positions are distinctly sustained by the act in question. By the constitution of the U. States, the power to regulate commerce, is given to congress. It is an important portion of the legislative power, and as legislative power, is incapable of delegation. Congress has, however, in effect, delegated to the president, the power to abolish, at his discretion, any port of the United States, or interrupt or destroy its commerce. This may easily be effected, under the authority to remove the custom house to any port or harbor within the collection district, by fixing it at inconvenient or inaccessible places. To say nothing of the unusual and tremendous character of this power, which New-York or Philadelphia might perhaps apprehend, if there were any expectation of its being exercised with respect to them, and the enormous abuse to which it is liable, does the constitution contemplate or authorise, the delegation of this discretion to an individual? If it were exercised, it would be a plain violation of that part of the constitution which directs that in regulations of commerce, no preference shall be given to the ports of one state over those of another. The same inequality is occasioned by directing the payment of cash duties. It is vain to say that this has been rendered necessary by the act of the state, and without it, the collection of the revenue would be impracticable. Whatever latitude may be allowed in the selection of means necessary and proper to carry into effect the granted powers of congress, we believe no one has yet imagined, that a plain provision of the constitution may be violated, as a means of carrying into effect a power granted by another provision. Although we may concede the power of congress for sufficient cause and in good faith, to abolish one port of entry and establish another, yet we of course cannot concede that it may delegate this power, or that the sovereign act of the state, for the vindication of her reserved rights, constitutes sufficient cause, or that this act has been done in good faith.

The provisions of the act, that all property in the hands of any officer or other person, detained under any revenue law, shall be subject only to the orders and decrees of the courts of the U. States, plainly enacts that it shall not be subject to any process, order or decree, of the courts of the state. We have heretofore been accustomed to regard our superior courts as having jurisdiction over all persons and all property within the limits of the state. This jurisdiction is of course superseded, whenever any other court of concurrent jurisdiction has possession or custody of any cause or any property. But that a ministerial, executive officer, or that property in his hands, should be exempted from the jurisdiction and authority of state courts, we believe to be unprecedented in our legislation, and without any shadow of constitutional authority. One of the most extraordinary and exceptionable provisions of the act, appears to be that authorising the removal, previous to trial, of suits or prosecutions from the state courts, upon affidavit made, and a certificate of the opinion of some counselor or attorney to the same effect, that the suit or prosecution was for or on account of any act done under the revenue laws of the United States, or under color thereof, or for or on account of any right, authority or title, set up or claimed by any officer or other person, under any such law of the United States. If there be any violation of the law of the state, if there be a wrong done to person or property within the limits of the state, have not the courts of the state jurisdiction of that matter? By what authority does the congress of the United States limit that jurisdiction? What shadow of constitutional provision is there to sanction this most flagrant usurpation? True such a violation of the law of the state may sometimes be justified as being done in execution of a constitutional law of the United States; but this is a matter of defence, and to be tried as every other defence is to be tried, and can have no effect in ousting the jurisdiction or in giving to the courts of the United States original jurisdiction of offences against the state laws. So any person is authorised to bring suit in the courts of the United States for any injury to person or property, for or on account of any act done in execution of the revenue laws. The constitution gives to the courts of the United States jurisdiction of all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution and laws of the United States. An assault on the person or trespass to property is a violation of the laws of the state. Can it make a difference that a violation of the state law was provoked by an act done under color of executing the law of the United States? The protection of persons and property has heretofore been supposed the province of the states. In assuming to itself this new function, the federal government indicates most clearly its tendency to engross all power and controul all state authority.

It is plain, likewise, from the various provisions of the act, that such suits are intended to be allowed against persons acting in execution of the process of the state courts. Judgments of those courts are declared to be void, and persons and property exempted from their jurisdiction.

It is not only our law, but part of the law of the civilized world, that the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is valid until it be reversed by a competent authority. The judgment of a superior court of general jurisdiction, can never be void for want of jurisdiction. When there are courts of concurrent jurisdiction, that which obtains possession of the cause is entitled to retain it; its process must be respected, and all other jurisdiction is excluded. It is true that the judgments of courts of limited jurisdiction, (and such are the courts of the United States, and so they themselves have determined), are void, if the jurisdiction be transcended. This distinction would seem to determine whether sovereignty is to be attributed to the state or to the federal authority. Hitherto, it has never occurred to any one to doubt that an officer, acting in execution of the process of a court of general jurisdiction, and all persons acting under his direction, are exempted from all responsibility for that act. He is bound, under the highest sanction, to execute that process; and shall he be punished for performing his duty?

If this act were submitted to, the entire administration of the criminal justice of the state might be interrupted, and it is not too much to say, that the state governments would be rendered impracticable. The worst criminal—one stained with the guilt of murder—upon making an affidavit, which no such criminal would hesitate to make, and procuring a certificate, which any criminal might easily procure, would be able to elude the criminal justice of the state. His cause must be removed to the federal court; and when upon his trial it shall appear that his act was not done in execution of the law of the United States, your committee do not perceive what other consequence can follow, than that he must be acquitted and go with impunity.

Having taken this view of the provisions of the act in question, the committee would submit to the solemn consideration and determination of this convention, whether they do not effect an entire change in the character of our constitution, and will not, when carried into practice, abolish every vestige of liberty, and render this an absolute, consolidated government, without limitation of powers. It has been truly said if these things may be done, the most solemn acts of the highest authorities of the state may be regarded as the unauthorised proceedings of individuals; the courts of justice may be shut up; the legislature dispersed, as a lawless mob, and we, ourselves, representing, as we vainly believe, the sovereignty of the state, called to answer for what we have said and done on this floor, at the bar of a circuit court of the United States. Is this an exaggerated picture? Let us examine it a little more closely. If these provisions may be made to enforce the execution of the revenue laws of the United States, they may be made to enforce any other act which congress shall think proper to pass. No matter how oppressive, how clearly unconstitutional, there is no power in the constituted authorities of the state to resist it. If one class of cases may be removed from the jurisdiction of the state courts, any other class, subject to the discretion of congress, may be likewise removed. If the process of the courts be void, and the officer executing it, and those acting under his direction, responsible civilly or punishable criminally, the judge who directed the process must be answerable in like manner. He was equally without authority, and having commanded the act, is a partaker of the guilt. The legislature who commanded the act of the judge, and the convention of the people, in obedience to whose mandate every thing was done, must have the same participation. If the sheriff and his posse, obstructing the execution of the revenue laws, may constitute that unlawful combination and assemblage, on being notified of which the president is authorised to use the military force of the United States to disperse them, then the courts, the legislature or the convention, in obedience to whose authority alone the sheriff acts, and who are the efficient causes of the obstruction, are assemblages of similar character, and may be dispersed by military force. The whole purpose of the act is to confound the acts of the constituted authorities of the state, however solemn and well considered, with the lawless and irregular acts of individuals or mobs. The certain effect of it must be, to restrain the states from the exercise of any other authority than such as congress, or the sectional majority represented in congress, shall think fit to permit them to exercise, and to insure the enforcement of every law which that majority may think proper to enact. It involves the cruelty and absurdity of making the community, and the individuals of the community, punishable for their acts in obedience to the laws of their government; an obedience from which they cannot exempt themselves unless they absolve themselves from their allegiance by self-banishment.

That the object of many of the politicians who supported this bill—the politicians of that majority in whose hands all power will be—is to establish a consolidated government, is now hardly or at all disguised. The chimera of a government partly consolidated, partly federative, is now scarcely contended for. The same class of politicians have always had in view the same object.

It was attempted to be effected in the convention which framed the constitution of the United States. The attempt was there foiled. After the formation of the government, those who affected consolidation, assumed the term "federal," and denied that the opinions held by them, led to that result. The possession of power, however, developed their views, and the first marked indication of their disposition to engross the powers of the states and meddle with their internal concerns, was afforded by the alien and sedition laws. This attempt was so strongly rebuked by public opinion which led to the change of the administration in 1800, that the hopes of consolidation seemed abandoned forever. They remained dormant, until revived by the agitations springing out of our late protecting system. It was perceived that nothing less strong than a consolidated government could sustain that system of iniquity. Gradually we have been told that the states have parted with a portion of their sovereignty; then, that they were never sovereign; until at length, availing themselves of the excitement of a particular crisis, and passion for power, and the influence of an individual, the act before us has been passed, sweeping away every vestige of state sovereignty and reserved rights, or causing them to be held at the mercy of the majority, compared to which the alien and sedition laws sink into measures harmless and insignificant.

And what is it to the southern states, to be subjected to a consolidated government? These states constitute a minority and are likely to do so forever. They differ in institutions and modes of industry, from the states of the majority, and have different and in some degree incompatible interests. It is to be governed, not with reference to their own interests or according to their own habits and feelings, but with reference to the interests and according to the prejudices of their rulers, the majority. It has been truly said that the protecting system constitutes but a small part of our controversy with the federal government. Unless we can obtain the recognition of some effectual constitutional check on the usurpation of power, which can only be derived from the sovereignty of the states, and their right to interpose for the preservation of their reserved powers, we shall experience oppression more cruel and revolting than this.

While there remains within the states any spirit of liberty, prompting them to repel federal usurpations, one of the most obvious means to break that spirit and reduce the state to subjection, will be that which has been attempted by the act before us. It will be to create or to sustain by the patronage of government or other means, a party within the state, devoted to federal power, exempted from responsibility to the state authorities, and having power to harass and degrade the state authorities by means of the tribunals of the United States. Thus will be created a government within a government, with all the consequences which experience informs us are likely to arise from that state of things, and such as did arise from the independent ecclesiastical jurisdictions established within the governments of Europe. The federal governments will interfere with every department of the state governments; it will influence elections; it will raise up and put down parties, as they shall be more servile to its will. Pretext for interference will never be wanting. Already has it been said that ours is no longer a republican government, because the state in vindicating its sovereignty has refused to entrust with any portion of its authority, those who deny or refuse to recognise that sovereignty. Other classes of individuals might be found within the state whom it might suit the majority to suppose disfranchised in derogation of true republican principles, and to require their interference and protection. This interference will be practised at first with moderation, and with some apparent respect for the rights of the state. Gradually, as the power of the government shall be established, and the southern states become weakened and less capable of resistance, the shew of moderation will be thrown off. Thus the peace of those states will be embroiled; their prosperity interrupted, their character degraded, until in the natural progress of things, your committee think it not too strong to say, that they will be more miserable, more utterly enslaved; more thoroughly debased, than any provinces that have ever been rendered subject by the sword.

In alluding to the oath which the state has heretofore thought proper to exact of its citizens, and to one somewhat similar, which the committee propose to recommend, they think proper to disclaim, as they do most solemnly disclaim, on behalf of themselves and the convention, that this or any other measure which the convention has adopted, has been adopted upon mere party views; to secure party ascendancy, or gratify party resentment. They appeal to God, that their only object has been to vindicate their rights and liberties, and the common liberties of the whole south. This object they have pursued in singleness of purpose; though exposed to much obloquy—threatened with much danger, and discountenanced by those from whom they had a right to expect support. They have never sought to endanger this union; but to perpetuate it by rendering it compatible with, and a security for liberty.

The firmness of the state seems, at length, in some degree, to have triumphed. But let it be recollected that the moment of triumph is commonly one of danger. Let it be kept in mind, that this is not a contest ended, but a contest not more than begun, and not to be determined till this act shall cease to disgrace the statute book. Let this contest be carried on firmly, steadily, without passion and without faltering. If the vigilance of the state should relax, if it should cease to raise up barriers against the head of usurpation, which threatens to overwhelm us—the torrent will break loose, and sweep our liberties along with it. Let every man consider this his own peculiar business. If liberty be saved, every thing is saved; if liberty be lost, every thing is lost.

As the provisions of the act have reference only to certain acts of the people and legislature of this state, which have been suspended by the late modifications of the tariff, it could not have been contemplated that it should have any immediate operation. And your committee doubted whether, regarding it as merely a menace, they should recommend any action upon it, or only that the sentiments of the convention should be expressed in regard to the principles it contains. But most of its provisions are made permanent, and may be put in practice on some future occasion. The committee cannot doubt that it expresses the true principles of many of those who voted for it, and who will seek occasion to reduce them to practice. As a precedent it is most dangerous. The vote on the very act, shows how little is to be expected from a majority. It is incumbent on South Carolina, unsupported as she is, to take care that no federal authority unauthorised by our federal compact, shall be exercised within the limits of the state, until a returning sense of justice, and constitutional obligation in the majority, shall afford hope of a government content to confine its action to its proper objects. For the purpose of providing that the act shall never have operation or effect within the limits of the state, the committee beg leave to report the following

ORDINANCE.

We the people of the state of South Carolina, in convention assembled, do declare and ordain that the act of the congress of the United States, entitled "an act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports," approved the 2d day of March, 1833, is unauthorised by the constitution of the U. States, subversive of that constitution, and destructive of public liberty, and that the same is and shall be deemed null and void within the limits of this state: and it shall be the duty of the legislature, at such time as they may deem expedient, to adopt such measures and pass such acts as may be necessary to prevent the enforcement thereof, and to inflict proper penalties on any person who shall do any act in execution or enforcement of the same within the limits of this state.

We further ordain, that no person who shall be hereafter elected or appointed, or who has heretofore been elected but has not yet taken the oaths of office required at the time of his election or appointment to any office civil or military within this state, (members of the legislature alone excepted) shall enter on the execution of such office or be in any respect competent to discharge the duties thereof, until he shall have taken in addition to the oaths of office now required, at the same time and in the same manner that such oaths are required to be taken, the following oath of allegiance. "I declare myself a citizen of the free and sovereign state of South Carolina; I declare that my allegiance is due to the said state; and hereby renounce and abjure all other allegiance incompatible therewith; and I will be true and faithful to the said state, so long as I continue a citizen thereof; so help me God."

And it is further ordained that if any officer heretofore elected or hereafter to be elected, shall refuse or neglect to take the aforesaid oath, within the time that other oaths of office are required by law to be taken, such office shall be considered vacant; and the governor of the state shall proceed (except in the instance of judges of the state) to fill such vacancy by appointing an officer, to serve until another officer shall be elected and duly qualified.

AN ORDINANCE

To nullify an act of the congress of the United States, entitled "an act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports," commonly called the force bill.

We, the people of the state of South Carolina in convention assembled, do declare and ordain that the act of the congress of the United States, entitled "an act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports," approved the 2d day of March, 1833, is unauthorised by the constitution of the United States, subversive of that constitution, and destructive of public liberty, and that the same is and shall be deemed null and void within the limits of this state; and it shall be the duty of the legislature, at such time as they may deem expedient, to adopt such measures and pass such acts as may be necessary to prevent the enforcement thereof, and to inflict proper penalties on any person who shall do any act in execution or enforcement of the same within the limits of this state.

We do further ordain and declare, that the allegiance of the citizens of this state, while they continue such, is due to the said state, and that obedience only, and not allegiance, is due by them to any other power or authority, to whom a control over them has been, or may be delegated by the state; and the general assembly of the said state is hereby empowered, from time to time, when they may deem it proper, to provide for the administration to the citizens and officers of the state, or such of the said officers as they may think fit, of suitable oaths or affirmations; binding them to the observance of such allegiance, and abjuring all other allegiance; and, also, to define what shall amount to a violation of their allegiance, and to provide the proper punishment for such violation.

Done at Columbia, the eighteenth day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, and in the fifty-seventh year of the sovereignty and independence of the United States of America.

 ISAAC W. HAYNE, clerk.

SPEECH OF MR. CLAY,

In the senate of the United States, February 25, 1833, in vindication of his bill, entitled "an act to modify the act of the 14th July, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties on imports."

The bill to modify the tariff being under consideration—

Mr. Clay rose, in reply to Mr. Webster, and said: Being anxious, Mr. President, that this bill should pass, and pass this day, I will abridge as much as I can the observations which I am called upon to make. I have long, with pleasure and pride, co-operated in the public service with the senator from Massachusetts; and I have found him faithful, enlightened, and patriotic. I have not a particle of doubt as to the pure and elevated motives which actuate him. Under these circumstances, it gives me deep and lasting regret to find myself compelled to differ from him as to a measure involving vital interests, and perhaps the safety of the union. On the other hand, I derive great consolation from finding myself, on this occasion, in the midst of friends with whom I have long acted, in peace and in war, and especially with the honorable senator from Maine, [Mr. Holmes] with whom I had the happiness to unite in a memorable instance. It was in this very chamber, that senator presiding in the committee of the senate, and I in the committee of twenty-four of the house of representatives, on a Sabbath day, that the terms were adjusted, by which the compromise was effected of the Missouri question. Then the dark clouds that hung over our beloved country were dispersed; and now the thunders from north not less threatening, and which have been longer accumulating, will, I hope, roll over us harmless and without injury.

The senator from Massachusetts objects to the bill under consideration on various grounds. He argues that it imposes unjustifiable restraints on the power of future legislation; that it abandons the protective policy; and that the details of the bill are practically defective. He does not object to the gradual, but very inconsiderable, reduction of duties which is made prior to 1842. To that he could not object; because it is a species of prospective provision, as he admits, in conformity with numerous precedents on our statute book. He does not object so much to the state of the proposed law prior to 1842, during a period of nine years; but, throwing himself forward to the termination of that period, he contends that congress will then find itself under inconvenient shackles, imposed by our indiscretion. In the first place, I would remark, that the bill contains no obligatory pledges; it could make none; none are attempted. The power over the subject is in the constitution; put there by those who formed it, and liable to be taken out only by an amendment of the instrument. The next congress, and every succeeding congress, will undoubtedly have the power to repeal the law whenever they may think proper. Whether they will exercise it or not, will depend upon a sound discretion, applied to the state of the whole country, and estimating fairly the consequences of the repeal, both upon the general harmony and the common interests. Then, the bill is founded in a spirit of compromise. Now, in all compromises there must be mutual concessions. The friends of free trade insist that duties should be laid in reference to revenue alone. The friends of American industry say that, another, if not, paramount, object in laying them, should be to diminish the consumption of foreign, and increase that of domestic products. On this point the parties divide, and, between these two opposite opinions, a reconciliation is to be effected, if it can be accomplished. The bill assumes, as a basis, adequate protection for nine years, and less beyond that term. The friends of protection say to their opponents, we are willing to take a lease of nine years, with the long chapter of accidents beyond that period, including the chance of war, the restoration of concord, and along with it a conviction, common to all, of the utility of protection; and, in consideration of it, if, in 1842, none of these contingencies shall have been realised, we are willing to submit, as long as congress may think proper, to a maximum rate of 20 per cent. with the power of discrimination below it, cash duties, home valuations, and a liberal list of free articles, for the benefit of the manufacturing interest. To these conditions, the opponents of protection are ready to accede. The measure is what it professes to be, a compromise; but it imposes and could impose no restriction upon the will or power of a future congress. Doubtless great respect will be paid, as it ought to be paid, to the serious condition of the country that has prompted the passage of this bill. Any future congress that might disturb this adjustment would act under a high responsibility, but it would be entirely within its competency to repeal, if it thought proper, the whole bill.

It is far from the object of those who support this bill, to abandon or surrender the policy of protecting American industry. Its protection or encouragement may be accomplished in various ways. 1st. By bounties, as far as they are within the constitutional power of congress to offer them. 2d. By prohibitions, totally excluding the foreign rival article. 3d. By high duties, without regard to the aggregate amount of revenue which they produce. 4th. By discriminating duties, so adjusted as to limit the revenue to the economical wants of government. And 5thly. By the admission of the raw material, and articles essential to manufactures, free of duty. To which may be added cash duties, home valuations, and the regulation of auctions. A perfect system of protection would comprehend most, if not all these modes of affording it. There might be, at this time, a prohibition of certain articles, (ardent spirits and coarse cottons, for example), to public advantage. If there were not inveterate prejudices and conflicting opinions prevailing, (and what statesman can totally disregard impediments of that character?) such a compound system might be established.

Now, Mr. President, before the assertion is made that the bill surrenders the protective policy, gentlemen should understand perfectly what it does not, as well as what it does, propose. It impairs no power of congress over the whole subject; it contains no promise or pledge whatever, express or implied, as to bounties, prohibitions, or auctions; it does not touch the power of congress in regard to them, and congress is perfectly free to exercise that power at any time; it expressly procures discriminating duties within a prescribed limit; it provides for cash duties and home valuations; and it secures a free list, embracing numerous articles, some of high importance to the manufacturing arts. Of all the modes of protection which I have enumerated, it affects only the third; that is to say, the imposition of high duties, producing a revenue beyond the wants of government. The senator from Massachusetts contends that the policy of protection was settled in 1816, and that it has ever since been maintained. Sir, it was settled long before 1816. It is coeval with the present constitution, and it will continue, under some of its various aspects, during the existence of the government. No nation can exist, no nation, perhaps, ever existed, without protection, in some form, and to some extent, being applied to its own industry. The direct and necessary consequence of abandoning the protection of its own industry, would be to subject it to the restrictions and prohibitions of foreign powers; and no nation, for any length of time, can endure an alien legislation, in which it has no will. The discontents which prevail, and the safety of the republic, may require the modification of a specific mode of protection, but it must be preserved in some other more acceptable shape.

All that was settled in 1816, in 1824, and in 1828, was, that protection should be afforded by high duties, without regard to the amount of the revenue which they might yield. During that whole period, we had a public debt which absorbed all the surpluses beyond the ordinary wants of government. Between 1816 and 1824, the revenue was liable to the great fluctuations, vibrating between the extremes of about nineteen and thirty-six millions of dollars. If there were more revenue, more debt was paid; if less, a smaller amount was reimbursed. Such was sometimes the deficiency of the revenue, that it became necessary, to the ordinary expenses of government, to trench upon the ten millions annually set apart, as a sinking fund, to extinguish the public debt. If the public debt remained undischarged, or we had any other proper and practical mode of appropriating the surplus revenue, the form of protection, by high duties, might be continued without public detriment. It is the payment of the public debt, then, and the arrest of internal improvements by the exercise of the veto, that unsettle that specific form of protection. Nobody supposes, or proposes, that we should continue to levy, by means of high duties, a large annual surplus, of which no practical use can be made, for the sake of the incidental protection which they afford. The secretary of the treasury estimates that surplus on the existing scale of duties, and with the other sources of revenue, at six millions annually. An annual accumulation, at that rate, would, in a few years, bring into the treasury the whole currency of the country, to lie there inactive and dormant.

This view of the condition of the country has impressed every public man with the necessity of some modification of the principle of protection, so far as it depends upon high duties. The senator from Massachusetts feels it, and hence, in the resolutions which he submitted, he proposes to reduce the duties, so as to limit the amount of the revenue to the wants of the government. With him, revenue is the principal, protection the subordinate object. If protection cannot be enjoyed after such a reduction of duties as he thinks ought to be made, it is not to be extended. He says specific duties, and the power of discrimination, are preserved by his resolutions. So they may be under the operation of the bill. The only difference between the two schemes is, that the bill, in the maximum which it provides, suggests a certain limit; whilst his resolutions lay down none. Below that maximum, the principle of discrimination and specific duties may be applied. The senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Dallas] who, equally with the senator from Massachusetts, is opposed to this bill, would have agreed to the bill if it had fixed thirty instead of twenty per centum; and he would have dispensed with home valuation, and come down to the revenue standard in five or six years. Now, Mr. President, I prefer, and I think the manufacturing interest will prefer, nine years of adequate protection, home valuations, and twenty per cent. to the plan of the senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. President, I want to be perfectly understood as to the motives which have prompted me to offer this measure. I repeat what I said on the introduction of it, that they are, first, to preserve the manufacturing interest, and, secondly, to quiet the country. I believe the American System to be in the greatest danger; and I believe it can be placed on a better and safer foundation at this session, than at the next. I heard, with surprise, my friend from Massachusetts say that nothing had occurred within the last six months to increase its hazard. I entreat him to review that opinion. Is it correct? Is the issue of numerous elections, including that of the highest officer of the government, nothing? Is the explicit recommendation of that officer, in his message at the opening of the session, sustained, as he is, by a recent triumphant election, nothing? Is his declaration in his proclamation, that the burdens of the south ought to be relieved, nothing? Is the introduction of a bill into the house of representatives during this session, sanctioned by the head of the treasury and the administration, prostrating the greater part of the manufactures of the country, nothing? Are the increasing discontents nothing? Is the tendency of recent events to unite the whole south, nothing? What have we not witnessed in this chamber? Friends of the administration hursting all the ties which seemed indissolubly to unite them to its chief, and, with few exceptions south of the Potomac, opposing, and vehemently opposing, a favorite measure of that administration, which three short months ago they contributed to establish! Let us not deceive ourselves. Now is the time to adjust the question in a manner satisfactory to both parties. Put it off until the next session, and the alternative may, and probably then would be a speedy and ruinous reduction of the tariff, or a civil war with the entire south.

It is well known that the majority of the dominant party is adverse to the tariff. There are many honorable exceptions, the senator from New Jersey, [Mr. Dickerson,] among them. But for the exertions of the other party, the tariff would have been long since sacrificed. Now let us look at the composition of the two branches of congress at the next session. In this body we lose three friends of the protective policy, without being sure of gaining one. Here, judging from present appearances, we shall, at the next session, be in the minority. In the house it is notorious that there is a considerable accession to the number of the dominant party. How, then, I ask, is the system to be sustained against numbers, against the whole weight of the administration, against the united south, and against the increased pending danger of civil war? There is, indeed, one contingency that might save it, but that is too uncertain to rely upon. A certain class of northern politicians, professing friendship to the tariff, have been charged with being secretly inimical to it, for political purposes. They may change their ground, and come out open and undisguised supporters of the system. They may even find in the measure which I have brought forward, a motive for their conversion. Sir, I shall rejoice in it, from whatever cause it may proceed. And if they can give greater strength and durability to the system, and at the same time quiet the discontents of its opponents, I shall rejoice still more. They shall not find me disposed to abandon it, because it has drawn succor from an unexpected quarter.

No, Mr. President, it is not destruction but preservation of the system at which we aim. If dangers now assail it, we have not created them. I have sustained it upon the strongest and clearest convictions of its expediency. They are entirely unaltered. Had others, who avow attachment to it, supported it with equal zeal and straightforwardness, it would be now free from embarrassment; but with them it has been a secondary interest. I utter no complaints—I make no reproaches. I wish only to defend myself now, as heretofore, against unjust assaults. I have been represented as the father of this system, and I am charged with an unnatural abandonment of my own offspring. I have never arrogated to myself any such intimate relation to it. I have, indeed, cherished it with parental fondness, and my affection is undiminished. But in what condition do I find this child? It is in the hands of the Philistines, who would strangle it. I fly to its rescue, to snatch it from their custody, and to place it on a bed of security and repose for nine years, where it may grow and strengthen, and become acceptable to the whole people. I behold a torch about being applied to a favorite edifice, and I would save it, if possible, before it is wrapt in flames, or at least preserve the precious furniture which it contains. I wish to see the tariff separated from the politics of the country, that business men may go to work in security, with some prospect of stability in our laws, and without every thing being staked on the issue of elections as it were on the hazards of the die.

And the other leading object which has prompted the introduction of this measure, the tranquilizing of the country, is no less important. All wise human legislation must consult in some degree the passions, and prejudices, and feelings, as well as the interests of the people. It would be vain and foolish to proceed at all times, and under all circumstances, upon the notion of absolute certainty in any system, or infallibility in any dogma, and to push these out without regard to any consequences. With us, who entertain the opinion that congress is constitutionally invested with power to protect domestic industry, it is a question of mere expediency as to the form, the degree and the time that the protection shall be afforded. In weighing all the considerations which should control and regulate the exercise of that power, we ought not to overlook what is due to those who honestly entertain opposite opinions to large masses of the community, and to deep, long cherished and growing prejudices. Perceiving, ourselves, no constitutional impediment, we have less difficulty in accommodating ourselves to the sense of the people of the United States upon this interesting subject. I do believe that a majority of them is in favor of this policy; but I am induced to believe this almost against evidence. Two states in New England, which had been in favor of the system, have recently come out against it. Other states of the north and the east have shown a remarkable indifference to its preservation. If, indeed, they have wished to preserve it, they have nevertheless placed the powers of government in hands which ordinary information must have assured them were rather a hazardous depository. With us in the west, although we are not without some direct, and considerable indirect, interest in the system, we have supported it more upon national than sectional grounds.

Meantime, the opposition of a large and respectable section of the union, stimulated by political success, has increased, and is increasing. Discontents are multiplying and assuming new and dangerous aspects. They have been cherished by the course and hopes inspired during this administration, which, at the very moment that it threatens and recommends the use of the power of the whole union, proclaims aloud the injustice of the system which it would enforce. These discontents are not limited to those who maintain the extravagant theory of nullification; they are not confined to one state; they are coextensive with the entire south, and extend even to northern states. It has been intimated by the senator from Massachusetts, that, if we legislate at this session on the tariff, we would seem to legislate under the influence of a panic. I believe, Mr. President, I am not more sensible to danger of any kind than my fellow men are generally. It, perhaps, requires as much moral courage to legislate under the imputation of a panic, as to refrain from it, lest such an imputation should be made. But he who regards the present question as being limited to South Carolina alone, takes a view of it much too contracted. There is a sympathy of feeling and interest throughout the whole south. Other southern states may differ from that as to the remedy to be now used, but all agree, (great as in my humble judgment is their error), in the substantial justice of the cause. Can there be a doubt that those who think in common will sooner or later act in concert? Events are on the wing, and hastening this co-operation. Since the commencement of this session, the most powerful southern member of the union has taken a measure which cannot fail to lead to important consequences. She has deputed one of her most distinguished citizens to request a suspension of measures of resistance. No attentive observer can doubt that the suspension will be made. Well, sir, suppose it takes place, and congress should fail at the next session to afford the redress which will be solicited, what course would every principle of honor, and every consideration of the interests of Virginia, as she understands them, exact from her? Would she not make common cause with South Carolina; and, if she did, would not the entire south eventually become parties to the contest? The rest of the union might put down the south, and reduce it to submission; but, to say nothing of the uncertainty and hazards of all war, is that a desirable state of things? Ought it not to be avoided if it can be honorably prevented? I am not one of those who think that we must rely exclusively upon moral power, and never resort to physical force. I know too well the frailties and follies of man, in his collective as well as individual character, to reject, in all possible cases, the employment of force; but I do think, that, when resorted to, especially among the members of a confederacy, it should manifestly appear to be the only remaining appeal.

But suppose the present congress terminates without any adjustment of the tariff, let us see in what condition its friends will find themselves at the next session. S. Carolina will have postponed the execution of the law passed to carry into effect her ordinance until the end of that session. All will be quiet in the south for the present. The president, in his opening message, will urge that justice, as he terms it, be done to the south, and that the burdens imposed upon it by the tariff be removed. The whole weight of the administration, the united south, and majorities of the dominant party in both branches of congress, will be found in active co-operation. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts tell me how we are to save the tariff against this united and irresistible force? They will accuse us of indifference to the preservation of the union, and of being willing to expose the country to the dangers of civil war. The fact of South Carolina postponing her ordinance, at the instance of Virginia, and once more appealing to the justice of congress, will be pressed with great emphasis and effect. It does appear to me impossible that we can prevent a most injurious modification of the tariff at the next session; and that this is the favorable moment for an equitable arrangement of it. I have been subjected to animadversion for the admission of the fact, that at the next session, our opponents will be stronger, and the friends of the American System weaker than they are in this congress. But is it not so? And is it not the duty of every man who aspires to be a statesman to look at naked facts as they really are? Must he suppress them? Ought he like children, to throw the counterpane over his eyes, and persuade himself that he is secure from danger? Are not our opponents as well informed as we are about their own strength?

If we adjourn, without any permanent settlement of the tariff, in what painful suspense and terrible uncertainty shall we not leave the manufacturers and business men of the country? All eyes will be turned, with trembling and fear, to the next session. Operations will be circumscribed, and new enterprises checked, or if otherwise, ruin and bankruptcy may be the consequence. I believe, sir, this measure, which offers a reasonable guaranty for permanency and stability, will be hailed by practical men with pleasure. The political manufacturers may be against it, but it will command the approbation of a large majority of the business manufacturers of the country.

But the objections of the honorable senator from Massachusetts are principally directed to the period beyond 1842. During the intermediate time, there is every reason to hope and believe that the bill secures adequate protection. All my information assures me of this; and it is demonstrated by the fact, that, if the measure of protection, secured prior to the 31st December, 1841, were permanent, or if the bill were even silent beyond that period, it would command the cordial and unanimous concurrence of the friends of the policy. What then divides, what alarms us? It is what may possibly be the state of things in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, or subsequently! Now, sir, even if that should be as bad as the most vivid imagination or the most eloquent tongue could depict it, if we have intermediate safety and security, it does not seem to me wise to rush upon certain and present evils, because of those which, admitting their possibility, are very remote and contingent. What! Shall we not extinguish the flame which is bursting through the roof that covers us, because, at some future and distant day, we may be again threatened with conflagration?

I do not admit that this bill abandons, or fails by its provisions, to secure reasonable protection beyond 1842. I cannot know, I pretend not to know, what will then be the actual condition of this country, and of the manufacturing arts, and their relative condition to the rest of the world. I would as soon confide in the forecast of the honorable senator from Massachusetts, as in that of any other man in this senate, or in this country; but he, nor any one else, can tell what that condition will then be. The degree of protection which will be required for domestic industry beyond 1842, depends upon the reduction of wages, the accumulation of capital, the improvement in skill, the protection of machinery, and the cheapening of the price, at home, of essential articles, such as fuel, iron, &c. I do not think that the honorable senator can throw himself forward to 1842, and tell us what, in all these particulars, will be the state of this country, and its relative state to other countries. We know that, in all human probability, our numbers will be increased by an addition of one third, at least to their present amount, and that may materially reduce wages. We have reason to believe that our capital will be augmented, our skill improved; and we know that great progress has been made, and is making, in machinery. There is a constant tendency to decrease in the price of iron and coal. The opening of new mines, and new channels of communication, must continue to lower it. The successful introduction of the process of coaking would have great effect. The price of these articles, one of the most opulent and intelligent manufacturing houses in this country assures me, is a principal cause of the present necessity of protection to the cotton interest; and that house is strongly inclined to think that 20 per cent. with the other advantages secured in this bill, may do beyond 1842.—Then, sir, what effect may not convulsions and revolutions in Europe, if any should arise, produce? I am far from desiring them, that our country may profit by their occurrence. Her greatness and glory rest, I hope, upon a more solid and more generous basis. But we cannot shut our eyes to the fact, that our greatest manufacturing, as well as commercial, competitor is undergoing a momentous political experiment, the issue of which is far from being absolutely certain. Who can raise the veil of the succeeding nine years, and show what, at their termination, will be the degree of competition which Great Britain can exercise towards us in the manufacturing arts?

Suppose, in the progress of gradual descent towards the revenue standard, for which this bill provides, it should, some years hence, become evident that further protection, beyond 1842, than that which it contemplates, may be necessary, can it be doubted that, in some form or other, it will be applied? Our misfortune has been, and yet is, that the public mind has been constantly kept in a state of feverish excitement in respect to this system of policy. Conventions, elections, congress, the public press, have been for years all acting upon the tariff, and the tariff acting upon them all. Prejudices have been excited, passions kindled, and mutual irritations carried to the highest pitch of exasperation, inasmuch that good feelings have been almost extinguished, and the voice of reason and experience silenced, among the members of the confederacy. Let us separate the tariff from the agitating politics of the country, place it upon a stable and firm foundation, and allow our enterprising countrymen to demonstrate to the whole union, by their skillful and successful labors, the inappreciable value of the arts. If they can have, what they have never yet enjoyed, some years of repose and tranquillity, they will make, silently, more converts to the policy, than would be made during a long period of anxious struggle and boisterous contention. Above all, I count upon the good effects resulting from a restoration of the harmony of this divided people, upon their good sense and their love of justice. Who can doubt, that when passions have subsided, and reason has resumed her empire, that there will be a disposition throughout the whole union to render ample justice to all its parts? Who will believe that any section of this great confederacy would look with indifference to the prostration of the interests of another section, by distant and selfish foreign nations, regardless alike of the welfare of us all? No, sir; I have no fears beyond 1842. The people of the United States are brethren, made to love and respect each other. Momentary causes may seem to alienate them, but, like family differences, they will terminate in a closer and more affectionate union than ever. And how much more estimable will be a system of protection, based on common conviction and common consent, and planted in the bosoms of all, than one wrenched by power from reluctant and protesting weakness?

That such a system will be adopted, if it should be necessary for the period of time subsequent to 1842, I will not doubt. But, in the scheme which I originally proposed, I did not rely exclusively, great as my reliance is, upon the operation of fraternal feelings, the return of reason, and a sense of justice. The scheme contained an appeal to the interests of the south. According to it, unmanufactured cotton was to be a free article after 1842. Gentlemen from that quarter have again and again asserted that they were indifferent to the duty of three cents per pound on cotton, and that they feared no foreign competition. I have thought otherwise; but I was willing, by way of experiment, to take them at their word; not that I was opposed to the protection of cotton, but believing that a few cargoes of foreign cotton introduced into our northern ports, free of duty, would hasten our southern friends to come here and ask that protection for their great staple, which is wanted in other sections for their interests. That feature in the scheme was stricken out in the select committee, but not by the consent of my friend from Delaware, [Mr. Clayton] or myself. Still, after 1842, the south may want protection for sugar, for tobacco, for Virginia coal, perhaps for cotton and other articles, whilst other quarters may need it for wool, woollens, iron and cotton fabrics; and these mutual wants, if they should exist, will lead, I hope, to some amicable adjustment of a tariff for that distant period, satisfactory to all. The theory of protection supposes, too, that, after a certain time, the protected arts will have acquired such strength and perfection as will enable them subsequently, unaided, to stand up against foreign competition. If, as I have no doubt, this should prove to be correct, it will, on the arrival of 1842, encourage all parts of the union to consent to the continuance of longer protection to the few articles which may then require it.

The bill before us strongly recommends itself by its equity and impartiality. It favors no one interest, and no one state, by an unjust sacrifice of others. It deals equally by all. Its basis is the act of July last. That act was passed after careful and thorough investigation, and long deliberation, continued through several months. Although it may not have been perfect in its adjustment of the proper measure of protection to each article which was supposed to merit it, it is not likely that, even with the same length of time before us, we could make one more perfect. Assuming the justness of that act, the bill preserves the respective propositions for which the act provides, and subjects them all to the same equal but moderate reduction, spread over the long space of nine years. The senator from Massachusetts contends that a great part of the value of all protection is given up by dispensing with specific duties and the principle of discrimination. But much the most valuable articles of our domestic manufactures (cotton and woollens, for example) have never enjoyed the advantage of specific duties. They have always been liable to ad valorem duties, with a very limited application of the minimum principle. The bill does not, however, even after 1842, surrender either mode of laying duties. Discriminations are expressly recognised below the maximum, and specific duties may also be imposed, provided they do not exceed it.

The honorable senator also contends that the bill is imperfect, and that the execution of it will be impracticable. He asks; how is the excess above 20 per cent. to be ascertained on coarse and printed cottons, liable to minimums of 30 and 35 cents, and subject to a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem; and how is it to be estimated in the case of specific duties? Sir, it is very probable that the bill is not perfect, but I do not believe that there is any thing impracticable in its execution. Much will, however, depend upon the head of the treasury department. In the instance of the cotton minimums, the statute having, by way of exception to the general ad valorem rule, declared, in certain cases, how the value shall be estimated, that statutory value ought to govern; and consequently the 20 per cent. should be exclusively deducted from the 25 per cent. being the rate of duties to which cottons generally are liable; and the biennial tenths should be subtracted from the excess of five per cent. With regard to specific duties, it will, perhaps, be competent to the secretary of the treasury, in the execution of the law, for the sake of certainty, to adopt some average value founded upon importations of a previous year. But if the value of each cargo, and every part of it, is to be ascertained, it would be no more than what now is the operation in the case of woollens, silks, cottons above 30 and 35 cents, and a variety of other articles; and consequently there would be no impracticability in the law.

To all defects, however, real or imaginary, which may be supposed will arise in the execution of the principles of the bill, I oppose one conclusive, and, I hope, satisfactory answer. Congress will be in session one whole month before the commencement of the law; and if, in the mean time, omissions calling for further legislation shall be discovered, there will be more time than we have now to supply them. Let us, on this occasion of compromise, pursue the example of our fathers, who, under the influence of the same spirit, in the adoption of the constitution of the United States, determined to ratify it, and go for amendments afterwards.

To the argument of the senator from Massachusetts, that this interest, and that and the other cannot be sustained under the protection beyond 1842, I repeat the answer that no one can now tell what may then be necessary. That period will provide for itself. But I was surprised to hear my friend singling out iron as an article that would be most injuriously affected by the operation of this bill. If am not greatly mistaken in my recollection, he opposed and voted against the act of 1824, because of the high duty imposed on iron. But for that duty, (and perhaps the duty on hemp), which he then considered threw an unreasonable burden upon the navigation of the country, he would have supported that act. Of all the articles to which protecting duties are applied, iron, and the manufactures of iron, enjoy the highest protection. During the term of nine years, the deductions from the duty are not such as seriously to impair those great interests, unless all my information deceives me; and beyond that period the remedy has been already indicated. Let me suppose that the anticipations which I form upon the restoration of concord and confidence shall be all falsified; that neither the sense of fraternal affection nor common justice, nor even common interests, will lead to an amicable adjustment of the tariff beyond 1842. Let me suppose that period has arrived, and that the provisions of the bill shall be interpreted as an obligatory pledge upon the congress of that day; and let me suppose also that a greater amount of protection than the bill provides is absolutely necessary to some interests, what is to be done? Regarded as a pledge, it does not bind congress for ever to adhere to the specific rate of duty contained in the bill. The most, in that view, that it exacts, is to make a fair experiment. If, after such experiment, it should be demonstrated that, under such an arrangement of the tariff, the interests of large portions of the union would be sacrificed, and they exposed to ruin, congress will be competent to apply some remedy that will be effectual; and I hope and believe that, in such a contingency, some will be devised that may preserve the harmony and perpetuate the blessings of the union.

It has been alleged that there will be an augmentation, instead of a diminution of revenue, under the operation of this bill. I feel quite confident of the reverse; but it is sufficient to say that both contingencies are carefully provided for in the bill, without affecting the protected article.

The gentleman from Massachusetts dislikes the measure, because it commands the concurrence of those who have been hitherto opposed, in regard to the tariff; and is approved by the the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Calhoun] as well as by myself. Why, sir, the gentleman has told us that he is not opposed to any compromise. Will he be pleased to say how any compromise can be effected, without a concurrence between those who had been previously divided, and taking some medium between the two extremes? The wider the division may have been, so much the better for the compromise, which ought to be judged of by its nature and by its terms, and not solely by those who happen to vote for it. It is an adjustment to which both the great interests in this country may accede without either being dishonored. The triumph of neither is complete. Each, for the sake of peace, harmony, and union, makes some concessions. The south has contended that every vestige of protection should be eradicated from the statute book, and the revenue standard forthwith adopted. In assenting to this bill, it waives that pretension—yields to reasonable protection for nine years; and consents, in consideration of the maximum of twenty per cent. to be subsequently applied, to discriminations below it, cash duties, home valuations, and a long list of free articles. The north and west have contended for the practical application of the principle of protection, regulated by no other limit than the necessary wants of the country. If they accede to this adjustment, they agree, in consideration of the stability and certainty which nine years' duration of a favorite system of policy affords, and of the other advantages which have been enumerated, to come down in 1842 to a limit not exceeding twenty per cent. Both parties, animated by a desire to avert the evils which might flow from carrying out into all their consequences the cherished system of either, have met upon common ground, made mutual and friendly concessions, and I trust, and sincerely believe, that neither will have hereafter occasion to regret, as neither can justly reproach the other with what may be now done.

This, or some other measure of conciliation, is now more than ever necessary, since the passage, through the senate, of the enforcing bill. To that bill, if I had been present, on the final vote, I should have given my assent, although with great reluctance. I believe this government not only possessed of the constitutional power, but to be bound, by every consideration, to maintain the authority of the laws. But I deeply regretted the necessity which seemed to me to require the passage of such a bill. And I was far from being without serious apprehensions as to the consequences to which it might lead. I felt no new born zeal in favor of the present administration, of which I now think as I have always thought. I could not vote against the measure;

I would not speak in its behalf. I thought it most proper in me to leave to the friends of the administration and to others, who might feel themselves particularly called upon, to defend and sustain a strong measure of the administration. With respect to the series of acts to which the executive has resorted, in relation to our southern disturbance, this is not a fit occasion to enter upon a full consideration of them; but I will briefly say, that, although the proclamation is a paper of uncommon ability and eloquence, doing great credit, as a composition, to him who prepared it, and to him who signed it, I think it contains some ultra doctrines, which no party in this country had ventured to assert. With these are mixed up many sound principles and just views of our political systems. If it is to be judged by its effects upon those to whom it was more immediately addressed, it must be admitted to have been ill-timed and unfortunate. Instead of allaying the excitement which prevailed, it increased the exasperation in the infected district, and afforded new and unnecessary causes of discontent and dissatisfaction in the south generally. The message, subsequently transmitted to congress, communicating the proceedings of South Carolina, and calling for countervailing enactments, was characterised with more prudence and moderation. And, if this unhappy contest is to continue, I sincerely hope that the future conduct of the administration may be governed by wise and cautious counsels, and a parental forbearance. But when the highest degree of animosity exists; when both parties, however unequal, have arrayed themselves for the conflict, who can tell when, by the indiscretion of subordinates, or other unforced causes, the bloody struggle may commence? In the midst of imaginations, who knows when the fatal spark may produce a terrible explosion? And the battle once begun, where is its limit? What latitude will circumscribe its rage? Who is to command our armies? When and where, and how, is the war to cease? In what condition will the peace leave the American System, the American union, and, what is more than all, American liberty? I cannot profess to have a confidence, which I have not, in this administration; but if I had all confidence in it, I should still wish to pause, and, if possible, by any honorable adjustment, to prevent awful consequences, the extent of which no human wisdom can foresee.

It appears to me then, Mr. President, that we ought not to content ourselves with passing the enforcing bill only. Both that and the bill of peace seem to me to be required for the good of our country. The first will satisfy all who love order and law, and disapprove the inadmissible doctrine of nullification. The last will soothe those who love peace and concord, harmony and union. One demonstrates the power and the disposition to vindicate the authority and supremacy of the laws of the union; the other offers that which, if it be accepted in the fraternal spirit in which it is tendered, will supersede the necessity of the employment of all force.

There are some who say let the tariff go down; let our manufactures be prostrated, if such be the pleasure, at another session, of those to whose hands the government of this country is confided; let bankruptcy and ruin be spread over the land; and let resistance to the laws, at all hazards, be subdued. Sir, they take counsel from their passions. They anticipate a terrible reaction from the downfall of the tariff, which would ultimately re-establish it upon a firmer basis than ever. But it is these very agitations, these mutual irritations between brethren of the same family, it is the individual distress and general ruin that would necessarily follow the overthrow of the tariff, that ought, if possible, to be prevented. Besides, are we certain of this reaction? Have we not been disappointed in it as to other measures heretofore? But suppose, after a long and embittered struggle, it should come, in what relative condition would it find the parts of this confederacy? In what state our ruined manufactures? When they should be laid low, who, amidst the fragments of the general wreck, scattered over the face of the land, would have courage to engage in fresh enterprises, under a new pledge of the violated faith of the government? If we adjourn, then, without passing this bill, having entrusted the executive with vast powers to maintain the laws, should he be able by the next session to put down all opposition to them, will he not, as a necessary consequence of success, have more power than ever to put down the tariff also? Has he not said that the south is oppressed, and its burdens ought to be relieved? And will he not feel himself bound, after he shall have triumphed, if triumph he may in a civil war, to appease the discontents of the south by a modification of the tariff, in conformity with its wishes and demands? No, sir; no, sir; let us save the country from the most dreadful of all calamities, and let us save its industry, too, from threatened destruction. Statesmen should regulate their conduct and adapt their measures to the exigencies of the times in which they live. They cannot, indeed, transcend the limits of the constitutional rule; but, with respect to those systems of policy which fall within its scope, they should arrange them according to the interests, the wants, and the prejudices of the people. Two great dangers threaten the public safety. The true patriot will not stop to inquire how they have been brought about, but will fly to the deliverance of his country. The difference between the friends and the foes of the compromise, under consideration, is, that they would, in the enforcing act, send forth alone a flaming sword. We would send out that also, but along with it the olive branch, as a messenger of peace. They cry out, the law! the law! the law! Power! power! power! We, too, reverence the law, and bow to the supremacy of its obligation; but we are in favor of the law executed in mildness, and of power tempered with mercy. They, as we think, would hazard a civil commotion, beginning in South Carolina and extending God only knows where. While we would vindicate the authority of the federal government, we are for peace, if possible, union and liberty. We want no war, above all, no civil war, no family strife. We want to see no sacked cities, no desolated fields, no smoking ruins, no streams of American blood shed by American arms!

I have been accused of ambition in presenting this measure. Ambition! inordinate ambition! If I had thought of myself only, I should have never brought it forward. I know well the perils to which I expose myself; the risk of alienating faithful and valued friends, with but little prospect of making new ones, if any new ones could compensate for the loss of those whom we have long tried and loved; and the honest misconceptions both of friends and foes. Ambition! If I had listened to its soft and seducing whispers; if I had yielded myself to the dictates of a cold, calculating, and prudential policy, I would have stood still and unmoved. I might even have silently gazed on the raging storm, enjoyed its loudest thunders, and left those who are charged with the care of the vessel of state to conduct it as they could. I have been heretofore often unjustly accused of ambition. Low, grovelling souls, who are utterly incapable of elevating themselves to the higher and nobler duties of pure patriotism—beings, who, forever keeping their own selfish aims in view, decide all public measures by their presumed influence on their aggrandizement, judge me by the venal rule which they prescribe to themselves. I have given to the winds these false accusations, as I consign that which now impeaches my motives. I have no desire for office, not even the highest. The most exalted is but a prison, in which the incarcerated inmate daily receives his cold heartless visitants, marks his weary hours, and is cut off from the practical enjoyment of all the blessings of genuine freedom. I am no candidate for any office in the gift of the people of these states, united or separated; I never wish, never expect to be. Pass this bill, tranquillise the country, restore confidence and affection in the union, and I am willing to go home to Ashland, and renounce public service forever. I should there find, in its groves, under its shades, on its lawns, amidst my flocks and herds, in the bosom of my family, sincerity and truth, attachment and fidelity, and gratitude, which I have not always found in the walks of public life.—Yes, I have ambition, but it is the ambition of being the humble instrument, in the hands of Providence, to reconcile a divided people, once more to revive concord and harmony in a distracted land—the pleasing ambition of contemplating the glorious spectacle of a free, united, prosperous and fraternal people!

Note by the editors of the National Intelligencer. This is the only sketch of any thing said by Mr. C. and published by us during the late session, which has undergone his correction. It embraces not only what he said in reply to Mr. Webster, but several observations made by him on other occasions during the progress of the bill.

REMARKS OF MR. DAVIS, OF MASS.

On the amendment proposed by Mr. Letcher to the bill for altering and modifying the tariff. Delivered in the house of representatives, Feb. 25, 1833.

Mr. Speaker: I am greatly surprised at the sudden movement made in this house. One short hour ago, we were collecting our papers, and putting on our outside garments to go home, when the gentleman from Kentucky rose, and proposed to send this bill to a committee of the whole on the state of the union, with instructions to strike it all out, and insert, by way of amendment, an entire new bill, formed upon entirely different principles; yes, to insert, I believe, the bill which the senate now have under consideration. This motion was carried—the business has passed through the hands of the committee—is now in the house, and there is a cry of question, question, around me, upon the engrossment of the bill. Who that was not a party to this arrangement, could one hour ago have credited this? We have, I believe, been laboriously engaged for eight weeks upon this topic, discussing and amending the bill which has been before the house. Such obstacles and difficulties have been met at every move, that, I believe, very little hope has of late been entertained of the passage of any bill. But a gleam of light has suddenly burst upon us—those that groped in the dark seem suddenly to see their course—those that halted, doubted, hesitated, are in a moment made firm—and even some of those that have made an immediate abandonment of the protective system a sine qua non of their approbation of any legislation, seem almost to favor this measure. I am obliged to acknowledge that gentlemen have sprung the proposition upon us at a moment when I did not expect it. And as the measure is one of great interest to the people of the United States, I must, even at this late hour, when I know the house is both hungry and impatient, and when I perceive, distinctly, it is their pleasure to vote rather than debate, beg their indulgence for a few minutes, while I state some of the reasons which impose on me the duty of opposing the passage of this act. [Cries from different parts of the house, "go on, go on, we will hear."] I

Mr. Speaker, I do not approve of hasty legislation under any circumstances, but it is especially to be deprecated in matters of great importance. That this is a measure of great importance, affecting, more or less, the entire population of the United States, will not be denied, and ought, therefore, to be matured with care, and well understood by every gentleman who votes upon it. And yet, sir, a copy has, for the first time, been laid upon our tables, since I rose to address you—and this is the first opportunity we have had even to read it. I hope others feel well prepared to act in this precipitate manner; but I am obliged to acknowledge I do not; for I hold even the best of intentions will not, in legislation, excuse the errors of haste.

I am aware that this measure assumes an imposing attitude. It is called a bill of compromise—a measure of harmony—of conciliation—a measure to heal disaffection—and to save the union. Sir, I am aware of the imposing effect of these bland titles—men love to be thought generous, noble, magnanimous—but they ought to be equally anxious to acquire the reputation of being just. While they are anxious to compose difficulties in one direction, I entreat them not to oppress and wrong the people in another. In their efforts to save the union, I hope their zeal will not go so far as to create stronger and better founded discontents, than those they compose. Peace makers, mediators, men who ally excitements and tranquillise public feeling, should above all considerations, study to do it by means not offensive to the contending parties, by means which will not inflict a deeper wound than the one which is healed. Sir, what is demanded by those that threaten the integrity of the union? An abandonment of the American System; a formal renunciation of the right to protect American industry. This is the language of the nullification convention; they declare they regard the abandonment of the principle, as vastly more important than any other matter; they look to that and not to an abatement of duties without it; and the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Decks), with his usual frankness, told us this morning it was not a question of dollars and cents; the money they regarded not, but they required a change of policy. They demand the pound of flesh, with the unyielding obstinacy of Shylock, and they require this house to apply the knife nearest to the heart—and shall it be cut away? Is it patriotic? Is it harmonising public feeling? is it saving the union to drain out the life blood? What is this bill? I will not say it goes at once to such extremities, but it seems to me to contain a principle which works an unqualified abandonment of the protective policy, unless changes greater than we have a right to look for shall take place in our condition.

It proposes to descend, by a reduction once in two years of two-tenths of the excess of duties, over and above twenty per cent. for nearly eight years. It then proposes to divide the residue of such excess into two equal parts, and to remove the whole in two years, so that all duties on all imports, will be run down to a level of 20 per cent. ad valorem, in between nine and ten years. The first part of the descent may be termed gradual; but in the last two years, the strides are, I fear, decidedly too long to be met by any preparation for them. Our course, then, is down hill during this time, wearing out the American System, and when we arrive at the foot, we pass out from under the protection of that parental benefactor, and place ourselves under the guardianship of the Carolina system—I say from the American to the Carolina system, because duties which are now below 20 per cent. are to be raised to that amount, and all free articles, with the exception of an unimportant list of dye stuffs, are to be subjected to duties. Duties are, therefore, at the end of our declivitous course, to fall on all imported merchandise at an equal rate of twenty per cent. This is the Carolina system.

What will be the effect of this bill? The protection will be diminished from year to year. This will check the operations of capital—it will I fear stop investments, if it does not crush that enterprising, valuable class of young men who have entered upon business, relying upon their industry and capacity to carry them forward. They are in debt, and I fear timid creditors may fall upon them. Business then will be brought to a stand at any rate, and if bankruptcies ensue, will be diminished. This is precisely what some interested in manufacturing are selfish enough to desire, for they have money—wages will be cheaper, if a portion of the mills cease to run, and no new ones are erected, and the capitalists will by this means, in the end, gain more by a diminution in the competition in business, and the reduction in wages, than they will lose by the reduction in duties. But, sir, this is a policy founded in such naked selfishness—it is built up so manifestly at the expense of those who have small capital, and of the laborers—it is so hostile to the first principles of protection which invite the free investment of capital from all quarters—that goods may be made cheap by the competition, and the public be thus benefited—that no friend of American labor can give it his approbation on that ground. It may answer for a time the purposes of a few, if it operates as they anticipate; but should this prove so, it will be an unanswerable argument with the public for disapproving of it, for the causes which will make the measure valuable to some, will make it injurious to the public.

Again, sir, I can vote for no bill which abandons protection: I think this does. It adopts the Carolina system for equalizing duties, by bringing them all to 20 per cent. It abandons the exercise of all right to discriminate, and in that, give me leave to say, abandons common sense, for the system of equalization has never to my knowledge, until now, found an advocate among financiers or political economists. It is, however, a very cunningly devised plan, and worthy of its origin, (Gallatin in the free trade report), for it contains a sweet poison that will destroy the last remnant of protection. Who ever heard of so absurd a system as equalizing duties? What impose the same duties on ardent spirits as upon tea and coffee? But why do the free traders desire an equalization? Why do they insist that the duty on hats, on shoes and boots, on leather, on scythes, hoes and axes, shall be reduced to 20 per cent.? Why do they at the same time insist that there shall be a duty of 20 per cent. on tea and coffee, pepper, spices, fruits, and a thousand other things which we do not, and never shall produce, and which are now free of duty? It is to level all protection with the dust. They start with the proposition that the public debt is paid, that we have too much revenue, and it must be reduced. We have always contended, not that the revenue shall not be reduced, for we are not the advocates of an accumulating surplus, but that it shall be reduced by letting goods in free, or by diminishing the amount of duty when the whole cannot be spared, and that this principle shall be applied to merchandise not produced in this country, that our labor may have the benefit of the revenue as a protection. While we contend that the revenue shall be levied in this manner, the free traders insist that nothing shall be free—and that the duty on all shall be alike. The revenue, say they, is too abundant, and must be reduced. The bill before us, as reported by the committee of ways and means, is for that purpose. What a happy mode of reducing the revenue, to diminish the duty on hats, shoes, boots, leather, axes, &c. from 30 per cent. and more, to 20 per cent. when the articles are so entirely produced here, under the present protection, that none are imported, and no revenue is realised. Is not the direct and obvious effect of such a reduction, an experiment, to see if the foreign articles cannot be introduced and the revenue increased instead of diminished? It is a still more singular mode of reducing revenue to restore the duties on articles which are free. Sir, the farmers, the mechanics, the manufacturers cannot be blind to such an insidious scheme. They will not fail to discover that the reductions of duty on a vast variety of articles produced wholly in this country are made under a false pretence of reducing the revenue; and that the restoration of duties to free articles is also made under the delusive pretence of making taxes more equal. It will not escape their observation that this crafty plan of reducing revenue is apparently devised for the purpose of overstocking the treasury, and creating a surplus from year to year, so as to call for further and further reductions, till you come, as the politicians of South Carolina declare you shall, to twelve and a half per cent. Is it not plain that an equalization gives the least protection which the industry can possibly have, unless you make the duties on articles which we do not produce, higher than you rate them on such as we do produce? When you have arrived at twenty per cent. if there is a surplus, you have, I believe, the right to discriminate below that; but of what value is such a right? Twenty per cent. ad valorem upon the foreign coat—what is that? Go to the officers of the custom house in New York, who witness the daily frauds and impositions of importers. Go to the head of that establishment who it is said declared openly in this city, it was a rail road for legalised smuggling, and inquire what a twenty per cent. ad valorem duty, or any other ad valorem duty is? And if they tell you the truth, it will be, that it is whatever the importer chooses to give it.

This bill, after we have made our descent facilis descensus Avernus, carries us into the free trade system, which may be summed up under three heads.

1. All specific duties are abolished, and all duties are to be ad valorem; all free traders, and especially the Yorkshire men and Lancashire men of England, have always earnestly contended for this. For what reason, it is difficult to imagine, unless it is because frauds are perpetrated with greater facility.

2. All duties are to be equal, and to be assessed upon all imports, except a few articles of little importance, and consequently the discriminating principle is abandoned.

3. The gradual reduction which is professedly made to reduce revenue, is applied to all articles; as well those on which no revenue is raised, as those which produce revenue; thus tending by every reduction to bring the American producer into greater peril at every step. If this be not a total, unqualified abandonment of the protective policy, unless 20 per cent. is protective, then I know not what is an abandonment. The bill, it is true, provides that after we come to the 20 per cent. ad valorem, the duty is to be assessed on the valuation in the home market. About the meaning of this, however, there is already a dispute. The south say it means the price of the goods by the duties and charges; that is, it means the foreign cost; and a distinguished gentleman declared in debate distinctly, that he supported the bill upon that exposition of its meaning. If this be a true interpretation, the provision is worth nothing. That valuation is to be regulated by law, according to the terms of the bill, and what that regulation will prove to be, no one can foresee.

Sir, I regret that discontent and signs of violence have manifested themselves in this country; but I am not disposed to meet it with a faint heart, or to flatter for a moment in support of the union and constitution. I would face these disturbers of the public tranquillity on their own ground, and accede to the general proposition that the revenue shall be reduced to the demands of the government; but the amount of expenditure shall be fixed by congress, and not by South Carolina; and the revenue should be raised in such a manner as to give the most efficient protection to American labor. For one, sir, while I would do South Carolina justice, ample justice, I would not destroy the union by attempting to save it. I would not bring the power of congress and the constitution into contempt, by establishing a precedent, that a little knot of unscrupulous, discontented politicians can, by threatening to dissolve the union, make the government itself bow down, humble itself in the dust, abandon its policy, and promise in future to give no offence. If these are the terms on which the union exists, if this government holds and exercises its powers upon such contingencies as these, I was about to say, the sooner the union is at an end the better; for the rude breath of treason will dissolve it at any moment. But, sir, whether South Carolina is well or ill pleased, whether she declares herself in our out of the union, I am not prepared on any compromise, to give up the protective policy; and I do contend, that an equalization of duties as low, or lower than 20 per cent. protection, are incompatible. Yes, when you surrender the right to discriminate, you surrender all.

This is a bill to tranquillise feeling—to harmonise jarring opinions—it is oil poured into inflamed wounds—it is to definitively settle the matters of complaint. What assurance have we of that? Have those who threaten the union accepted it? Has any one risen here in his place and announced his satisfaction and his determination to abide by it? Not a word has been uttered, nor any sign or assurance of satisfaction given. Suppose they should vote for the bill, what then? They voted for the bill of July last, and that was a bill passed expressly to save the union; but did they not flout at it? Did they not spurn it with contempt? And did not South Carolina, in derision of that compromise, nullify the law? This is a practical illustration of the exercise of a philanthropic spirit of condescension to save the union. Your folly and your imbecility was treated as a jest. It has already been said that this law will be no more binding than any other; and may be altered and modified at pleasure by any subsequent legislature. In what sense, then, is it a compromise? Does not a compromise imply an adjustment on terms of agreement? Suppose, then, that South Carolina should abide by the compromise while she supposes it beneficial to the tariff states, and injurious to her; and when that period shall close, the friends of protection shall then propose to re-establish the system. What honorable man, who votes for this bill, could sustain such a measure? Would not South Carolina say, you have no right to change this law—it was founded on compromise—you have had the benefit of your side of the bargain, and now I demand mine. Who could answer such a declaration? If, under such circumstances you were to proceed to abolish the law, would not South Carolina have much more just cause of complaint and disaffection than she now has?

It has been said, we ought to legislate now, because the next congress will be hostile to the tariff. I am aware that such a sentiment has been industriously circulated, and we have been exhorted to escape from the hands of that body as from a lion. But, sir, who knows the sentiments of that body on this question? Do you, or does any one, possess any information which justifies him in asserting that it is more unfriendly than this house? There is, in my opinion, little known about this matter. But suppose the members shall prove as ferocious towards the tariff as those who profess to know their opinions represent, will the passage of this bill stop their action? Can you tie their hands? Give what pledges you please, make what bargains you may, and that body will act its pleasure about respecting them. If you fall short of their wishes in wringing upon the tariff, they will not stay their hand; but all attempts to limit their power by abiding compromises, will be considered by them as a stimulus to act upon the subject, that they may manifest their disapprobation. It seems to me, therefore, that if the next congress is to be feared, we are pursuing the right course to rouse their jealousy and exert them to action.

Mr. Speaker, I rose to express my views on this very important question, I regret to say, without the slightest preparation, as it is drawn before us at a very unexpected moment. But, as some things in this bill are at variance with the principles of public policy which I have uniformly maintained, I could not suffer it to pass into a law, without stating such objections as have hastily occurred to me.

Let me, however, before sitting down, be understood on one point. I do not object to a reasonable adjustment of the controversies which exist. I have said repeatedly on this floor, that I would go for a gradual reduction on protected articles; but it must be very gradual, so that no violence shall be done to business; for all reduction is necessarily full of hazard. My objections to this bill are not so much against the first seven years; for I would take the consequences of that experiment, if the provisions beyond that were not of that fatal character which will at once stop all enterprise. But I do object to a compromise which destines the east for the altar. No victim, in my judgment, is required—none is necessary; and yet you propose to bind us, hand and foot, to pour out our blood upon the altar, and sacrifice us as a burnt offering, to appease the unnatural and unfounded discontent of the south—a discontent, I fear, having deeper root than the tariff, and will continue when that is forgotten. I am far from meaning to use the language of menace, when I say, such a compromise cannot endure; nor can any adjustment endure which disregards the interests, and sports with the rights of a large portion of the people of the United States. It has been said, that we shall never reach the lowest point of reduction, before the country will become satisfied of the folly of the experiment, and will restore the protective policy; and it seems to me a large number in this body act under the influence of that opinion. But I cannot vote down my principles, on the ground that some one may come after me who will vote them up.

Mr. Speaker, I have done my duty, in an imperfect manner, I confess; but I perceive it is in vain to discuss the matter, and I will detain the house no longer.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 6—VOL. VIII. BALTIMORE, APRIL 6, 1833. [VOL. XLIV. WHOLE No. 1,124

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

⚡—Much matter prepared for the present sheet has been postponed—because of the wish, so far as it was practical, to give full views of several important subjects presented in this number. We incur the want of variety, in an earnest subserviency to usefulness—believing that the last will “wear the best.”

⚡—Having given, as we believe, all the leading reports, resolutions and ordinances adopted at the late meeting of the South Carolina convention, we now insert what may be considered a journal of the proceedings of that body, with brief sketches of several of the speeches delivered—some of which have since been filled up, and are published at length; but whether we shall give them in extenso, remains a subject for future consideration. At present, we cannot—without laying aside other matters of more important interest. We are mainly indebted to the Charleston “Mercury” for this journal—but certain parts are derived from the “Courier” and “Gazette.” We have desired to state every thing with strict impartiality, and expended considerable labor to collect and arrange the proceedings.

⚡—We present what may be deemed a pretty full account of the present state of feeling in the government and people of Great Britain, in relation to negro slavery, in the West Indies. It is a matter of no small importance to the people of the United States—a little more so, we think, than the tariff. There is every prospect of a speedy, and, as we think, a rash emancipation of the slaves. The effects are in the “womb of time.” We apprehend a season of horrors. But “revolutions never go backwards”—“reform” will have its “perfect work;” and the people of England relieve themselves of the two millions of pounds sterling which they annually pay, in extra duties, even on British East India sugars, for the “protection” of slavery in the West Indies.

The present duty on sugar imported into Great Britain and Ireland is as follows—

If the product of any British possession in America £1 7 0 cwt.
If the product of any British possession in the East

Indies	1 17 0 “
If the product of any other place	3 3 0 “

Thus 10s. per cwt. or two cents and an eighth per lb. are paid by British consumers that slave labor in the British West Indies may be “protected” against British capital and free labor in the East Indies, in addition to the extra cost of freights, &c.

We are informed that the West India interest in London has become so odious to the people at large, as almost to constitute a caste without the pale of respectable society.

⚡—A long and interesting account is inserted concerning the Irish suppression bill, reported in the British house of lords—being a liberal synopsis of the bill itself, with the speeches of earl Grey, the duke of Wellington, and others, in that house—and sketches of a debate in the house of commons, on the same subject, and also a letter from Mr. D. O’Connell, &c. All which are for present use, and may become important for future reference—because of events which seem about to happen.

⚡—The following paragraphs concerning the mails were omitted last week—but we still think they ought to be inserted “by way of memorandum.” Great allowances, surely, should be made for the late wretched state of the roads, and the excessive weight of the mails—though believing that many of the delays have happened through imperfect arrangements or a want of proper exertions: but we are suffering by the blunders or carelessness, or criminal conduct, of some of the deputy postmasters even in our own neighborhood, as it were, for which we cannot frame any sort of excuse. Take the two following cases, by which we have just lost two valuable subscribers, and, as they personally stated, because of the uncertainty of the mails.

One, a resident at or near Allstan’s, Maryland—said, though there were two mails a week to that office, he was often two or three weeks without receiving a REGISTER; and that, since last fall, about one-half of the numbers issued never reached him.

The other, at Morgantown, Virginia, was supplied as irregularly as the gentleman at Allstan’s—but was more fortunate in ultimately receiving about two-thirds of his papers!

To both, two or three REGISTERS sometimes came by a single mail.

If any change has been made in the packing of this paper, it is for its better security; yet the “time has been” when it was carried, for fifteen years, to persons resident 4 or 500 miles from Baltimore, with the loss of not more than a single number in all that time—as several have informed us when asking for a missing paper.

Innumerable complaints are made about the failure of the mails. Indeed, the concerns of the post office department are wretchedly managed—as every thinking man feared they would be, when party politics were suffered to have influence over the appointment of deputy postmasters, and in the selection of mail-contractors. We asked that these might be spared from the “reforms” proposed, three or four years ago—that capability and fidelity should be cherished, in this interesting and delicate and important branch of the public service. The delay of the mails is not the only grievance; the safety of them has been much impaired; and we would hope that future reforms in the department may be strictly confined to persons who ignorantly or dishonestly violate their duties, or are, otherwise, incapable of performing them as they ought.*

The bulletin of the “New York Gazette” has been ornamented with an engraving of a snail, having its head and body nearly out of the shell, and the motto, “not in.” The “New Orleans Bulletin” has headed its frequent paragraphs on the state of the mails, with the figure of a mud turtle; and the North Carolina “People’s Press,” with the effigy of a cow, and the inscription, “a mile an hour.” The “Cleveland Advertiser” represents the business of the post office department by the figure of a mad bull—hoping that the bull may “be taken by the horns.” The “New York Journal of Commerce” has had many evidences of the velocity of the mails, and advertises whole mails as “strayed or stolen.” The “Standard” happily notices the arrival of the Washington papers in four days. Such complaints are general. The following, however, is the best practical comment that we have seen on this grievance:

From the Journal of Commerce, March 23.

No small surprise was experienced here yesterday, in consequence of an order from the secretary of the treasury, directing that the payment of certain debentures on woolens, &c. should be suspended, and the documents in the cases transmitted to Washington. Many a man may thank the tardy mails for allowing him to pocket his money before the mail was opened. It is said that the amount of debentures has been so very great, that a little time is desirable to recruit finances.

News from Washington has been several times received at Charleston, via New York; and we are sometimes indebted to New York papers for news from Charleston.

“Dorothy” writes to the editors of the “National Intelligencer,” and, among other things, says—

“I hope you will do all you can to keep up the tariff, so that the post officers may be able to sell off all their old horses that are alive, and buy new ones that will go three miles an hour, and then my letters will go in a week. I would far rather pay a little more for my tea and coffee and flannels, than have my love letters spoil by the way.”

OUR CITIES. New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore are doing a great “spring business”—and each is filled with strangers. It is worthy of remark, and we are told, that the rule will apply with hardly a solitary exception, that every description of merchandise on which the duties have been diminished, has increased in price! This little stubborn fact, in practice—is humbly recommended to the consideration of the book-making and speech-making "philosophers." Let them assign reasons why goods have always decreased in price as "protection" was augmented—and advanced in price as "protection" was withdrawn. There is something very odd in all this—in the theory of the "free traders"—though easily reconciled by practical men who know the effects of scarcity and supply, and of a highly excited competition or the want of one—or even of an apprehension that such competition may be, or will be, flattened. The British manufacturers of political economy, and British manufacturers of wool, cotton and iron,* notwithstanding both manufacture "FOR EXPORTATION," act upon principles as much opposed as the poles—though with a common object, which is to make money in their dealings with "outlandish" foreigners. We may more clearly see how these things are "worked" soon after the monopoly of the English East India company has ceased; and what shall then be seen, WILL BE FELT. But quoniam Deus, &c. "NONS VERRONS!" There will be a "crisis"—though not of Mr. Ritchie's manufacture.

*But since this hope was expressed, we notice the dismissal of certain most worthy postmasters, in addition to a number of valuable men recently discharged—and, from what we see in some of the “by authority” papers, it appears that the principle of rewards and punishments is to be “entirely” carried out.

§3—THE SUPPLEMENT TO VOL. 43. We are hastening the publication of this very valuable collection of papers and speeches—a synopsis of which was given in the REGISTER of the 16th ult. page 37. As it will "make" a great deal more matter than was originally calculated, because of the debate on Mr. Calhoun's resolutions, &c. (which includes the able reply of Mr. C. to the great speech of Mr. Webster on the "enforcing bill," and the rejoinder of the latter, with the speeches of other gentlemen on the general subject), the cost of the supplement will be much enhanced, and we regret the small number of copies which are printing—believing that they will fall short of the public demand; for, though our object was not to make money on this collection, we, surely, did not intend to lose any—with no small amount of editorial labor in the bargain. It appears probable that, after all present orders and demands for this supplement are supplied, there may remain from 400 to 500 surplus copies; and if any of these shall be on hand, unordered, after the 1st of next month, (May), the price of them will be one dollar and an half, instead of one dollar, only, as originally proposed. Gentlemen, therefore, who are desirous of securing a copy, will do well to send in their orders immediately; in all convenient cases, enclosing payment. When five copies are ordered, the postage will be paid by the editor, a good 5 dollar note being transmitted—but, in other cases, orders must be forwarded free of expense to this office; and in return, the supplement will soon be carefully packed, and sent by the mails.

The occasion is here apt to observe, that some blockheads, recently appointed postmasters, have undertaken to call the REGISTER a "pamphlet," and charge postage accordingly. That question was settled by the postmaster general, Gideon Granger, in 1812.† The law no more prescribes the form of a newspaper than it establishes the color of a man's eyes, or the length of one's nose; and, as the REGISTER contains more news than any weekly newspaper published in the United States, the lowest rate of postage can only be legally charged upon it.

WHEAT. Among the articles imported by the ship Ajax, at New York from Liverpool, are 3,820 bushels of wheat.

§3—This wheat paid 15 per cent duty at New York—had it been sent from New York to Liverpool, it would have been liable to a duty of about 75 per cent. ad valorem. And this is "free trade!"

UNITED STATES' BANK STOCK. We are happy to state, that last week was a sad one, in Wall street, New York! The black-leg dealers had contracted for the delivery of a large number of shares in the stock of the bank of the United States, at the small advance of two or three dollars above par—but the shares steadily and firmly advanced to 110 & 111 dollars, though worthy gentlemen had manufactured all sorts of calumnies, and resorted to many honest contrivances, to prevent it—and they are said to have sustained an aggregate loss of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, over and above the amount of their swindlings in consequence of having obtained, through the perfection of knavery at Washington, a copy of the president's message before it was delivered to congress. We shall revert to this subject. It seems probable that a scene of corruption is about to be exposed which has no precedent in this country, and not many even in Europe. The whole concern is one of filthy prostitution. We hope that these fellows have been caught in the meshes of their own net, or fallen into the pit which they had "dugged deep" for others.

*Whether of log-wood blues that blush in the using—printed calicoes that turn pale on approaching the washing-tub; or cast-iron bridle-bits that snap in twain at the moment when a man's life may depend on their adhesion. If the man be killed—it is no matter; the price of the miserable iron has been obtained.

A NEW CONTINENT. The London Literary Gazette of the 23d Feb. gives it out to be believed as a fact, that a whaler has fallen in with a new continent in the Antarctic sea, in about the latitude of 67 degrees south, and in the longitude of the Cape of Good Hope; but that the discoverers have endeavored to conceal it, till they can bring off some cargoes of oil and seal skins.—"Brother Jonathan" long concealed the land which he discovered in the longitude of Cape Horn—and "Father Bull" may be disposed to follow his lead. It is some few years ago—but a "Yankee" master of a ship, inviting men to join him for the voyage, said that he would conduct them to a place where "seals were as tame as kittens;" and that he knew of such a place, there is now no manner of doubt.

"THE EMANCIPATOR" is the title of a paper which has just appeared in the city of New York. From the notices of it, in other papers, it seems that it is for the entire and immediate emancipation of all slaves, even by the physical force of the enslaved. We are as sincerely opposed to slavery as any one—not only because unjust in itself, but on account of its perpetual interference with the rights of free labor—yet cannot have any part or lot in proceedings of such awful tendency, if successful; and if unsuccessful, (as they must be, in general), can have no other effect than to render the condition of the enslaved much worse than it is. We doubt whether immediate emancipation, and prompt extermination, would not practically mean the same thing, in the United States.

The PRESIDENT having received an invitation from some of his friends in Hartford, (Conn.) to visit that section of country, made the following reply:

Washington, March 7th, 1833.

Gentlemen—I avail myself of the first opportunity afforded me since the adjournment of congress, to acknowledge the receipt of your flattering letter of the 5th of February last, transmitting, in behalf of the citizens of Hartford, Connecticut, the resolution they had adopted on the previous eighth of January.

To know that my character and the course of my administration are viewed with sentiments of kindness and approbation, so cordial and unqualified as those which are manifested in your communication, and by a portion of my fellow citizens to whom I am personally a stranger, is a pleasure which more than repays the privations and cares that have made them familiar with my name.

Could any thing add to the desire I have long indulged to visit New England, and examine the republican institutions which her sons have raised up with so much public spirit and success, it would be the satisfaction I should expect to derive from a personal intercourse with the citizens themselves. I am at present unable to say when I can embrace an opportunity to gratify this desire; but I trust it may be in my power in the course of the present or the next year.

I am, gentlemen, with sentiments of great respect and regard, your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

Messrs. Andrew J. Judson, John M. Niles, Wm. H. Ellis, E. Porter, Gideon Welles, O. Holt, committees.

CLAIMS UNDER THE TREATY WITH DENMARK. We understand that the commissioners appointed to carry into effect the convention with Denmark, and to distribute the fund provided to indemnify the claims of American merchants for spoiliations upon their commerce, have closed the commission, and made their final report to the state department.

The time limited by the treaty, and the act of congress, for the adjustment of these claims, and distribution of the funds, will expire on the 4th of April, after which time the claimants will be entitled to receive their respective proportions of the fund, at the treasury department, of which due notice will be given. The return from the board is in such form as to prevent any delay in the payment of the claims at the treasury.

We learn, also, that the whole amount of claims presented and acted upon by the board, was between three and four millions of dollars. The amount allowed is $2,151,425—and the amount to be distributed is $670,564 78-100, so that the claimants will receive thirty-one and one-eighth per cent. upon the sums allowed to them respectively. [Chronicle, of last month.]

BRITISH TARIFF ARRANGEMENT FOR THE UNITED STATES.—From Bell's Weekly Messenger. "It is probable, however, that a compromise will be made by the adoption of a more permanent system than the mitigation of the tariff law. The federal connection will not be immediately, we think, dissolved, but be kept up in appearance though its death blow will be struck. It is very likely that the compromise will be of this sort;—each state will be required, after the example of the German states, to furnish a military contingency in a case of the common danger of all—and perhaps, also, to pay some annual sum towards the provision and support of a general federal government, such annual payment to be received as the purchase of an exemption from all future taxes and imposts raised for the union at large. Such a regulation might be made to conciliate all interests. Each state would then make its own commercial code, have its own tariff, its own custom house duties—and if it chose, its own excise. This is nearly the condition in which the smaller states of Germany and Switzerland stand towards each other in their federal capacity.

—This is a beautiful contrivance! We are greatly indebted to Mr. Bull.

MASSACHUSETTS. The national republican candidates, in the several congressional districts in this state, are as follows:

- No. 1. Francis C. Gray;
2. Rufus Choate;
3. Caleb Cushing;
4. Edward Everett;
6. George Grennell, jr.
7. George N. Briggs;
8. Isaac C. Bates;
9. H. A. S. Dearborn;
10. William Baylies;
11. John Read.

In the 5th district (Worcester) it is hoped Mr. Davis will again be a candidate. In the 12th district (Plymouth) John Quincy Adams has been nominated by the anti-masons, and we have not yet heard of any opposing candidate. [Essex Reg.]

[Messrs. Appleton, Hodges and Nelson declined a re-election. Mr. Gray has been selected as the successor of the former.]

The elections were held last Monday. Messrs. Adams and Everett were unopposed, and, of course, re-elected. At Boston only 3671 votes were taken—Mr. Gray received 1651, C. G. Greene 841, T. Lyman, jr. 819, G. Odion 333. Messrs. Greene and Lyman were supported by two interests in the Jackson party; Mr. Odion by the anti-masons. Mr. Gray was 189 short of a majority of the whole, and there must be another election.

VIRGINIA. Col. Newton, of Norfolk, "the father of the house," has published a neat address to the voters of the "first congressional district," and retired from a nomination for re-election. He was a faithful and honest representative of the people.—Miles King, esq. has been nominated in the place of col. Newton, as a friend of the bank of the United States, and the tariff, as arranged at the last session—and anti-Van Buren.

Mr. Stevenson, speaker of the last house of representatives, is again a candidate—but is ardently opposed, by the friends of Mr. John Robertson. The "Richmond Whig" calls Mr. S. a "federalist," and rallies the "democrats," saying—"Can ye support a champion of the damnable proclamation? Can ye support one who has surrendered the 'citadel' of state rights to the enemy—the right of secession? Can ye support an advocate of the force bill?"

And speaks of Mr. Robertson as "a natural hater of aristocrats, and would-be aristocrats—the man of all our citizens, who, in the simplicity of his life and tastes, and in the undeviating republicanism of his walk and conversation, most resembles Cato of Utica. No flatterer, he—no worshipper of power—no conformer to whatever is uppermost—no interested changeling, whose opinions ever take the hue from the president's palace—but a man he is, who holds now precisely the same creed which he embraced at the outset of life—a man whose opinions no one is ever at a loss to find out—a man, we verily believe, who, if the whole world besides were to surrender liberty, would live and die a republican."

Adding—"Mr. Stevenson is an applicant for the embassy to London, and if the king of England sends an ambassador here, it is confidently believed by Mr. Stevenson's friends, that he will be sent minister to Great Britain."

There are four competitors in the Winchester district, for congress. Mr. Mercer has no present opposition in Loudon. Mr. Talliferro, formerly of the house of representatives, is again a candidate, from Stafford district.

There is much feeling in Virginia about nullification and anti-nullification; and the principles of the president's proclamation, generally sustained by the legislature, are about to be tested by "the voice of the people"—except that this question is mixed up with a preference for or hostility to Mr. Van Buren, who is now regarded by some as the "black stone," to be kissed or kicked. Hence the great questions about "state rights" may not be clearly settled at the ensuing election; but it seems manifest, that a very strong party is being organized in severe opposition to the present administration of the general government—with which it is most probable that the body of the opponents of president Jackson and Mr. Van Buren, at the late electoral election, will ultimately become united, and that Virginia, again, may be cast upon an "alternative"—as in 1828.

Since the preceding was in type, the elections in Virginia have commenced, and we have returns from several of the counties—but insufficient, in any contested case, to shew us probable results. The votes, however, shall be carefully stated.

GREAT DEPOSIT OF GOLD! Fredericksburg, Virginia, March 26. In the county of Spotsylvania, twelve miles above this town, has been lately discovered, on the land of Mr. — Smith, a very rich vein of gold, running horizontally for about a quarter of a mile. What course it may take afterwards, is not known. A shaft of fifty feet has not reached the bottom.—About 50,000 bushels of ore have been raised, of which a small portion is said to yield $50 per bushel, and the least valuable is estimated at $5.

This is incalculably beyond any thing hitherto discovered in this part of the world; and we have little doubt of the accuracy of the information, having derived it from a gentleman of character and intelligence, who visited the mine last week. [Arenia.]

FLORIDA. The legislative council adjourned on the 17th February, after a session of six weeks. Eighty-two acts were passed, twenty-five of which are of general character. Sixteen bills were vetoed by the governor, four or five of which were amended and subsequently approved by him, and the others were passed by a requisite majority of the council. Two banks were chartered—the Union bank and the Commercial bank of Apalachicola.

CANADA. The legislature of Lower Canada are again at loggerheads with the governor in consequence of his having refused to sign a new writ for the holding of an election at Montreal, to replace a member they had expelled. A committee of the house reported that they would recommend a determination not to transact any further business with his excellency, were it not for the necessity of providing for some legislative enactments against the spread of the cholera next year. On which a Canadian journalist observes, that the cholera has at last proved good for something.

Mr. Taylor, a member of the house, has been imprisoned for a publication in the Quebec paper reflecting on the conduct of the speaker. [N. Y. Courier & Enquirer.]

NEW SOUTH WALES. Some of the late English papers contain extracts of letters from Hobart town, which represent the prospects of the colony as being most favorable. Imports from England are said to amount to £300,000 a year; mechanics and farm servants find ready employment and good wages; the police system is well and efficiently managed; and every thing seems to promise that the progress of the colony to wealth and power will be rapid and certain.

GENERAL LAFAYETTE, in an able speech on the election law of France, which he delivered in the chamber of deputies on the 15th of January last, made this remarkable observation: "I shall speak of the government of the United States, although I am one of those who pay it the just tribute of calling it the pattern government. But we are now told that what I should call republican institutions suit only a vast continent, bounded on the one side by the ocean, and on the other by widely extended forests. Formerly, however, it was said that they suited only for an island. They are suited to every country where the citizens are intelligent, and wish to be free."

MR. HASSLER, the able mathematician, has been appointed, under the late act of congress, appropriating $20,000 for the object, to make a survey of the coast of the United States—a work which was commenced by Mr. H. under the administration of Mr. Monroe, but was discontinued in consequence of the refusal of congress to make the requisite appropriation for the prosecution of the work.

COM. TUCKER. The Gardiner, (Maine), Intelligencer, in announcing the death of commodore Tucker, says of him that next to Lafayette, "he was the highest surviving officer of the revolution, at the time of his death. Perhaps there was not a braver man in the whole service; or one who, to the extent of his command, had gained a greater number of severely earned victories than commodore T. His was the first written commission during the revolution, and he was selected by general Washington to convey Mr. John Adams, our first minister to France. On his passage he escaped a 74 and two frigates which pursued him a long time almost within gun shot, and actually captured another British frigate of a superior force, whilst Mr. A. was on board. During his whole naval service, commodore T. captured 3,000 of the enemy and 600 British guns. Within a few weeks the government had settled a pension of $600 per year on the venerable captain, but he has not been permitted to live to enjoy it.

A STORM. Milledgeville, March 14.—The late hurricane, which visited this section of country, is represented as the most extensive ever known in Georgia. Its ravages in the western counties have been awful, and the injury to woodlands and plantations in many places irreparable. Its general course was from north west to south east. Beyond Flint river, we learn that in places, whole forests of the finest and best timbered lands have been entirely prostrated—and plantations so laid waste as to bring almost complete despair for the present year's crop. Its attack was various—running in veins—in some places entirely sparing the country, and in others prostrating it for miles together. Much injury has been done to houses, fences and stock, and in several instances lives have been lost.

PENNSYLVANIA STATE LOAN. We find the following in the Harrisburg Reporter of a late date. The speaker of the senate appears to be a monied man: "The loan of $2,540,661 44, bearing an interest of five per cent. and reimbursable in 1858, was yesterday taken by Dr. Jesse R. Burden, at a premium of $13 51 on the hundred dollars. The next highest bidder, we learn, was the bank of Pennsylvania, offering $13 50 premium on the $100. The premium at which the present loan has been taken is not quite so high as that given for the loan of last year. This is in part owing to the circumstance that the present loan has two years less to run than that of last year."

NEW YORK SAVINGS BANK. The annual report of this institution was made recently to the assembly, and presented the following items:

Amount of deposits invested,	$2,521,051 96
uninvested,	230,079 46

Whole amount of deposits, Jan. 1st, 1833,	$2,751,131 42

The total amount of deposits since the incorporation of the bank is $7,747,038 91; repaid to depositors, $5,835,730 0; interest received, $387,202 14.

HUDSON RIVER. We have heard it remarked, that the river was closed this year to an unusually late period. We find in the shipping and commercial list of this morning, the following statement:—

The river opened to Albany in

TREASURY DEPARTMENT—BURNT.

The treasury buildings of the United States have been, for the second time, in less than 33 years, totally destroyed by fire—with a large part of the records and papers contained therein. We present several accounts of the late conflagration.

From the National Intelligencer of April 1.

A SERIOUS DISASTER.

We are sorry to have to announce that the public building east of the president's square, occupied as the treasury department, was consumed by fire, yesterday morning, between two o'clock and sunrise. The fire was first discovered in the room adjoining that of the chief clerk of the department, usually known among the clerks and other officers by the name of Mr. F. Laub's room. It is not known whether the fire originated in the floor or the ceiling of the room, the whole being in a blaze before any one approached it; but no doubt appears to be entertained that the fire was accidental. The whole room was on fire before the alarm was given; and until the alarm was given, even the watch walking the pavement in front of the branch bank (near the spot) perceived nothing of the fire, (the building of the state department interposing). Every exertion was made, as the people gathered to the spot, finding that it would be in vain to attempt saving the building, to rescue the books and papers of the several offices. A great deal was saved, by the clerks and other citizens, considering the circumstances. It is hoped, indeed, that few books or papers of much consequence are destroyed.

All the books and papers on the ground floor are believed to have been saved (in great disorder of course) and all those in the third story were destroyed. Of the books and papers in the apartments of the second story, much the greater part were saved.

The offices on the first floor, the books of which are saved, were those of the register of the treasury, the treasurer, and the first auditor. On the second floor, nearly all the books of the first comptroller, whose office occupied the greater number of the rooms, were saved, and a part of those belonging to the office of the secretary of the treasury, in whose immediate apartments the fire was first discovered.

Of the offices connected with the treasury department, several of the most extensive, are kept in other buildings than that destroyed, and are of course entirely safe, viz: those of the second comptroller, second, third, fourth and fifth auditors, and the solicitor of the treasury.

The papers destroyed were many of them obsolete, and almost all of a date prior to 1820. The most important papers destroyed were perhaps the correspondence of the head of the treasury department, which was kept in the room wherein the fire originated.

When the fire was first discovered, it was the dead hour of the night, and the whole population of the city was so deep buried in sleep, that a comparatively small number arrived early on the ground. Very soon after the first cry of fire was uttered, at half past two o'clock, the keeper of the orphan asylum bell caught and repeated the alarm; whence it happened that the persons first at the fire, next to the immediate neighbors, were roused by that bell, and had half a mile to run before they arrived at it. To save the building, however, when once on fire, would, under any circumstances, have been impossible, so inflammable was its structure, as well as its contents.

No one can look at the smoking ruins, without a sensation of astonishment at the fatuity and utter imprudence with which books and papers of such vast consequence have been so long trusted to any other than a fire proof building. The few scattering vaulted rooms in the building entirely escaped the flames; and had the whole building been similarly constructed, the fire could not have occurred; or if, through extreme carelessness, it had occurred, would have been confined to the room in which it originated.

Where was the watchman of the building? is a natural question. He was, we hear, sick at home; and the youth substituted for him was so sound asleep, that he was perhaps only saved from being burnt alive by those who broke open the doors and roused him. Had he been ever so wide awake, however, unless he had happened to inspect the particular room where the fire began, the alarm from outside might have been his first notice.

We were glad to observe that creditable exertions were made by the proper officers yesterday to collect and secure the scattered books and papers; so that by 2 o'clock in the day they were safely housed.

From the Globe of the same date.

We regret to announce the total destruction, by fire, of the treasury building; but we are happy to add, that, as far as can now be ascertained, all the public accounts and vouchers relating to the receipt and disbursement of the public monies have been saved.

It is understood that the fire was discovered at about half past 2 o'clock on Sunday morning, by a person accidentally passing. The flame was first seen issuing from the windows of the room on the upper floor adjoining the centre projection, on the north front. The alarm was immediately given; and, by great exertions on the part of the secretary and other public officers, as well as on the part of the citizens generally, who seemed to take an equal interest in the matter, the most important part of the public papers were preserved. The public records and documents, being the chief objects of solicitude, the principal and earliest efforts were made for their preservation.

The manner in which the fire originated has not been ascertained. The necessary measures have, however, been taken to obtain information on the subject, and, as soon as the result is known, it will be communicated to our readers. It appears that the messenger, whose turn it was to watch, was absent, from sickness; and that the person who usually sleeps in the building, was not aware of the fire until he was awakened from the outside.

From the National Intelligencer of April 3.

The officers charged with that duty have taken two or three of the treasurers opposite to Mrs. Strother's hotel, on Pennsylvania avenue, for the temporary accommodation of the public offices lately burnt out of the treasury building. The chiefs and clerks are busy in arranging into some sort of order the rescued papers. It will take a tedious time to put them in proper order. The paying offices, however, have already got to work, as well they might, seeing that the fire took place the very day before quarter-day.

From the Alexandria Gazette.

We understand that an examination into the cause of the destruction of the treasury building in Washington, is now in progress by order of the president. It is rumored that the public archives have sustained a heavy, and, in some cases, an irreparable loss, in the destruction of many commercial papers of great value, which can never be restored—of many documents connected with the deposits of public money, and of the claims of the United States on debtors or unaccounting agents. But rumor is prone to exaggerate, and we trust that it will be found so in the present instance.

We copy the following from the "National Intelligencer" of the 5th April, because that it is characteristic of the valued officer to whom it relates.

"WHO WILL'S MAY CONQUER."

Last night during the conflagration of the treasury department, I observed that indefatigable man, Mr. Clarke, clerk of the house of representatives, in the midst of the crowd, passing from one place to another among the persons engaged in rescuing the papers and documents from the flames. Some one asked him what he was after. I want, said he, very coolly, to get my account of the contingent expenses of the house, which I filed on the 23d, in the office of the first auditor. The gentleman laughed, and said he might as well look for a needle in a haystack. Mr. Clarke answered, "I'll try." In an hour or so, I saw him hold up to the attorney general a bundle of papers, and say, "sir, here they are—my vouchers for more than one hundred thousand dollars of government money expended. I will sleep sound to-morrow night."

This is so much like him in his own office, where he does not admit of the excuse that a paper can't be found, that I thought I would state the fact, as worth publishing.

PENNSYLVANIA VETO.

Governor Wolf's objections to the bill entitled "an act to incorporate the Farmers' and Manufacturers' bank of Delaware county."

To the senate and house of representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

GENTLEMEN:—I have examined and maturely considered bill No. 27, entitled, "an act to incorporate the Farmers' and Manufacturers' bank of Delaware county," and sincere as my desire is to concur with the general assembly in all their acts and measures not prohibited by the constitution, nor essentially inconsistent with the public interests, or which exhibit questions of expediency only, I am nevertheless constrained to withhold my assent from the bill in question, under a firm conviction, that if no immediate benefit shall result to the community in which we live from my non-concurrence, I shall, at least, have the satisfaction to know, that I have done my endeavor to save that community from, what I conscientiously believe to be, an alarming and much to be dreaded evil now manifesting itself, in an excited but morbid spirit for banking and its concomitant speculation, generally ending, as experience has heretofore taught us, in a state of depression, distress and ruin. I have therefore directed the secretary of the commonwealth to return the bill to the house of representatives in which it originated, with the following reasons for my dissent.

First—The bank of Delaware county, established at Chester, in that county, by the act of 1814, with a capital of two hundred thousand dollars, of which the sum of seventy-seven thousand five hundred and ten dollars only, has been called for and paid in by the stockholders, is believed to be entirely adequate to the wants and necessities of the people; and to furnish all necessary accommodations facilitating and giving a healthful and vigorous impulse to the prosecution of the various branches of industry in progress within the county. One hundred and twenty-two thousand four hundred and ninety dollars of the capital stock of that bank, a sum considerably greater than the whole amount of the capital of the bank proposed to be created by the bill under consideration, has never been required to be paid over by the stockholders. The very fact, therefore, that so small an amount of the capital of the existing bank has been called for by the directors, furnishes strong, if not conclusive evidence, that a greater amount of banking capital has not hitherto been considered necessary for the accommodation of the people of Delaware county, and that an additional bank is not needed, and would answer no useful purpose for mere public accommodation; especially as the bank of Delaware county, by calling in the residue of its capital, may increase its discounts and extend its business beyond its present operations, to an extent far exceeding that which the bank contemplated by the bill in question, would, from its limited capital, be enabled to do.

Second—If the bank proposed to be established by the bill under consideration had stood alone, and entirely unconnected with the general press for the incorporation of similar institutions, from various parts of the state, manifest as it is that it cannot be required for any useful purpose, the passage of the bill might, perhaps, have been tolerated upon the ground of competition, or some other plausible pretext; but we cannot shut our eyes against the alarming fact, that this bill is but one of a batch of bills numbering, it is believed, not less than twenty-three, providing for the incorporation of a like number of banks, reported to the legislature in the course of the present session; by which it is proposed to add to the existing banking capital within the commonwealth, the further sum of six millions nine hundred and fifty-five thousand dollars.

It must be obvious to the plainest capacity, what a state of things such an addition to the number of banks and the banking capital already in operation within the commonwealth, must necessarily produce. It does not appear that there is any want of banking capital at present in the state of Pennsylvania, (except, perhaps, in some of our state manufacturing communities), to discount all the good paper that is offered, or to afford any and every accommodation that prudence would justify, or our citizens could reasonably require; most, if not all of the banks now in operation in this commonwealth, it is believed, are conducted upon correct principles, and based upon solid foundations as to capitals, and it is believed to be a fact, that many of them would gladly extend their discounts, provided a safe business offered.

Under such circumstances, should the proposed number of banks, or any considerable portion of them, be added to those already in existence, the inevitable consequence must be, that the new institutions must either remain altogether inoperative, or they must invite business; which latter would be most likely, as they would not be willing to remain passive spectators of the operations of their more prosperous and successful neighbors. Speculation, in all its destructive varieties, would thus be encouraged; a fictitious, unsound value would be given to property; excessive issues of banking paper would inundate the country; a brief but forced show of prosperity would be produced, ending, as all such ephemeral excitements, founded upon speculation based upon borrowed capital inevitably must end, in speedy depression, bankruptcy and ruin.

Third—The currency of the commonwealth is, in the present state of our banking institutions, considered by all as being entirely sound, uniting in the language of the committee on banks, "all the requisites of a perfect circulating medium;" in that condition I feel desirous it should remain, and would therefore refrain from doing any act by which its healthful condition might be endangered, or its character for solidity and soundness in any measure tarnished or impaired. An increase of banks in situations where the business of the community is not of a character to require it, would lead to such results; and as the rage for such increase seems to be gaining strength in every part of the state, it seems to me in order to preserve the state from a return to a period of ruin and distress, such as it has recently escaped from, it is best that the evil should be met and resisted in its inception, and the country saved from the disasters which a temporizing or yielding policy would be sure to entail upon it.

These are my own views of this important subject, hastily thrown together. Should the general assembly differ from me in opinion, and believe me to be in error, it is in the power of a constitutional majority to set the matter right.

I have also examined and considered the bill entitled "an act to incorporate the Merchants' and Manufacturers' bank of Pittsburgh?" and believing that the city of Pittsburgh does require an extension of its banking capital, to afford the facilities and aids necessary to a vigorous and prosperous prosecution of the various and extensive commercial and manufacturing enterprises in which its citizens are engaged, I have approved and signed the same, and directed the secretary of the commonwealth to return it to the house in which it originated.

GEORGE WOLF.

Harrisburg, March 29, 1833.

After the reception of the preceding message, the house of representatives took up the bill—and Mr. Anderson of Delaware, [the speaker] was asked to explain, and leave being granted, he said that he presumed that the governor predicated his first objection on the report of the auditor general. Since that report had been made, the present bank had thrown into the market $100,000 of its capital, and every dollar of the stock had been taken. In the second objection in the message, he found that an exception was made in favor of banks "in manufacturing communities." The bank now in question was located in a manufacturing community, and he believed that if he had furnished the governor with the facts which he submitted to the house, when the bill was under consideration, showing the amount of manufacturing in Delaware county, he would have signed the bill.

The following is the vote on passing the bill, the governor's objections to the contrary notwithstanding.

SOUTH CAROLINA CONVENTION.

After the election of gov. Hayne, as president of the convention on the 11th March—

General Hamilton offered a couple of resolutions, the purport of which was, that Mr. Leigh, commissioner from the commonwealth of Virginia, be invited to a seat within the bar of the convention, and the resolutions having been read, colonel Warren moved to amend them by striking out the words "commissioner," &c. for the purpose of inserting the words "ambassador extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, from the free, sovereign and independent state of Virginia, near the sovereignty of South Carolina." The president reminded col. Warren that Mr. Leigh was simply denominated in the resolutions of the Virginia legislature, commissioner, &c. Col. W. was indifferent what Virginia called Mr. Leigh, if she did not know how to christen her ambassador, he thought South Carolina did. This produced a burst of laughter at the expense of the member, but not intimidated, the colonel said that South Carolina was a free, sovereign and independent power, which recognised no authority on earth paramount to her sovereign will, and if the nation of Virginia was content to style herself, still, after the foolish and old fashioned manner, a plain commonwealth, she ought to be corrected by the sovereignty of South Carolina, in convention assembled. Not a few spectators thought the colonel was joking, but he insisted that he was a regular nullifier, and was determined to go the whole, and owed no allegiance to any authority, except the sovereignty of the state. The motion to amend, however, not being seconded, the resolutions of gen. Hamilton were unanimously adopted, and a committee appointed to introduce Mr. Leigh.

Mr. Leigh was accordingly introduced, and after bowing to the chair, and to the different sides of the house, took his seat at the centre table.

March 14. The ordinance reported yesterday—see REGISTER, page 57, was taken up and considered—and Mr. Miller, (of the senate of the United States), explained the new tariff law, and gave his reasons why he had supported it. He thought that the "South Carolina doctrines" were recognised—but said that the convention was not committed by that act, being "clearly free to exercise its sovereign will." He was followed by Mr. Barnwell, (of the house of representatives of the United States). Among other things he said, he thought South Carolina had no cause for triumph, and he was glad that Clay's bill was not received with rejoicing; for we had not achieved a great victory, and had not got all that the state set out for, but he would support the ordinance under consideration, because the question was now, whether we should secede, and have a civil war, or take the compromise. He should, therefore, vote for the passage of the ordinance, which he considered not at all derogatory to the dignity nor to the honor of the state.

Mr. R. Barnwell Smith rose, evidently under great excitement. He said that it had been but a very short time since he had seen the report accompanying the ordinance; that he had not examined it, but what he had seen of it, he totally dissemed from it. He was sure that the constituents whom he represented, never would consent to the sentiments of that report. He knew them too well, and was proceeding to animadvert very severely on the report generally; when Mr. Wilson asked if the report was then before the convention.

The chair. The ordinance is before the convention. The report contains the reasons which are submitted by the committee, for the adoption of the ordinance; and the chair deems the gentleman in order, and will permit a latitude of debate, when, in stating his reasons in voting for the ordinance, he shall attempt to shew wherein he differs from the reasons of the committee.

Mr. Smith proceeded. He said, he was willing to vote for the ordinance, but not on the grounds stated in the report. He called the attention of the convention to those words in the report, expressive of the ardent attachment of the people of this state towards the union. As for himself, he was not for such an union, and he was likewise certain, that those who sent him there, were the same in sentiment. He said, that he would rather see the whole state, from the Table Rock to Fort Moultrie, a military camp, than for the state of South Carolina to continue a member of the union, such as it is now and had been for ten years. The ordinance of November had required more than was granted by Mr. Clay's bill, and he was for the whole requisition. He was unwilling to reeode one step; and would never consent to vote for the ordinance before the convention now, on the grounds contained in the report. He did not view that bill as a compromise, because it did not go far enough, and although he should vote for the ordinance, yet he was unwilling that the report should be given to the world, as containing the causes which induced South Carolina to repeal her ordinance. He rung several changes on the words "ardently attached to the union," attempted to shew wherein South Carolina had gained nothing by the compact; and said that, so far as himself and constituents were concerned, the report was untrue. He continued, that for such a thing as that report to be presented to the convention by the committee, as the high grounds on which the state was then to act, he, for one, never would consent to it. He was unwilling to degrade the state by its adoption, and when it came before the convention, he should move for its recomittal to the committee. He said that he had been with the state, in all her movements in this great controversy, and if she repealed the ordinance of November, he would like to see other reasons assigned. He concluded by repeating: that he did not consider Mr. Clay's bill as any thing like a triumph, as some gentlemen had termed it; in fact he scouted the idea of there being any cause of gratulation or triumph, and he would never so record it by his vote.

Mr. C. J. Colcock said, he rose to explain; being chairman of the committee, he would say, that the report, was submitted after due deliberation on the part of the committee, and he was not himself ready to acquiesce in the whole of it. The phraseology might not suit some gentlemen, but then, when the report, was before the convention, to obviate the objections of its opposers, it was free to be discussed, and could be recommended with instructions to amend.

Mr. Wilson moved to amend the phraseology of the ordinance, and after some remarks from Mr. Stephen D. Miller, withdrew his motion; when the president was about to put the question on the passage of the ordinance Mr. James Hamilton, Jr. attempted to rise, but gave the floor to col. Samuel Warren, from St. James Santee, a revolutionary officer.

Col. Warren, leaning against the table and supported on his crutches, said, he understood the gentleman from St. Bartholomews', (Mr. R. B. Smith), to ask when he was up, "where was the man in the convention, who could place his hand upon his heart, and say that he was attached to this union?"

Mr. Smith—ardently attached.

Col. Warren—I don't care what word you place there. I for one, can place my hand upon my heart, (smiting the action to the word), and can say that I am ardently attached to this union—I fought for it, and bled for it, (and he looked unconsciously downwards to the remnant of his dismembered limb), and will do it again, whenever my services are required.

This whole scene was one of deep and touching interest.

Mr. Hamilton said, that he was gratified, in the expressions which had just fallen from his venerable friend. He himself was ardently attached to the union, and regretted exceedingly, on entering the hall, to hear such remarks as had proceeded from the gentleman, who had denounced the union, accompanied by the declaration, that the matters set forth in the report were false and untrue. The party with which he had acted, which had been abused and vilified, from one end of the country to the other, which had been driven to the wall, and which now was triumphant, whose victory was one of principle, not of dollars and cents, to be thus spoken of in consequence of a report, so solemnly submitted to a convention; and by one too, who had fought with them, to the last ditch, who had been among the foremost in the cause, was keenly felt by him, and was the unkindest cut of all. I ask the gentleman, wherein are they untrue?

Mr. Smith—They are untrue, as far as I am concerned, and my constituents; and I have already stated in what manner they are untrue.

Mr. Hamilton stated, that he was detained from the convention at the hour of meeting, in consequence of the business assigned him, as a member of the committee, and was therefore deprived of learning the qualification attached to the gentleman's denunciation; and insisted on explanation, for he had the honor of serving with distinguished gentlemen on that committee, and they were incapable of putting forth as true, any sentiments in the report, which would cause a degradation to the state, and demanded again, "wherein are they untrue?"

Mr. Smith replied, that he had already stated, that they were untrue as regarded himself and his constituents, and that if the gentleman was not in the house, it was not his fault. What he had to say, he would say again, so that every one might hear him. He had not been consulted in the matter; if he had been, that report would not have been submitted with his consent. He had gone with the party all lengths. There were men who had quailed at the onset, while he had ever been firm; and he should, at all times, on every occasion, and in every manner, freely give his views, on all and every subject, connected with the rights of the state, which came before him.

Mr. Hamilton remarked that he deeply and sincerely regretted the course of the gentleman. That there was no member of the party, whose zeal in the cause was more prominent than that of the gentleman, and that his opinion, he had ever valued, and for himself, he had ever entertained the highest personal regard; yet, he had yet to learn, wherein the gentleman's remarks, as to the report, could be correct, and he trusted that on the discussion of the report, it might be so amended as still to retain the causes, which were only an inducement to the ordinance.

At this stage of the business the convention took a recess till 4 o'clock—when having reassembled—

Mr. Phillips, from All Saints, observed that he did not think the state committed on the vote of the delegation in congress on Mr. Clay's bill, for he viewed that as a bill for protection. He continued to state, that the bill was one of discrimination, and recognised by its provisions every principle which the other tariff acts of congress had recognised, and proceeded to say, that he should vote for the ordinance of the convention, not that he considered Mr. C.'s bill as one of triumph, but because of the commission of Virginia. That appeal would influence him.—He concluded by moving to strike out the preamble to the ordinance.

Mr. Wilson replied at length, taking a view of the manufacturing interests of the United States, shewing the situation of the country at various times, advertising to the situation of South Carolina in prosperity, and since the passage of the several acts of congress in relation to revenue and domestic industry, down to the ordinance of nullification. He spoke of Mr. Clay's bill as a triumph on principle, contended that as it was such, the state stood on high ground, and therefore opposed the motion to strike out.

Mr. Hamilton followed, arguing that there was a boon gained. Had it not been said, and openly avowed, that not one job would be granted to South Carolina while her ordinance to nullify remained on her statute book; and yet we see an abandonment of the principle from the very quarter where least was expected. He was proud to say it, that the Ajax of the American System had come forward with a bill conceding the point demanded by the state; (and so he conceived Mr. Clay's bill), and he pronounced it a glorious and triumphant victory, and he should oppose, by his vote, the motion of the gentleman from All Saints.

The motion for striking out was put by the chair, and lost by a large majority. The question then recurred on the passage of the ordinance, when Mr. Phillips again rose, and contended that the majority should not thrust the bill of Mr. Clay down the throats of the minority and; for his part, he should vote for the ordinance, in compliment to the mediation of Virginia.

The question was then called for by many voices, and the chair being about to put it, Mr. Whitfield, of Pendleton, took the floor. The reporter, from the noise and conversation near him, did not distinctly understand him, yet, understood Mr. Whitfield to claim the bill of Mr. Clay as a triumph of principle, and that he should vote for the passage of the ordinance.

The question was again called for, when Mr. John L. Wilson moved that the yeas and nays be taken. Seven members and more rose for this purpose, and Mr. C. J. Colcock addressed the convention in a few words. Mr. C. said, that for more than thirty years past he had been engaged in active public life, and he implored gentlemen to pause, in a matter of such deep and lasting import. He earnestly entreated them, as time had been solicited, to grant that time. It was unnecessary to hurry the ordinance through its passage, and it was all important that the whole business should be well deliberated upon, as the transactions of the convention would in a great measure fix the destiny of the state. The party with which he acted had been charged on a similar occasion with acting in haste; he might be charged now with being too slow; but of that he was unmindful. Appealing to the wisdom of that body, he should move that further time be granted, and that the further consideration of the ordinance be suspended until to-morrow, and that it be made the order of the day, which was agreed to without a count.

A motion being now made for adjournment, the convention adjourned to ten o'clock to-morrow.

The very excited manner in which Mr. Smith delivered his sentiments, and the call from Mr. Hamilton, as to the falsity of the report, seemed, at one moment, to threaten the harmony of the convention; but the mild deportment of Mr. Hamilton threw upon the spark an extinguisher, and the debate proceeded without any further reference to the subject of Mr. Smith's remark.

March 15. Mr. Harper, chairman of the sub-committee of twenty-one, presented a report, with an accompanying ordinance, on the late act of congress for the collection of the revenue, known as Mr. Wilkins' bill. The report is a very elaborate document, taking an extensive view of the bill, argues at length on the injustice thereof, its tendency to despotism, its extreme and unlimited power in the person of one individual; the total impolicy of its provisions in a republican government, the destructive influence which it is calculated to wield; and concludes by recommending the ordinance to nullify it in the state of South Carolina. The ordinance embraces new provisions, in reference to an additional oath, to be administered to enjoin the allegiance of every citizen, previous to the acceptance of any office of honor, profit, or trust. Ordered to be printed and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. James Hamilton, jr. from the sub-committee of twenty-one, submitted a report, in reference to the mediation of the legislature of Virginia, accompanied by several resolutions, expressive of the high regard of this state towards her sister commonwealth, of the gratitude with which the mediation was received; of the acceptance thereof, and of the distinguished consideration in which the convention of the state, held the principles as promulgated in the Virginia resolutions. Ordered to be printed and made the special order of the day for to-morrow.

A resolution was also introduced, by the same gentleman, highly complimentary to Mr. Leigh, the commissioner from Virginia; and also resolutions expressing the sense of the convention, in relation to any future assumed power by the general government; and declaring, that if the faith, as pledged in Mr. Clay's bill, should not be fairly acted upon; that should there be any odious discrimination in the tariff policy; that, in such case, the state should be free to re-enact, as in the wisdom of a convention, she might deem proper; and Mr. R. B. Smith, as connected with the last, submitted a resolution for the continuance of the military measures adopted, as preparatory for defence; which were severally ordered to be printed, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

The ordinance to repeal the ordinance of November last, being the order of the day, was taken up for consideration; when Mr. Miller went into an explanation of what was termed a home valuation. He spoke briefly, and concluded that there was not, in this term, the dangers nor difficulties which some constructions had placed upon it.

The hon. Robert Barnwell followed senator Miller. His reasons, he said, were not precisely those of his hon. colleague, who had preceded him, although they led him to the same conclusion. He was well aware that this bill, this compromise, which they had brought home, was not received as matter of triumph; that it was received even more reluctantly. He rejoiced that it was so received. It spoke well for the spirit and sense of the state. It pleased him well that they should so receive it. Yet, that it was received as it should be, he could not for an instant doubt.

The state had arrested, in full career, the tyranny that bore her down. The right was refused and denounced. Averse to civil broil, she then pronounced that, if her constitutional effort at redress, instead of justice and reparation, was answered by military violence, she would withdraw from this league. In this she only claimed to exert the great fundamental right of this confederacy, and of all other free states. It was denied her, with threats to overwhelm her with the entire military force of the nation. The federal bayonets were turned upon her. Yet for what was it that she had ever made herself a member of this government? Was it not that, under the mutual protection of a league of twenty-four states, she might find, at once, exemption from foreign injury and domestic discord? And here this very union was to be made the pretence for inflicting upon her these very mischiefs, with horrors made doubly frightful, by the very alliance itself. It was to avoid such civil broil, such strife with the confederacy itself, that she had prepared to live alone. That last reluctant resource of peace and liberty, was utterly refused her. She was told that she should be exterminated if she attempted it.

Yet did this gigantic array of tyranny quail her spirit for a single moment? Did it shake her purpose, or tame her into a coward quiet? No! fierce as was the issue thus offered her, she would have met it, rather than desert her liberty or diminish her honor.

While this was her attitude, the present compromise was presented her. Your choice was to be made between the evils of secession and this bill. The state had, could have, none of that mock-bravery, that mock-heroic bravery, let me call it, that could cast all prudence out of the question. She had resisted the tariff system as tyrannical, oppressive, ruinous. This bill is none of those. The main, substantial object of resistance is attained; the real grievance is removed. It can no longer be said that congress will not yield us redress. We have obtained it.

If, however, you cannot accept this compromise, the question is yet open to the convention. You can still choose between this bill and secession. Your representatives have given no pledge that takes away your liberty of choice. Let the voice of the state be given for secession, if it may. None can gainsay her decision. As for me, I shall obey. I know too well where my great duty is to be paid, to hesitate, for a single moment, in devoting myself to the sustaining with all that I can do, the great final judgment of the state.

Act, then, fearlessly, upon your own responsibility, from which no partial acceptance of ours could have derogated. I am bound, however, to declare to you, that the question will now be of civil war, not the tariff, nor secession.

While, therefore, I assert, that the bill is not the utmost that we had a right to demand, I cannot but regard it as accomplishing our great objects. It embodies the capital provision, that government shall measure its revenue by the standard of economical expenses only. This one great principle is distinctly implied in the bill.

So, too, of its 5th section, in which a system of ad valorem duties is provided for. That system takes 20 per cent. for its maximum rate. Can any one regard 20 per cent. as a protective rate? Look at the old duties, ranging, on the capital articles of import, from one to two hundred per cent.

It is evident that the class of manufacturers that can live under this bill, will be few and little formidable. It can never again give us those strong and wide combinations which subjugated the government itself—which made themselves the government. Henceforth, instead of overshadowing that government, they will be reduced to receive its care, only as every other interest in the country receives it.

I do not, however, exhort the state to rely upon any acts of the general government. She has been bitterly taught to give no such reliance. It is on her alone that I rely—on her courage, her vigilance, her prudence, her principles. I count on her nullification, which will rally the united south, the very instant that any breach of the compromise now formed, is attempted.

Mr. Turnbull addressed the convention in a short speech, in which he justified both the preamble and ordinance.

Mr. Phillips (of All Saints) replied.

Judge Richardson followed, declaring himself in favor of the ordinance, but averse to the preamble. He objected to the reasons that it urges, as not the true ones. Congress has made no reduction. Nor did he think this modification would bring down the income of the government to a more revenue point. This was but the second step towards a repeal. The first had been made in 1832. He regarded this as but the inception of the overthrow of the American System. It was no more than a proof of the change of public opinion.

Mr. Phillips, from All Saints, made some remarks, but could not be heard; when Mr. McDuffie rose, and said, he had not intended to offer any remarks on the subject; he felt himself bound to reply somewhat to the gentleman from Spartanburg, (Mr. J. S. Richardson). He understood him to have said, that there was no reduction in the bill, and that the words of the preamble were not correct. He explained wherein the bill of Mr. Clay was advantageous. That it was an abandonment of the principle of protection; that it so reduced the tariff as that certain goods, linens, worsted stuffs, &c. would be reduced much in price; that the bill, even admitting it did not arrive at its completion of the specified reduction until 1842, yet, that as, on certain articles which would be rendered duty free in a short time, and which were much consumed among ourselves, it was therefore preferable to a bill which did not embrace these provisions so early as the ensuing fall, yet might arrive at a reduction, contemplated in Mr. Clay's bill, even in the space of three years. He adverted to the inconsistency of the president's course, previous to and since his re-election. Said that he had deceived the manufacturers, by the circulars which were issued from the treasury, in relation to the tariff of 1832, which stated that the wants of the government were not met by that act; and then, as soon as he was certain of success, he was revolutionized in his sentiments, and, in his message to congress, recommended a reduction of the tariff laws. He said that even now, that he did not consider the south as safe. He adverted to a certain species of industry owned and used at the south, and said, that, however one principle seemed to be silenced for the present, yet another was in agitation for the future. He advised the south to stand up for herself; to be prepared for all and every event, for she might rely upon it, she would have to do it. He glanced at the bill of Mr. Wilkins, commented on its principles, and said that Rome, only, when her liberties were endangered, clothed one of her citizens with dictatorial power six months; but that the American people had created a military dictator for twelve. He concluded by warning his fellow citizens to be prepared for the shock, for it would certainly come, unless they were true to themselves.

March 16. Mr. Wilson from the committee to engross the ordinance, passed yesterday, reported it as ready for ratification. This ordinance repeals the ordinance of November last, and all acts of the legislature, passed in pursuance thereof, the militia law, alone, excepted. He also moved that it be signed, as was the ordinance of nullification, by the members who voted for it, as well as the president and clerk, which motion did not prevail: and Mr. S. D. Miller then moved that it only have attached to it the signatures of the president and clerk; which was agreed to. On motion, the hon. Mr. Lewis, a member of congress, from Alabama, was invited to take a seat on the floor of the convention.

The ordinance reported by Mr. Harper, to nullify the late act of congress, (known as Mr. Wilkins' bill) and declaring the oath of allegiance to the state, was taken up for consideration, being the special order of the day, Mr. J. L. Wilson moved that the yeas and nays be taken, and it being ordered,

Mr. R. W. Barnwell rose, and prefacing his motion with some very liberal remarks, moved that the sections of the ordinance, having relation to the oath of allegiance, be stricken out: when Mr. Johnson moved that the words "or appointed" be introduced in the 19th line, after the word "elected," so that the section would be rendered, "elected or appointed;" which being agreed to, the question recurred on the motion to strike out the three last sections of the ordinance. The chair was about to put the question, when Mr. J. B. O'Neale rose, and gave his opinions on the inexpediency and ill tendency of the creation of a new oath. He denied the right of the convention in the matter; contended that the oath, as prescribed by the constitution of the state, covered all the ground required by the new one; that a new enactment on the subject would not be calculated to heal the divisions of the state, which were now sufficiently wide. He said he stood on his native Carolina, and he should speak the sentiments of a freeman, and he ardently trusted, that he should be able to convince gentlemen of the total inexpediency of this provision of the ordinance. He then proceeded to define what was the allegiance of a citizen. He showed that the oath required by Virginia and Massachusetts, demanded no more of their citizens than does the present oath of this state of her citizens. He stated that the public mind was not prepared; that on this subject there was much difference of opinion, even among the majority of the state, and he asked gentlemen to pause. What did they intend to do? Were they willing to add to the excitement? Already were families arrayed against families, father against son, brother against brother, and even the flame had been carried to the temple of God—would such an enactment serve to extinguish the fire? Would it make the opposers of it any the better citizens? He thought not. He adverted to the enforcement bill. For one, said Mr. O'Neale, I wish it had never passed; but under present circumstances, he thought it would not be acted upon; it was a dead letter on the statute book. He gave it his disapprobation, and as an individual he considered it unwise and impolitic—he thought one clause unconstitutional, and the whole as granting powers which might hereafter be abused. He concluded by a touching appeal to the convention, urging gentlemen to pause, ere they were too late, and refer the enactment to the legislature, where, in his view, by the provisions of the constitution, it properly belonged.

Mr. Harper followed, in a speech of considerable length. He expatiated largely on the rights of the sovereignty of a state; argued that in times like these, it was necessary and expedient, that the state should know on whom she could depend. He said he had no doubt of the power of the convention to pass the ordinance, embracing the declaration of allegiance, which it contained; he urged the absolute necessity of such a declaration, and said that he did not wish to leave this oath to the legislature, for it would be leaving it to chance. He adverted to the meeting of the union convention in this place, as evidencing, in a measure, the spirit of the opposing party in the state; and said that the government of the state had been very moderate in their course, and instanced their tolerating the meeting of the union convention. He spoke of Mr. Wilkins' bill as abominable, and calculated to subvert the liberties of this country. He thought the south yet in much danger—the spirit of emancipation was abroad, and he should not be astonished, if, in another year, a revolution like that of 1800 should take place.

Mr. Turnbull took the floor, and rendered to the remarks of judge O'Neale, a high compliment. Spoke of his warmth of personal friendship to that gentleman—of the distinguished estimation in which he was held by him, and very many others; of the pleasure which it gave him to hear Mr. O'Neale deliver the sentiments which he had just given, on the bill of Mr. Wilkins. He then adverted in an argument, long, but interesting, on the topics which had occupied public attention for ten years past. He urged very strongly the adoption of the ordinance, in all its provisions, and concluded in a very strong appeal to the majority, not to suffer the moment to pass, but to act up to the expectations of the people.

Mr. Phillips, of Chesterfield, replied to Mr. Turnbull, and in consequence of some remarks which came from Mr. T. relative to the union convention, said that he would not yield his love for Carolina to that gentleman. He never expected to hear the attachment of the union party to the state questioned, and least of all from that quarter. He thought at least that the gentleman should have spared the feelings of his opponents on that occasion, and considered the time rather for conciliation, than an extension of the breach. He was surprised that such sentiments should have escaped one, to whom he could triumphantly exclaim, et tu Brute! He would throw the charge of enmity and disloyalty to the state into the teeth of the gentlemen, and would tell them that there were men in that convention, who would not suffer in comparison with the proudest son of Carolina in this. He asked if the opinions of seventeen thousand of his fellow citizens were not entitled to respect; and was he to be told on that floor, that unless the party with which he had the honor to act, did come forward, and bend to the opinions of the majority, that they were to be deprived of their rights and privileges. [Here Mr. Harper rose and explained.] Mr. Phillips proceeded on the inexpediency of the oath, and observed that for one, he never would take it. The union party were devotedly attached to the state—they sought to preserve the state by preserving the union—that union alone could preserve the rights of the states, and disunion alone could force consolidation on the broken section. If there was in his heart a single hope, or wish, or feeling, inconsistent with the honor and the welfare of South Carolina, he would tear it from his bosom. He heard it said that the dominant party had shown great moderation and forbearance, in suffering the late union convention to assemble here, "housing the legislature," as the gentleman [Mr. Harper] had said. Was he to be told, at this day, that gentlemen of equal virtue and character as those composing this body, representing 17,000 freemen, met to express their opinions upon the acts of the legislature, only by suffrage! Was he to hear credit claimed for forbearance towards an assembly of so much respectability, and representing so many freemen, because they were permitted to assemble and declare their sentiments upon an act of the state government. But it was said that this convention ought to adopt the oath because it had the power, and recommending its adoption to the legislature was leaving it to chance. It was for this very reason it should be left to the legislature. The people had never had this question before them, and this convention did not represent the people on that subject. Would not the members of the legislature also represent the people? This was the chance, then, to which this measure would be left, to the chance that every republican would cheerfully submit it. To the chance which was the basis of all republican institutions—the will of the people. The chance was that the people might will otherwise, and this they were not to be allowed to do. He urged the pledge that the convention had given, not to interfere with the constitution of the state—and said this would be such an interference. He desired peace and reconciliation—but for no purpose of advancement, for he was from a district where the union party had the ascendancy, and would maintain it. But he desired once more to be able to take his old friends by the hand, without feeling that there was something in the bosom of each not as it used to be. He concluded by contending that the convention had no authority from the people of this state, to interfere with the constitution, as that power was not delegated to them, nor were gentlemen sent here to assume it.

At the close of the remarks, Mr. Samuel Warren moved an adjournment to Monday, at 10 o'clock. This motion was followed by a motion for a recess of two hours, which latter motion prevailed, and the convention adjourned to half past 5.

After the recess, the convention met, and after being called to order, Mr. Wilson moved that the ordinance and motion to strike out, be laid on the table, which was carried almost unanimously.

The report of the committee on the Virginia commissioner, and the resolutions submitted therewith, were, on motion, taken up and read by the president; who said, that unless some gentleman should request otherwise, he should put the question on them together. Mr. Perry, from Greenville, rose and moved that they be considered separately; on which, the president put the question on the adoption of the report, which was carried, with only a few nays in opposition. The resolutions were then passed unanimously, and the word "unanimously" ordered to be inserted in them.

Mr. Hamilton's resolution, and Mr. Smith's, as an accompaniment, were then put for adoption, were carried, and the convention adjourned to Monday at 10 o'clock.

Monday, March 18. The convention resumed the consideration of the ordinance on the enforcement bill.

After some remarks by judges Colecock and O'Neale; Mr. Perry, of Greenville, said,—"Every one must wish to see healed, differences that had so divided the state. He had himself exhorted his friends at home to endeavor, now that the causes of these dissensions were removed, to forget and forgive. He had felt gratified at the liberal spirit in which the gentlemen from St. Peter's and St. Helena's (general Hamilton and Mr. Barnwell) had spoken. His friend too on his left, (Mr. Phillips, of Cheraw,) had also spoken in a manner that must have touched the heart of every one who heard him. If that oath [Mr. Perry continued to say] could be stricken out of the ordinance, his people would be satisfied, would be willing to bury in oblivion all that has passed. But if on the contrary, it was adopted, the highest irritation must ensue. He spoke afterwards of Wilkins' bill, which he said would be, beyond doubt, repealed. The present enlightened and patriotic chief magistrate of the nation could never be so very a tyrant as to enforce it, [seeing that it was he who had it passed, it does seem wonderfully improbable, that he has any notion of putting it in force. So, too, gen. Blair, col. Drayton and Mr. Mitchell can clearly have no idea of wishing the bill enforced, although they all voted for it.] "But," [continued Mr. Perry,] "if he should attempt it, I will then, as I have always said, resist tyranny, come from what quarter it may."

Col. John L. Wilson succeeded, and among other things said—You are told that it will make oaths too common. Where were these scruples, when oaths of a very different sort were taken so liberally throughout the state, by the very party that now sticks at a common oath of fidelity to the state.

But is there any gentleman here, who will rise in his place, and say that he will not take this oath? There is none such; and, if there were, it would be precisely for him that such an oath would be indispensable.

He adverted to the notorious state of things, even at this moment existing in various parts of the country, in Chester, where a volunteer regiment was formed on Friday last, to fight against the state. In Charleston, where they avow their military organization, in Horry, where an encampment was lately formed. The party has mustered itself, organized, drilled, received its arms and equipments from the United States arsenal at Augusta. They declare themselves ready to join the United States. Their major general is well known. They have appealed to the president to commission them. They probably have their warrants in their pockets.

But we are appealed to as a "magnanimous party." Magnanimous we are. But let them now show a little magnanimity on their side.

We are threatened with civil war if the state exacts an oath of fidelity from her citizens! If this is cause for civil war, let it come! The sooner the better. It shall be welcome to-morrow. If, on such a cause as this, men are willing to make matter of fraternal slaughter—if there be a party, who hold that an oath to protect their native soil and defend its liberty, is a thing to be resisted, even to brother's blood—why we have nothing left for us, but to cut off this rotten part of the state; and I would do it.

But are we already secure, after all that has threatened us? Is not a sister state even now threatened? Has not the bolt which was hurled at us, fallen upon Georgia?

Her case to-day, may be ours to-morrow. We hang upon the goodness of general Jackson's temper. We depend upon Mr. Pringle's clemency—upon the mercies of every custom house officer, who may misbehave and encounter a quarrel, in the ill performance of his duties.

Mr. Wilson having concluded, the convention took a recess till 4 o'clock.

The ordinance nullifying the "force bill" was then passed—132 to 19.

The report accompanying the ordinance on the force bill, was then taken up and passed by a general vote.

The usual forms of ratification were then gone through; and the minor business of printing, &c. was disposed of.

Gen. Hamilton moved an adjournment, the business of the convention being finished. Upon this the rev. Mr. Ray took his place by the president's side, and performed the final religious duties.

It was then moved and carried that the convention go into committee of the whole: Mr. Turnbull was placed in the chair. The venerable col. Warren then moved a vote of thanks to the president, for the dignity, despatch and impartiality, with which his duties had been performed. The resolution was unanimously adopted, and the committee rose and reported.

The president returned thanks for the honor done him, in one of those spirited and appropriate speeches at which he is always so ready.

The convention then adjourned sine die; or rather, dissolved itself; being so pronounced by the president.

ADDITIONAL ITEMS AND SCRAPS.

The Charleston Mercury of the 21st March, gives the following account of the last moments of the convention at Columbia.

"On the vote of thanks being given to governor Hayne, as president, he briefly and eloquently returned thanks, enjoining upon the members to go home with a disposition to conciliate—but with an inflexible resolution to maintain the principles of the state, remembering that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty—that we have recently gained an advantage, but not a victory—that the bill of blood proves that the Moloch of federal usurpation is not appeased—and that they ought to have it indelibly impressed upon their minds that the great battle is just begun."

"When the motion was made that the convention be finally dissolved, it was opposed by Mr. Phillips, of Georgetown, on the ground that the action of the convention may very shortly be needed on account of the threatened application of the force bill to Georgia—and that therefore it should adjourn, subject to the call of the president and committee. Gen. Hamilton replied that the convention had carried out the purpose for which they had been organized, and ought now to resign the very large powers which the people had confided to them,—and very warmly and eloquently spoke of the co-operation which we would give to Georgia in resisting tyranny. But in this the action of the convention would not be necessary. Our citizens would not wait for it. We would show our gratitude for the generous sympathy of our thorough friends in Georgia—and we would convince those in Georgia who "abhor" nullification, that when they make use of this abhorrent remedy for their own salvation, we will prove, by rushing to their standard, that our attachment to the principle was not affected. This is not even a sketch of his remarks, which were unprenudiated, eloquent and happy. The convention then dissolved itself by a unanimous vote, and the scene closed with prayer by a member, the Rev. Mr. Ray."

The Charleston Courier announces the dissolution of the convention in the following terms:

"The state convention, after nullifying the enforcing bill, and referring the matter of the oath of allegiance to the legislature, put a period to its existence on Monday last. We are truly rejoiced at the death of the many headed monster—it emancipates us from the thralldom of an irresponsible despotism, and restores us to freedom, and places us once more under the safe dominion of the constitution and laws."

The Charleston City Gazette of March 21, says—The convention adjourned on Monday last, and several of the members arrived in town yesterday. Thus ends, we fervently hope forever, the fudge and flummery—the vapor and fury and nonsense of this extraordinary era of political confusion. Happy will it be for us, as a community, if we shall be able in a dozen years, to repair the errors and mend up the evils of a five years' war of expatriation against the influence of reason and common sense!

From the Charleston Courier.

"The greatest objection to the new test oath, is the extreme meanness and wickedness of the design. The open and manifest difference is this:—the union party contend that the constitution of the United States and the laws of the United States passed in pursuance thereof, are the supreme laws of the land, any thing in the law or constitution, or ordinances of any state to the contrary notwithstanding; and they are ready and willing to swear to bear true allegiance to this state, and obey its laws, so far as the same are not incompatible with the aforesaid laws and constitution of the United States. Now, do the nullifiers require more of them? If so, let them, with their boasted chivalry, say so, plainly and manfully, and the union party will cram their oath down their throat at the point of the bayonet."

About the time that the additional companies of United States troops were ordered to Charleston harbor last fall, a considerable force of government troops was concentrated at the arsenal near Augusta, Georgia, under col. Twiggs. By the last Augusta papers, we observe that this force is dispersing, three companies having been ordered by the war department to Fort Mitchell, and two to Tellico Plains.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The importance of the following proceedings, &c. induces us to give them at considerable length. They are necessary to a right understanding of the present state of things.

Earl Gray's bill—house of lords, Feb. 12.

The preamble commences by averring that there is now prevalent, in certain parts of Ireland, a dangerous conspiracy against the rights of property, and the administration of the laws, thereby rendering the laws now in force inadequate to preserve the public tranquillity; in consequence whereof—

1. Authority is given to the lord lieutenant to suppress the meeting of any association or body of men in Ireland that he may deem dangerous to the public safety, and such meeting shall be deemed an unlawful assembly, and every person present punishable as for a misdemeanor.

2. Two or more justices of the peace may repair to any room or place, (with necessary assistance), where they believe such a meeting to be assembled, and if refused admittance, enter by force, and thereupon, in the name of the king, order the persons present, to disperse; and on refusal or neglect within fifteen minutes so to disperse, they may be apprehended and tried in a summary way by two justices, and on conviction, be imprisoned three months for the first, and a year for the second or any subsequent like offence.

3. The third section provides that the person prosecuted shall plead to the indictment forthwith.

4. That the lord lieutenant, with the advice of the privy council of Ireland, may issue his proclamation, declaring any county or portion thereof to be in such a state of disturbance and insubordination as to require the application of the provisions of this act.

5. That the inhabitants of such disturbed districts shall be warned by the proclamation, not only to refrain attending any seditious meeting, but "to be and remain within their respective habitations at all hours between sunset and sunrise from and after such day as shall be named therein for that purpose."

6. Declares the mode of publishing a disturbed district by affixing a copy upon a prescribed public place.

7. Enjoins all public officers and functionaries of the government, civil, and military, charged with the administration and execution of the laws, to take the most vigorous measures to suppress all insurrectionary movements and outrages.

8. Constitutes the Dublin Gazette the official medium and evidence of the authenticity of such proclamation.

9. Prohibits the meeting of any assembly or body of men in any such proclaimed district, under the pretence of petitioning parliament, or for the purpose of discussing the subject of any alleged public grievance, or matter in church or state, unless a written notice, stating the object, and naming the day, hour and place, shall have been given, ten days before the time appointed for holding it, and without such notice, the meeting shall be deemed an unlawful assembly, and the persons present punishable as for a misdemeanor.

10. That the lord lieutenant may appoint by warrant so many commissioned officers of the army of Ireland, as he may think fit, for the cognizance, trial and punishment of all such offences committed within the disturbed districts; with a proviso as to their qualifications.

11. That of the persons so appointed, any number not less than five nor more than nine shall be deemed a court martial for the hearing, trying and punishing of such offences, with all the powers incident, not only the courts martial, but to the civil tribunals; and with authority also, to try summarily, and pass sentence and judgment as in the courts of law.

12. Provides for the appointment of a judge advocate by the lord lieutenant.

13. Prescribes the oath to the members of the court martial.

14. Confers the power of conclusive determination upon a majority of such court.

15. Authorises such courts martial to issue orders to bring before them all persons charged with offences against this act, and requires all sheriffs and ministers of justice to enforce and obey them.

16. Empowers courts martial to summon and secure the attendance of witnesses to testify in all cases before them.

17. Enumerates six or seven acts, besides the present, for a violation of which persons may be tried and punished, in the disturbed districts, by courts martial; with a proviso limiting their powers to sentence of transportation for life, or a period not less than seven years, in all cases whereby in the acts here-in referred to, the punishment of death was prescribed.

18. That the magistrates may apprehend and commit to prison any person within such proclaimed district, who may be in the fields, streets, highways, or elsewhere out of his or her dwelling or place of abode, between sunset and sunrise, and the persons so committed shall be tried by a court martial.

19. Empowers justices of the peace, at any time from one hour after sunset to sunrise, to demand admission, and on refusal, to enter forcibly any house in such proclaimed district, to search whether the inmates be absent, or have any arms, ammunition, or weapons concealed therein, with the usual reference of delinquency, to trial by a court martial.

20. Makes it penal to have the possession of any arms, ammunition, pike, pike-head, spear, dirk, or other offensive weapon, unless such arms, &c. were concealed in their house without their privacy or knowledge.

21. The selling or distribution of any seditious paper or hand-bill, is made punishable by a court martial, by imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months.

22. Injury or intimidation of a juror, witness or prosecutor, either in his person or property, punishable by transportation for not less than seven, nor more than fourteen years, on conviction by a court martial.

23. Renders all proceedings done under this act uncontrollable by "any court of the United Kingdom having jurisdiction civil or criminal"—providing that the military persons charged with the execution of this act shall be responsible therefor to courts martial, and may be tried thereby according to the rules and articles of war.

24. Authorises the public officers to detain offenders in any part of Ireland, and the lord lieutenant by warrant to change the persons having such offenders in custody.

25. Provides for the transmission of the copies of such warrants to the clerk of the crown in Dublin.

26. Praise-swearing under this act is made perjury and punishable as such.

27. Provides that it shall be held to be a good return to any writ of habeas corpus, sued out within three months after his arrest, that the prisoner is detained by virtue of this act, and on such return it shall not be necessary to bring up the body.

28. Offences under this act are not bailable, but the person charged shall have a right to be tried within three month after his arrest.

29. Provides for the execution of the law by magistrates in counties next adjoining their own.

30. Similar powers conferred on magistrates of towns or cities, as on magistrates of counties at large.

31. Limits to three months the prosecution for all offences under this act in other than the proclaimed counties.

32. Provides that where a defendant is acquitted of a prosecution as mentioned in the preceding section, treble costs shall be allowed on the certificate of the judge.

33. Provides that for probable cause certified as above, six pence damages and no costs shall be allowed for a prosecution for detaining the person or entering the houses of suspected individuals under this act—but on such certificate that the act was done wilfully or maliciously under the color of the law, the plaintiff shall recover treble costs.

34. Authorises the lord lieutenant, by a new proclamation to revoke a former one, as to the whole or any part of a district.

35. Reserves to the crown the right as heretofore of punishing open enemies or traitors by martial law.

36. Provides in blank for the duration of the act.

House of lords, Feb. 15.

Earl Grey arose amidst the most profound silence. His lordship requested the clerk to read that part of his majesty's speech relating to the disturbances existing in Ireland. This having been done, the noble earl, evidently much affected, painted in glowing colors the lawless outrages that existed in Ireland, and the painful necessity his majesty's government was under in submitting strong measures for repressing them. We are told that the separation of Ireland is to be effected by agitation, and that the volunteers are the agents for bringing about this end. It is said that no matter what remedial measures are adopted—no matter what abuses are removed—you may abolish parish cess—you may reform the church—you may remove the grievances of the grand jury system—but no matter what you do for the peace and happiness of Ireland, nothing will satisfy the volunteers, but the repeal of the legislative union. But what was the nature of that society of volunteers? It was modelled upon the volunteer society of 1782. It was to consist of district associations, subordinate to a committee sitting in Dublin. It was to undertake the pacification of Ireland, to put down tumults—to supersede the necessity of the police, to hold meetings simultaneously with the sessions and assizes, (hear),—to determine quarrels—and to put an instrument of pacification into the hands of the liberator. It was not to be an armed association until the law should allow it. The accredited agent of the learned gentleman—sent under the name of a pacificator to organize the subordinate societies—declared, at a public meeting in the county of Clare, that if it should be necessary, as it had been in the year 1798, to supply the volunteers with pikes, Daniel O'Connell would send the men of Clare into his own wood at Lough O'Connell, to cut pike handles (hear, hear, hear). But it was the duty of the government to take care that there should be no pikes—and that associations so organized, and for such objects, should be put down (hear, hear). Was it to be wondered at that, whilst such associations were in progress, while such declarations were addressed to them, there should be a general resistance to the law, that the payment of tithes should be suspended—that the collectors of tithes, and even of rent, should be assaulted, if not murdered? Although these outrages did not prevail over all Ireland, they pervaded a considerable portion of the country; and it was in the nature of such disorders to increase and extend themselves, if they were not timely and vigorously put down (hear). The whole of Leinster was in this state; and in Munster, the counties of Cork and Tipperary, were similarly situated; as was also the province of Ulster, to a great extent, especially in the county of Louth; and their lordships had heard from a noble lord behind him what was the condition of many parts of Connaught. Their lordships would see that the association of volunteers were connected with these outrages, from the fact that they increased as it was spread, and that they had the same objects which it avowedly sought. It was true that the founders of that society disclaimed the use of all but peaceable and legal means; but it was evident, from the violence of the language that they employed in the work of excitement and agitation, that they availed themselves of this profession of pacification for their own protection, whilst they well knew that it would not serve to curb the ignorant people whom they inflamed, nor to protect them from the consequence of their violence. The noble lord then quoted from the public papers, and from the correspondence of the Irish government, numerous instances of the persecution of witnesses and jurors in cases of prosecution connected with the outrages of the illegal associations, and contended for the necessity of immediately employing some means of putting an end to this system of intimidation. The noble earl stated many cases to show the gross violation of the laws, and that, from the state of society, the laws at present in force could not be executed. Witnesses dared not give their evidence, nor juries find a verdict of guilty. The present state of Ireland was, in fact, so disturbed, property and life so unprotected, that he thought their lordships would not hesitate to adopt the measures he was about to propose. It did not appear that these outrages were confined to any class of men. Government had been unwilling to introduce a measure of the description; they now felt it their duty, however, to lay it before their lordships. All the powers at present possessed by the executive had been found ineffectual to preserve order and enforce the due administration of the laws in Ireland. This bill which he was about to bring in had for its object in the first place to suppress all dangerous and illegal associations. To suppress, if possible, all attempts at outrage and violence. The bill would contain various provisions of acts passed at different periods by both the English and Irish parliaments, particularly that passed in the 8th of George the Fourth, commonly called the proclamation act, which had for its object the suppression of all illegal meetings. That act also prohibited any one being out without giving a sufficient excuse, between sunset and sunrise. His majesty's government as he before informed their lordships, were very reluctant, and it was with much pain that they felt called upon to ask for extraordinary powers for the executive of Ireland. The first enactment of the present measure was to prohibit all meetings to petition parliament, or to discuss public grievances and public acts, unless ten days notice was previously given. (Hear, hear, hear). The insurrection act authorised all offences against its provision to be tried at the sessions, before the magistrates, who had the power to sentence offenders to transportation. Now, in the present state of Ireland, his majesty's ministers did not think fit that this power should any longer be exercised by the magistrates. (Hear, hear). The trial of all offences against this act was proposed should, to a certain extent be subject to martial law. (Loud cries of "hear, hear.") The courts, however, would be so constructed, that he did not fear that the powers would be unfairly exercised; the act would contain security against unfairness; at the same time he hoped they would be effectual in enforcing obedience to the laws. It would be imperative that in all these courts a sergeant at law or king's counsel should preside as judge advocate and they would otherwise be so constructed as no fear of any abuse of power could be anticipated. All persons found abroad between sunset and sunrise, all absent from their homes without cause, and those who had arms in their houses, would be subject to this act. All persons distributing seditious papers, any attempts to injure the person or property of jurors, prosecutors, or witnesses, should also come within the provisions of this act. The noble lord referred to another provision in the former act, protecting the officers of courts martial from future prosecutions. This was essential for their protection, and would be embraced in the present bill, though the officers would nevertheless be subject to have their conduct examined by a proper court martial. He trusted these measures would be found effectual to suppress the existing outrages in Ireland; and he should be happy when the time arrived that the proposed measures of severity might with safety be repealed. If a writ of habeas corpus should be issued for any person arrested under the provisions of this act, it should be a sufficient return to the writ that the person was arrested under the authority of the act. He thought these measures would be sufficient. They were severe powers, but the necessity of the case seemed to require them, and by which necessity alone they could be justified. The question for their lordships was, whether or not a case had been made out for such a suspension of the ordinary laws as all legitimate governments have been at times compelled to resort to, for the safety of the state, and on the principle salus populi suprema lex. The next measure which his majesty's ministers thought it necessary to introduce, but separately from the present bill, was an act for changing the venue in the cases of all trials where any species of intimidation had been used to influence jurors or witnesses. (Hear, hear, hear). Apologizing for so long detaining their lordships and thanking them for patient hearing, the noble lord concluded by moving for leave to bring in the bill.

Lord Longford, in alluding to the agitation that had been described to exist—said it had first of all been invited by a noble marquis, who requested a correspondent to "agitate—agitate—agitate."

The duke of Wellington said, the question was, did ministers mean to do—were they intent on doing—their duty towards the country in bringing forward this measure? If they were, then it was useless to go back to former proceedings. The duty of the house was to meet the state of things in Ireland at the present moment. (Hear). In his opinion, that state of things rendered the proposed measure imperatively necessary. (Hear). If the recall of the present lord lieutenant, or any other measure of that kind, could render such a proceeding as that now contemplated unnecessary, he would immediately say, "adopt that course." (Hear, hear). But, as it appeared to him, looking fairly at the question, the present measure was absolutely necessary. (Hear, hear). He cared not from what cause the present state of things in Ireland arose. It was sufficient for him that it existed; and seeing that government grounded their call for this measure on that state of things, he should, without looking to one side or to the other—he should, without advert to what had passed heretofore, give them his support on this occasion. (Hear, hear). He considered the measure to be essentially necessary; and on that ground alone he should support it. (Hear, hear). He was certainly sorry that such a measure had not been brought forward formerly, but he was extremely glad that it was now introduced. (Hear, hear). He had looked at the bill, and he thought that it required some amendments. It was his intention, in the committee, to move that courts martial should be appointed on the principle recognized in the mutiny bill. There were also some parts of the bill which did not, in his opinion, give sufficient powers for the purpose of putting down the particular evils that afflicted Ireland. He would not, however, on the present occasion discuss those points. He hoped the committee on the bill would sit on the earliest possible day, and he should then declare his opinion more in detail.

Lord Uxbridge replied to the Earl of Longford, with reference to the words "agitate, agitate, agitate."

The Earl of Eldon shortly supported the measure, observing that nothing but the present extraordinary circumstances could warrant it. It should only continue, however, as long as the evil existed.

Earl Grey said that it was only a measure of necessity, and was not intended to continue longer than till the end of the next session. He hoped to be able to move for its repeal before then.

Lord Brougham said that he fully concurred in the measure. The crown was an usurper instead of a governor, if it claimed allegiance without granting protection. Had a less extensive measure been adopted, constitutional principles would have been violated, and the object would not have been attained. He had the most unbounded confidence in the measure, and in the hands of those who would execute it. He also approved of it because it was accomplished by measures of relief.

Lord Ellenborough supported the measure, although he wished for documentary evidence of its necessity.

Lord Cloncurry looked on it with great anxiety and alarm. The marquis of Lansdowne supported the measure.

After a few more observations the bill was read a first time, and the house adjourned.

Monday, Feb. 18.—Lord Grey moved the second reading of the bill.

The earl of Wicklow approved of the measures proposed, but regretted they had not been brought forward before.

The earl of Longford condemned the continuance of the marquis of Anglesey in the government of Ireland.

Lord Roden supported the bill, on the ground that such coercive measures were now become necessary.

The marquis of Clanricarde defended the conduct of the marquis of Anglesey.

The duke of Wellington considered the present measure to be essentially necessary; but suggested some amendments that might be proposed in the committee.

Earl Grey replied, and thanked the noble duke for his suggestions.

The bill was then read a second time, nem. con.

[Previous to the final passage of the bill, it underwent some important alterations, with the consent of earl Grey—one of these allows counsel to prisoners before courts martial, which had not formerly been permitted: the accused was obliged, previously to the passage of this law, to submit his questions in all cases to the presiding officer, in writing.]

The (Irish) suppression bill. In the house of lords, Feb. 22.—Earl Grey moved the order of the day for the third reading of the above bill.

Lord Teynham said he should strongly protest against this bill, as a gross infringement of the constitution of England and Ireland. "The union, the inviolate union of England and Ireland, was worthy the strenuous support of every rightly thinking man. It was that union which constituted the great strength and force of the empire, and which placed this country in the proud situation in which it had long stood, as one of the first, if not the very first power in Europe. Could this bill, he would ask, have the effect of consolidating that union? Would it not, on the contrary, give rise to a spirit of resistance in every part of Ireland? It was a measure which he deeply deplored, and he believed that ministers (as honest ministers, he admitted, as ever this country saw), in bringing forward such a bill, were acting under some delusion or another; God only knew what! He hoped, from the enlightened and liberal feelings of the day, that prosecutions before courts martial would not be carried into effect. Formerly, when such a measure as this was contemplated, a report and evidence were laid before the house, in order to justify the proceeding; but nothing of the kind was done in this instance. Humble individual as he was in that house, he would raise his voice against such a measure; because it appeared to him to be opposed to the constitution of the country, and contrary to the interests of the British empire. He therefore, could not let it pass without declaring his sentiments.

The earl of Westmoreland said it was not his intention to offer a remark which the present occasion would not justify. After the able exposition of this subject by the noble earl (Grey) he thought that no man who gave due consideration to those illegal meetings and dreadful outrages which had been described, could question the necessity of this measure. After the statement made to the house by the noble earl, in which he explained the grounds on which he rested his measure, it did appear to him that no man could fairly question its justice, or the necessity which called for it. He could almost wish that it had passed without any observation or alteration. Both the loyal people in this country and in Ireland, and even the deluded and misled peasantry themselves, who were at present the victims of the machinations of artful men, ought to give thanks to the noble earl, for the firm and decided manner in which this subject had been brought forward, and he hoped the noble earl would not be displeased, if he ventured to add his individual thanks to those of the country. He would also venture to add the individual thanks of all his [lord Westmoreland's] noble colleagues, with whom he had acted so long during the reign of the late king, George III. when they also had been compelled reluctantly to call for additional powers.

He thanked the noble earl in the names of a noble marquis, of a noble earl, (we believe Bathurst), of viscount Sidmouth, and of the duke of Portland, who, in times the circumstances of which were similar to the present, stood forward to require powers such as were now sought for by his majesty's ministers. Whatever obliquity might formerly have been cast on those who demanded additional powers, they only required them out of regard for the laws of order and for the preservation of their country, under the particular circumstances in which the empire was placed. He thought that thanks were due to ministers for adopting such a course; and putting aside all other considerations, for having, when they found themselves thus circumstanced, brought forward a measure which, in his opinion, was a right and proper one. By thus proceeding they had justified him and his noble colleagues, for having on former occasions pursued the same line of conduct. Whatever were the charges that might be advanced against noble lords opposite, that was not the time for them. The question now was whether they should not all join in endeavoring to restore Ireland to allegiance to his majesty. Upon these grounds, differing as he did upon many points from the noble lord opposite, he should vote for the bill.

The bill was then read a third time and passed, and ordered to be carried to the commons.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Lord Althorp moved that the suppression bill should be read a first time on the 27th Feb.

Mr. H. Grant said, that without wishing to enter into the debate, he would enter his protest against the bill.

Mr. Hume wished to know when the house might expect the remedial measure which the government had promised. He hoped that the house would not pass the present bill until the others were passed, or at least until they were satisfied that they would pass, lest they should render themselves liable to be charged with passing only the coercive measure. The experience of last year, was not to be lost upon him. The government then told the house that remedial measures should be passed with the coercive measure. The latter was passed, but the house never saw the others. [Hear.]

Lord Althorp said that a bill which he intended as a remedial measure, namely, that for getting rid of the collection of tithes under the former system, was passed during the last session. If gentlemen chose to put a different interpretation on what ministers said, from that which they intended them to bear, it was not their fault. The report of the tithe committee, if it had been examined, would have shown what was the nature of the remedial measure which the government intended to propose upon that occasion. With respect to the remedial measure at present in contemplation, he had stated a day or two ago, that he hoped to be able to introduce the bill for church reform by the end of next week, and the bill for amending the grand jury system by the middle of the week. It was for the house to decide whether they had sufficient confidence in ministers to believe that they were in earnest, when they said they would carry through the remedial measures. [Hear, hear.]

Mr. O'Connell said, the members of that house might be disposed to place the fullest confidence in the intention of ministers, and to believe that they had the power of carrying their remedial measures through that house, but ministers would not insinuate that they could control another assembly. [Hear.] Could it be said, that in another place any measure advantageous to Ireland was certain of passing? Any thing disadvantageous to her, was, he knew, sure to pass, any measure springing from malignant hatred of that country ["hear" and murmurs.] No more on that point. He understood from the noble lord a few nights since, that he expected to have been able to introduce the grand jury bill during the week.

Lord Althorp. I said next week.

Mr. O'Connell said he understood the noble lord differently, but no matter: he rose on the present occasion principally for the purpose of apologising to his constituents for permitting one vote respecting this despotic bill to pass without discussing it; but as the noble lord had complied with the suggestion of many persons opposed to the measure, by postponing the first reading till Wednesday, he would abstain from entering into any debate respecting it, contenting himself with giving notice that he would move a call of the house for Wednesday, and would repeat the call whenever he thought he perceived any relaxation of its effects as long as the bill was before the house. Once more he must apologise to his constituents for allowing the bill to be mentioned in the house without raising his voice against it. The phrase "the madness of slavery" was cheered once in that house. He felt the madness of slavery coming over him then. He would proceed no farther.

Mr. Stanley said that the honorable and learned member had made one observation by which he appeared necessarily to connect two measures which had no connexion with each other. Undoubtedly ministers had declared—and if some parties had given them more confidence for their good intentions, and would wait with a little more patience to see whether they would perform their promises, instead of exciting violent opposition before they knew what the conduct of government was likely to be, it might have tended more to the peace of Ireland; undoubtedly ministers had held forth an expectation that it was then their intention, acting on the principles which they had always professed, that he would venture to say, on which they had already acted, to direct their attention to the remedy of the real and acknowledged grievances of Ireland. So anxious had they been to prove to the house and the country that they were not putting forth mere professions, that they had taken the earliest possible opportunity after the opening of the session to declare the measures which it was their intention to propose to parliament. Those measures had been acknowledged by the reluctant consent of the honorable and learned member himself, which he now vainly attempted to retract, to be real and substantial measures of relief, and remedies for abuses. At the same time that ministers announced these measures they applied to parliament for another measure—which they had late asked for and reluctantly resorted to—when it was imperiously called for, not for the maintenance of the present administration, but for the maintenance of any administration, and which, he declared to God, he would not have asked for, sitting on the benches where he did, if he would not have voted for sitting on those opposed to him. [Cheers.]

If any administration, let it have been formed of what party it might, had, in the present state of Ireland, proposed the measure which it was his painful duty to have recommended, in office or out of office, he would equally have supported that measure, which he held to be not of a coercive but of a protective nature. [Cheers.] But although it was right that the house and country should know what remedial measure it was proposed should accompany the restrictive but necessary measures, it was not necessary that two sets of measures should move part passu, side by side through both houses of parliament. The honorable and learned member said that the government could not carry those measures for the benefit of Ireland, through the other house. Speaking in the name of the cabinet, he said that the government was pledged to carry those measures through. If they could not carry the remedial as well as the painful and coercive measures, they were no longer a government—they could not continue to sit on those benches. [Cheers.] He said that if they were unable to carry their measures through, they were not only unable to exercise, but unworthy of exercising the functions of a government; and he should hold himself disgraced by continuing to hold the situation which he filled under such an administration. [Cheers.] Government therefore was pledged to this—that both the remedial and the coercive measure should pass.

They were bound by their character, they were bound by their situations—they were bound by their honor as gentlemen—to carry them through; and if they failed in doing so, they could not continue to hold their situations—they could not call upon the house to place confidence in them. [Cheers.] That was the line of policy which government meant to pursue; but he could not stop to inquire whether this measure or that measure should be passed first or last,—it was sufficient to state that if they could not carry every thing they proposed, they were no longer the government of the country. The two sets of measures were independent of each other, but the rejection of either would equally establish this fact, that the administration did not possess the confidence of the two houses of parliament, and therefore could not continue to conduct the affairs of the country. [Cheers.]

Mr. Baldwin. The right honorable gentleman said that he would not continue to be a minister of the crown unless he could carry his coercive measures. Now, he [Dr. Baldwin] thought that he was not worthy to be a minister if he attempted to carry them. No minister was worthy of the confidence of parliament, or the support of the crown, who should endeavor to deprive the Irish people of their rights and privileges. The coercive measures would encounter from him, and other Irish members representing popular constituencies, the utmost possible opposition. He charged the right honorable secretary openly in the face of the house and country, with having, in the remedial measures which were about to be introduced, "kept the word of promise to the ear" of Ireland, and broken it to her hope. [Hear.] The remedial measures would be perfectly nugatory if accompanied with the coercive measures. He could assure ministers that these coercive measures would do more to dissolve the ties which bound Ireland to England than any thing else could possibly do. The Irish people possessed a spirit which would not bow down to tyranny. If the right honorable secretary wished to maintain the union, let him treat the Irish people as he would treat the people of England. Before it was too late he called upon the government to retrace their steps.

Mr. P. Howard, said that the right hon. secretary had not said that he would not continue to be a minister of the crown unless he could carry the coercive measures, but unless he could carry the remedial measure also. Gentlemen might attack government if they pleased, but at all events they should proceed upon correct premises.

Mr. Sheil said that in consequence of the declaration of the right honorable gentleman that he and his colleagues would not remain in office unless they carried their remedial measures, he begged to know what became of a portion of the remedial measures which were introduced last session, to which the government were repeatedly pledged, and which passed through the house of commons—he meant the bill for assimilating the mode of calling juries in England and Ireland? The noble lord said, in the most emphatic manner, that the government was pledged to carry that bill. Where was it now? Had the pledge given by the noble lord been fulfilled? Why had that measure been relinquished? It was left to a committee. Had that committee made any report? Had the government, in this instance, acted on the principle so eloquently laid down by the right honorable secretary?

Lord Althorp admitted that he had given the pledge to which the learned member referred, and he had done so with perfect sincerity, and with full confidence that it would be redeemed. [Hear.] He expected the measure would have been carried; but, at the same time, he must fairly acknowledge he did not consider, from the circumstances under which he failed in fulfilling the pledge that he was so far compromised as to render it impossible for him to remain a member of the government. [Hear, hear.] He might be wrong in having come to that conclusion, but he had arrived at it after the best consideration which he was able to give the subject, and he would now admit that the pledge must be redeemed in the course of the present session. [Hear, hear.]

An honorable member said that if the remedial measure should pass, the coercive measures would be unnecessary.

Mr. O'Connell denied that he ever made his opposition dependent on the success of what the right honorable secretary was pleased to call his remedial measures. The right honorable secretary quite mistook him if he supposed him to say that his opposition to the coercive measures would be in one degree mitigated by the success of the remedial ones. He did not expect because he had yielded to the impulse of a feeling of gratitude towards those whom he considered to be the enemies of his country, to be tainted with the approbation he had bestowed upon some of the measures of government, and to have his conduct in that respect flung back at him in the way it had been by the right honorable secretary.

Mr. Stanley said that he understood the honorable and learned member to have expressed his doubts as to whether the ministers possessed the power of carrying their remedial measures through the house of lords.

Mr. O'Connell admitted that he had done so, but not as a ground for opposing the coercive measures.

Mr. Finn entreated English members not to deceive themselves with respect to the feeling of the Irish people. No remedial measure would be received with gratitude in Ireland, if accompanied by coercive measures. The people of Ireland loved liberty too much to accept any thing as a substitute for it.

Mr. Fergus O'Connell said that notwithstanding the right hon. gentleman had, with his usual indiscretion provoked discussion, he would abstain from entering upon any debatable topics, and would merely remind the house of the words formerly used by the right honorable paymaster of the forces, that "it was impossible for the whisper of a faction to prevail against the voice of a nation." [Hear.]

The bill was then ordered to be printed, and to be read a first time on Wednesday next.

LETTER FROM D. O'CONNELL.
Addressed to a gentleman in Dublin.

14, Albemarle street, London, Saturday.

I proposed to myself to send you for publication, on Monday, an address to the Irish people, on the present truly awful crisis of public affairs, but I have been occupied with conferences all day, with Irish and British members of the commons—and I derive much consolation from being able to tell you, that not only are the popular Irish members firm and unanimous, but that there are a greater number far than I could possibly expect of the British members, determined to resist the atrocious tyranny with which earl Grey has the unheard-of audacity to dare to threaten Ireland. Talk of an union, indeed, between the countries, after presuming to attempt to outlaw the inhabitants of one great portion of the empire!!

But the extreme despotism of the proposed measures has a tendency to disgust every friend of liberty, and in England we shall certainly get support out of doors.

In the meantime, pray use any name to conjure the people, first, to be perfectly peaceable—no outbreak—no violence; on the contrary, prove the absolute madness of doing the business of our enemies, by any species of violation of the law. Secondly, get the clergy, if possible, and the laity, unanimously to petition. Petition—petition—petition against these measures. Let us have firm, respectful, strong petitions from every part of Ireland.

"Let there be no despair—the constitutional battle for Irish liberty is not yet lost—neither shall it be, with the blessing of God. I repeat, let no man despair; on the contrary, call on the friends of freedom to insist that their representatives shall do their duty.

"I have not time this day to write more, Let 'peace, order and constitutional exertion' be our motto.

"Believe me, &c.

DANIEL O'CONNELL."

Dublin, February 20. Ever since the announcement of the contemplated coercive measures this metropolis has been in a state of unusual agitation. Yesterday a meeting of the trade of tailors, to petition for a repeal of the union, took place at the Arena. It was intended as the prelude to petitions from all other trades on this topic, but now that course has been abandoned, in the uncertainty that hangs over the future fate of this kingdom. Yesterday also a meeting of the volunteers took place, but soon afterwards adjourned, the members declaring that they could not trust themselves to speak or act upon such an eventful crisis without further deliberation.—They met again to-day. To-morrow a great and general meeting of the citizens is summoned to take into consideration the impending measures, and concert measures to avert the danger. The members of the volunteers will be the principal actors, and it is understood that urgent remonstrances to parliament will be adopted, together with strong recommendations to the various constituencies throughout the country to react on their representatives, and urge them to oppose the measures of lord Grey to the utmost. All yesterday and to-day a visible increase in the demand for gold at the bank of Ireland is evident, but it amounts to nothing of consequence yet. The majority of the citizens, as well as the peasantry, wait for O'Connell's advice, (or indeed command), in cases of this nature, before they decide on taking such a step. But if he says, "go to the bank for gold," every one will run there from the very natural apprehension that his voice will influence the majority, and that those who hesitate may be too late.

London, February 24. We have received intelligence of a very important nature from Birmingham. The political union met on Tuesday, and resolved to call on all the constituencies of England to urge their representatives to oppose the Irish coercion bill. Mr. De Roseo Attwood said a new field of agitation was opened to them on which he entered with a heavy heart; a grand public meeting was fixed for Monday next, and much excitement is felt on the subject.

BRITISH WEST INDIES.

These islands continue to be much agitated. Their vicinity, and other circumstances, gives us much interest in their affairs. A reformed parliament has met in England—and the session will hardly pass without new causes of excitement.

PROCLAMATION BY THE KING.

"William R.—Whereas, it hath been represented to us, that divers of our subjects resident in our island of Jamaica, hath associated themselves together into certain voluntary societies, under the name of colonial church unions, or other similar designations, and that public meetings of such societies have been holden in different parts of our said island, on which occasions, resolutions have been entered into for the forcible removal from our said island, of divers teachers and ministers of religion, dissenting from the doctrine or discipline of the established church of England and Ireland. And whereas it hath been further represented to us, that the several resolutions aforesaid have been printed and dispersed throughout the said island, to the great disquiet and alarm, not only of such religious teachers as aforesaid, and of their several congregations, but of all other peaceable and well disposed inhabitants of our said island. And whereas such proceedings as aforesaid are contrary to law, and tend to the imminent danger of the public peace in our said island. Now, therefore, we do hereby declare and make known to all whom it may concern, that we are purposed and firmly resolved, in the exercise of our lawful authority, to maintain within our said island, the principles of religious toleration, and to protect and defend all our subjects and others resident there, in the public worship of Almighty God, according to their own consciences, although such worship may not be conducted according to the doctrines or discipline of the church of England and Ireland aforesaid, so long as such persons shall conform and be obedient to the laws. And we do hereby admonish all persons resident within our said island, that if any attempts shall be made to carry into effect any such resolution as aforesaid, for the forcible removal from our said island of any such teachers and ministers as aforesaid; or if any such society, or any other persons within our said island, shall republish any such illegal resolution as aforesaid, that then, and in every such case, we will enforce against all persons presuming so to offend, all such pains and penalties as they may incur by such their offences; And we do hereby strictly warn and admonish our subjects, and all others resident within the said island, that they do abstain from associating themselves with any society formed, or which may be formed for any such illegal purpose as aforesaid, as they will answer the contrary to us, at their peril."

Were it not for the late ravings of the millifiers of South Carolina against president Jackson's proclamation, our readers could form no adequate idea of the violence and asperity of the strictures lavished on the royal one, in Jamaica, or of the personal invective directed against the earl of Mulgrave, the governor, for the congruous circular which he issued. The Royal Gazette is alone moderate. We take the annexed articles from that paper of the 2d instant.

"Public feeling, both in town and country, has been very much excited by the proclamation and circular issued by his excellency the governor on Saturday last. Such an event was to be expected, but notwithstanding that excitement and the present prevalent irritation, it becomes the duty of all to render due obedience to the laws, to venerate the constitution of their country, whilst at the same time they resolve to maintain, by every proper, legal and constitutional means, their rights, privileges, and property. We sincerely trust that no infraction of the public peace will occur, nor will our friends and countrymen abandon their reason and judgment, but dispassionately adopt such plans as will secure their rights without violating the laws of the land. The present circumstances, welfare and tranquillity of the island render such a line of conduct imperatively necessary; when these are consulted, when certain possible events are duly regarded, we feel confident that the respectable portion of the inhabitants of this island will listen to the voice of prudence, and pursue only those means for the attainment of their permanent security which are consonant with the laws, and accord with their judgment and reason. Peace and unanimity should be inscribed on the banners of the friends and sons of Jamaica.

"The attorney general has sent out an indictment against the editor of the Despatch, for certain remarks published by him in his paper of the 24th ult. relative to the proclamation of Saturday last, and his excellency's administration of the government of this island. It was rumored to-day that our neighbors of the Continent would be in for a similar treat.

"It is reported that the attorney general intends to prosecute Mr. Marsden, for having lusted at his excellency, the governor, while proceeding to inspect the troops in the barrack square at Spanish-Town, on Monday last."

We subjoin a few effusions of the Courant's splendid bile.

"A report was current in town yesterday, that commodore Farquhar would proceed in a few days to the north side, in his majesty's ship Blanche, with a detachment of one of the regiments stationed here, for the purpose of affording protection to the babes of grace, the Baptist preachers. If the commodore is sent upon such a service, he will do his duty, however repugnant to his feelings it may be, to give support to men whom he has already declared, had, by their preaching and teaching, occasioned the late rebellion."

"We were assured yesterday, that the earl of Mulgrave's departure from this island will take place in March next. We do not vouch for the fact, but of this we are certain—that although his arrival was hailed with delight by every class of our inhabitants, that a double portion of rejoicing would take place on his embarking for his native shores. If lord Mulgrave reposes on a bed of thorns, he has prepared it for himself; for no governor ever arrived in Jamaica, whose presence was more welcomed; and we regret the change of sentiment, as well as the cause of it. Lord Mulgrave rides a high horse; but he will soon find, if he has not already found it out, that the inhabitants of Jamaica will allow no individual, however high in rank, or transcendent his talents, to gallop rough-shod over them. Lord Mulgrave has made the attempt; and a little time will show him how far he ought to proceed on his reckless course."

—From the London Guardian of Jan. 29.

The West India interest were thrown into considerable alarm yesterday by a report that it was the intention of ministers to introduce a bill into the new parliament for the immediate emancipation of the slaves in the West Indies. It was stated that the purport of the bill was to limit the existence of slavery in the colonies to three years, and that it was not the intention of the government to offer any compensation to the planters or proprietors.

In consequence of these rumors, a deputation of gentlemen connected with the West Indies waited upon lord Grey, and had an audience of the noble earl at the treasury yesterday afternoon. They requested to be informed whether it was true that it was the intention of the government to emancipate the slave population? The answer, we understand was in the affirmative; and that a bill for that purpose would, on an early day, be submitted to the consideration of the new parliament. It was also intimated that three years would be the period fixed for the extinction of slavery—that the emancipation of the negroes would be unconditional, and that no compensation, except under special circumstances, would be allowed.

Upon it being represented to the noble earl, the probable consequence which might ensue in the colonies in case those measures were prematurely announced, his lordship intimated that the government were prepared to meet the exigencies, and that an imposing force, consisting of 15,000 men would forthwith be sent to the West Indies.

The Globe of the same evening declared that "the reported conversation with lord Grey was not entitled to the least credit." The Times of Wednesday gave the following, as containing the substance of the interesting conversation between the premier and the deputation:—

Some excitement has been produced among the West India interest, by statements put forth of what is supposed to have occurred at an interview of some of the leading members of that body with lord Grey yesterday at the treasury.

Those statements are, however, generally incorrect and greatly exaggerated in those respects where they have any foundation. In reply to a question put to him by the deputation, what was really said by the minister, was to the effect that the cabinet had under their consideration a plan to set at rest the question of negro emancipation, in which the interests of the proprietors as well as that of the slave was considered, but that with regard to the reports in circulation on the subject, and which led, it appears, to the deputation, he should neither confirm nor contradict them. As to the order in council of November, 1831, now virtually in abeyance, having been modified in the crown colonies, and rejected by those possessing legislative assemblies, the adoption of it, it is understood, will not be pressed upon them. It remains, as yet, unsettled in the cabinet whether the renewal shall take place of the committees of the houses of lords and commons, appointed last session to inquire into the laws and usages of the several West India colonies in relation to the slave population. Lord Grey remarked that he did not see the utility of them, but that he would confer with his colleagues on the subject.

A sub-sequent number of the Times says—

"We would strongly recommend to our correspondent to dismiss at once from his mind the expectation which seems so strongly to possess it, that compensation will be awarded to the slave owners. The slave owners have certainly, in strict law, a property in their slaves. The owners of Gatton, Dunwich and Old Sarum, had also a legal property in their boroughs, but property based on the violation of the claims of humanity is no more sacred than that founded on the violation of constitutional principles. Public opinion blasted the claims of the boroughmongers before the annihilating sweep of schedule A, and no man dared ask an indemnity for the money value of a flagrant instrument of wrong. The public voice has denounced with equal emphasis and indignation the disgusting system of slavery; and our opinion decidedly is, that neither the parliament nor the people of England will listen to any arrangement which admits the claims of the dealers in human flesh, though a bona fide price may have been given for that flesh."

The following plan, to supersede slave labor, in part, is, according to Edin's Messenger, to be tried.

Alteration in the sugar trade. A plan to alter the sugar trade, to change the colonial system entirely, and to reduce the demand for slave labor, has been submitted to his majesty's ministers, and to the leading houses in the West India trade; the question is entertained by the ministry, and the planters are represented as being favorable to the new system.

It is proposed that only one process should take place in the West Indies, namely, the boiling of the sugar cane, the proceeds in a fluid state to be shipped to England, and to be manufactured here; the process of making muscovades, and of refined sugar, and the distillation of rum, all to be performed in England. The person who has submitted this plan to the ministers has taken out a patent for making refined sugar from the saccharine matter in the fluid state by one process. The ministers, who have taken this plan into consideration, have alluded to difficulties which would arise as to collecting the revenue, about four millions annually; but as all the produce would be sent to Europe, as at present, the fixing the duty is merely a matter of detail, not of insurmountable difficulty or objection to the other part of the plan. So far as regards the reducing the demand for slave labor, that part of the plan of course meets with the approbation of the ministers. The calculation that one-half the labor of the slaves would be reduced is stated to be greatly under the mark. The portion of labor which would be saved is that pressing the most severely on the slave, being night work in the curing houses and in the distillation of rum, and as the plough has been lately introduced into the field labor, the work of the slave would be trivial. The manufacturing of the saccharine matter in England would be attended with great changes—the detail of the refining would be completely altered—the process of distilling rum would also be entirely a new one. The refiners, a powerful body, are the only persons who have evinced a serious opposition to these new measures; they carry their objections to the extreme, as all their apparatus for refining, and their valuable establishments must be changed or rendered worthless. The plan has produced a great sensation; the chief objection appears to be the throwing the greater part of the trade into few hands; but this evil would, of course, be of short duration. Large contracts are in the mean time entered into for the supply of the saccharine matter in the rude state, after the first boiling of the cane. The trial of the new system will commence on an extensive sale.

Memorandum, communicated by viscount Goderich to the West India body, February 4, 1833.

1. His majesty's body will be ready to communicate confidentially with the West India body before they submit to parliament any propositions upon the subject of the West India affairs.

2. The government retain their original opinion upon the subject of a committee of the house of lords, of which the West India body now seek the renewal. They felt at the time confident that it would necessarily be followed by the appointment of a committee of the house of commons, which, in all probability, would aim at different objects, and be conducted upon different principles; and they apprehended that the result of the inquiries would be to increase the vehemence of the controversy upon the subject of slavery, to irritate rather than moderate the excited feelings of the public, and aggravate the acknowledged difficulties of the whole question.

What has occurred since the close of the last session has not altered, but has, on the contrary, confirmed these views; and they would earnestly press upon the West India body the expediency of not calling, upon the present occasion, for a renewal of the committee of the house of lords.

They admit, at the same time, that there prevailed, when the committee closed their labors, an impression that their inquiries would be resumed in the present session, and that that impression was countenanced by the language of the respective reports. Nor are they disposed to deny that they themselves looked forward to that course. Considering, however, every thing which has subsequently passed, and the actual state of the question, they feel that they would best consult the interest of the West Indies, by not inviting the house of lords to reappoint the committee. If, nevertheless, the West India body should continue to think its revival essential to their interests, his majesty's government will not oppose such a proposition if brought forward from any other quarter.

Feeling it, however, to be their duty in the present crisis of West India affairs, to act upon their own responsibility, they deem it incumbent upon them to state, that the appointment of such a committee would not cause them to abstain from maturing and proposing such measures as they may, upon full consideration, and after communication with the West India body, deem to be best calculated to bring this important subject to a safe and satisfactory termination.

Memorial of the standing committee of West India planters and merchants, consequent upon the foregoing communication.

To the right honorable the earl Grey, K. G. first lord of his majesty's treasury, &c. &c. and to the other ministers of the crown.

Your memorialists beg respectfully to acknowledge the receipt of a communication, in the form of a minute, bearing date the 4th inst. having reference to the conference of the 28th ult. and beg to express their satisfaction at the king's government having assured them that they will "communicate confidentially with the West India body, before they submit to parliament any proposition upon the subject of West India affairs."

Your memorialists submit that, if the appointment of the committee of the house of commons, consequent upon the granting that in the house of lords, has, by the result of its inquiries, "increased the vehemence of the controversy, and irritated, rather than moderated, the excited feelings of the public," that effect is attributable to the publication of the evidence in an incomplete and inconclusive state; and although your memorialists have no desire to aggravate the difficulties of the question, yet they deem it essential to the just and safe settlement of it, that the real extent of those difficulties should be made apparent.

The committee reported that, "the important question of what is due to the fair and equitable consideration of private property, as connected with the extinction of slavery, had not been investigated by them."

Until, however, that part of the question shall have been investigated, the further one of the extinction of slavery itself cannot be dealt with. And as the slaves are, by the laws of England, the property, and necessary to the value of the estates of their masters, in which, "by no fault of their own, and through the encouragement of the various acts of the legislature" (as allowed by Mr. Canning), they, or their predecessors, have invested their fortunes, "the fair and equitable consideration due the rights of private property" must in this case involve previous provision of funds, to an amount which will be of an appalling magnitude.

Your memorialists submit that, as the committee in the house of commons was conceded to their opponents, and the evidence for the case of those opponents made public, its labors should not stop at the precise point most prejudicial to the colonists. And they further submit, that the committee is also bound, if it shall report in favor of the extinction of slavery at any definite period, to found that report upon an investigation of the details of a plan upon which it shall be practicable, consistently with the safety of the colonies, and the well being of the slaves, themselves as well as the rights of property.

For these reasons your memorialists do not see that evil in the renewal of the committee of the house of commons, (trusting if such renewal shall be inevitable, to the justice of the king's government for its impartial constitution), which should deter them from their demand for the renewal of that in the lords, in which house they consider it indispensable to their interests, not only that inquiries should be extended up to the other colonies at well as Jamaica, but that the evidence upon oath of lord Belmore, of sir James Lyon, and of the deputies specially sent from the different colonies for the express purpose of giving evidence upon the case, should be taken.

With regard to the announcement of his majesty's ministers, that the government means to act upon its own responsibility, and to mature and propose such measures as may seem to them best calculated to bring the important subject to a safe and satisfactory termination, notwithstanding the renewal of the committee, and consequently pending its inquiries, your memorialists must protest against the inconsistency of a course nullifying the only purposes for which the committee shall be granted, and therefore destroying the value of the concession itself.—They continue to maintain, that until that committee shall have reported the "dispassionate and impartial result of an ample and patient investigation" of the whole case, in reference to the rights of the colonists themselves, the rights of their creditors in this country, the well being of the slaves, the safety of the colonists, and their incalculable importance as a constituent part of this empire, the government are as little qualified to deal with these difficult and momentous subjects as they were previously to granting the committee in the last parliament.

Free negroes and slaves.—We subjoin from the report of the commons' committee on slavery, a few extracts from the important evidence of the hon. Charles Fleming, the admiral of the West India station, who has resided in Jamaica and has frequently visited Cuba, Hayti, and the Caraccas. These extracts prove that the negroes will soon free themselves, if they are not freed by the government—that the free negroes are industrious, and will work regularly, even in the cultivation of sugar—that they are competent to fulfil the duties of governors, generals, and priests—and that the free blacks of Cuba and Hayti are incomparably better fed and happier than the slaves of Jamaica:

"Were you much struck with the increased knowledge of the slave population when you last saw them, compared with what you observed among them when you saw them on a former occasion? Yes, very much; and I was confirmed by that in my opinion that they are not inferior to white people in intellect.

"From what you saw and what you heard from persons on whose information you can rely, are you satisfied that reading and listening to works read are very prevalent among the slaves in Jamaica? Yes, I know it of my own knowledge, and I have been informed that it is very prevalent; I have seen one man reading a gazette to a gang of slaves.

"Are you of opinion that if the power of reading becomes general among them, so stimulated by their condition as slaves, that the knowledge of what passes here upon the subject, and the knowledge of what passes in the legislature of Jamaica upon the subject is consistent with the permanent endurance on their part of the state of slavery? No, I think it will put an end to slavery; it will be impossible to keep enlightened people slaves, treated as they now are, as has been proved by their late insurrection."

The admiral says—

"I am of opinion that the West Indies could be cultivated by free labor, and I ground that opinion upon my experience of what I have seen in Hayti, in the Caraccas, particularly, where all are free, and in the islands of Trinidad and Cuba, and upon the industry of the free negroes in the islands of the Bahamas.

"Was not one of the generals in the Caraccas a black man? Yes, general Peyanga was a perfectly black man, a complete negro; he was a very well informed man, a very well educated person, and well read in Spanish literature; he was a very extraordinary man.

"Did you happen to know whether English officers served under him? Many were serving under him; I knew many other black officers, of very considerable acquirements, in the Caraccas and in Cuba also. I have known a black priest, a perfect negro, horn in Cape de Verdes Islands, a very well informed person."

Speaking of the black republic of Hayti, admiral Fleming says—

"Are you aware that there is a prohibition against all corporal punishment in that country? Yes, I know there is.

"Did they appear to you to be living comfortably? Yes; the most happy, the richest, the best fed, and the most comfortable negroes that I saw in the West Indies were in Hayti, even better than in the Caraccas.

"Were they decidedly better than the slaves in Jamaica?—No comparison.

"Do you happen to know whether the population of Hayti has increased within the last twenty years? Of my own knowledge I cannot know that; neither are there any very correct returns; but I have every reason to believe that, since the last time the French retired from the island in 1800, the population has trebled.

"What were their victuals, compared with the food of the slaves in Jamaica—were they superior, or much the same?—They were fed on meat principally; cattle is very cheap in Hayti.

"Is meat much cheaper in Hayti than in Jamaica? Yes, much cheaper; it is 2d a pound, whilst the contract price in Jamaica is 12d; in both places these are the highest prices."

In the sitting of the 6th Feb., the topic of negro slavery was introduced into the British house of commons.

"Mr. L. B. Bulver having moved the order of the day for resuming the adjourned debate on the address to his majesty, Mr. F. Buxton begged the indulgence of the house for a few moments, on a subject of the deepest importance; he meant negro slavery. All reference to the subject had, unfortunately, in his opinion, been omitted in the speech from the throne. In consequence of that omission, he had thought it right to give a notice on the subject. At the same time, he was perfectly satisfied that it was much better that the subject should be in the hands of government than in the hands of an individual. All he asked of the noble lord was, to say if his majesty's government would undertake to bring forward the subject in the course of the present session; if not, he (Mr. Bulver), should feel it to be his duty to do so to the best of his ability.

"Lord Althorp said, that his majesty's government had applied, and were applying themselves to the consideration of this most important subject, for the purpose of bringing forward a measure respecting it, and that he entertained the greatest hope and confidence that they would be able to bring forward a measure which should prove at once safe and efficient."

From the London Globe of Feb. 11.

The standing committee of the West India body assembled on Thursday, at the desire of the ministry, to receive an official communication. It was a treasury minute, but much too long for insertion. The only points of general interest were the announcement that the public feeling was every day stronger in favor of an early abolition of slavery—that all investigation into the question tended to raise the opinion still stronger against the planter,—that the ministers would not move the renewal of the committee of investigation of last session; nevertheless, if the West India interest brought forward the question of the reappointment, ministers would not oppose the motion. The reply of the West India body was that they invited investigation, and were at issue with ministers as to public opinion; there was a decided reaction in their favor. They requested another interview with ministers, to receive a communication respecting the plans to be brought forward by the ministers, and a request that the West India packet might be detained till they could communicate something decisive on the question, otherwise that a rebellion among the slaves might take place. The two latter have been acceded to; so rests the question at present.

From the New York Commercial Advertiser.

The schooner Choice, captain Dodd, arrived yesterday from Montego Bay, (Jamaica), bearing advices to the 2d of March. They represent the continuance of discontent and alarm throughout the whole island. Neither slave nor master is at rest—the former anticipating the destruction of his property, and the latter the restoration of his rights. No middle path seems to have been devised for the safety and repose of either. The results that may follow the immediate emancipation of slaves in the West Indies, as now contemplated by the British ministry, may perhaps afford us the lessons of wisdom, without the cost of experience.

A great drought has prevailed in the region of Montego Bay, and the Cornwall Chronicle says:

"We have scarcely had a drop of rain for the last three weeks. The shrubs and trees are suffering most materially—the pastures are withered up by the fiery breezes, unrelieved by the night dews, which are very scanty in this quarter of the country. The ground near the town is quite baked and cracked by the sun, and all vegetation is at a stand. The month of March usually brings rain, and there is an apparent change in the atmosphere at this moment. The prospect of the sugar crop is most unpromising."

According to a report of a select committee of the house of lords, recently published in England, the estimated value of the British possessions in the West Indies, including the ceded colonies, is about £131,000,000.

From the Baltimore Gazette of March 22.

The proposition which is to be brought before the reformed parliament, for the emancipation of the slaves in the West Indies, would seem to indicate a rapid and triumphant advance of liberal principles in Great Britain. The English have hitherto been much more devoted to the theory of political morality than the practice of it; and while the existence of slavery in our country has been a standing reproach against us with their writers, their own government has been in the constant exercise of the most galling oppression and tyranny, as well in their foreign possessions as in Ireland. Their dominions are crowded with slaves of all colors, in every degree of human debasement and misery. It is very possible that it may be their intention, hereafter, to act up to the maxims which they have been so long preaching to others: but even in this proposed emancipation it is questionable whether they will not be actuated by expediency rather than philanthropy, and whether the credit of the measure will not be claimed by the nation at large, while the whole burden of it is to be borne by a few.

The measure will obviously be equivalent to a surrender of the islands to the blacks, who, upon an average, constitute not less than 85 per cent. of the whole population. Jamaica, the largest and most important of the British West India islands, has a population of about 400,000 souls, of which not more than 40,000 are free white inhabitants: in some of the smaller islands there is a still greater disproportion in favor of the blacks. It has been the prevailing opinion for many years past that these islands would, sooner or later, fall into the possession of the negroes; and the symptoms of rebellion among them, lately, have been so frequent, in consequence of the exertions of a certain class of reformers, that the surrender, now, would probably anticipate the inevitable course of events only by a few years. So far as the nation and government of Great Britain are interested, this sacrifice would be much greater in appearance than in reality: the islands are of little value to them except as affording naval stations, and the government of them is a fruitful source of trouble and expense.

The most extraordinary feature in the contemplated measure is the refusal of any compensation to the planters and proprietors of slaves. This has the appearance of a high-handed violation of individual rights, and disregard of "vested interests," which would be better suited to a despotic government, than to one which is fast assuming a Republican character. Yet, in the present state of public opinion in England, it will probably meet with little opposition. The whole white population of the islands does not much exceed a hundred thousand souls—an inconsiderable fraction of their nation, which may be safely disregarded, more particularly as the wealthiest and most distinguished among them belong to the class whose political influence is now very nearly annihilated.

ADDITIONAL ARTICLES.

The number of signatures to the Leeds anti-slavery petitions was 18,875, being 2,000 more than were ever attached to any former petition in Leeds on the same subject.

Petitions for the immediate extinction of negro slavery, have been agreed to at York and in various other towns in that county. Indeed, all England seems to have moved, or to be moving on this subject.

One of the secrets of the present desire in England to abolish slavery in the West Indies, may, perhaps, be discerned in the following article. Mr. John Bull always keeps a close look-out on pounds, shillings and pence, involved in trade.

British trade to Brazil. The Liverpool Journal contains a notice of a pamphlet on the trade to Brazil, from which it appears that the people of that country give a decided preference to British goods and British merchants. They admit all British manufactures on an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent. while they impose on nearly all the manufactures of other countries a duty of 24 per cent. The trade may, therefore, be considered as entirely in British hands. Previous to the importation of the Portuguese court, they indulged but little in finery or luxury; but fashion, sanctioned by royalty, soon inspired them with a love of dress, and a desire for articles of utility. In 1820 the exports from Great Britain had reached the amount of £1,860,000, and in the following year they increased to £2,230,000. In 1830 they had reached to £5,000,000—50,000 tons of British shipping having entered Rio de Janeiro.

The writer complains, that in return for this preference, the importation of the most available produce of Brazil into British ports is prohibited, and that parliament compels the inhabitants of that country to send their coffee and sugar to the Americans and Dutch, in order that British manufacturers may be paid for in bills on their neighbors! A petition is before parliament, praying for an alteration in the commercial regulations now existing between the two countries. In the course of his animadversions, the writer makes the following remarks:

"There is no doubt whatever that the W. India colonies have been a sad burden to this country, and, what is not very consolatory, they are likely to continue so. A vast capital is invested in these islands, and must not be too hastily interfered with; but, at the same time, the legislature is bound to encourage the trade with the states of South America, for they are decidedly our best customers, and, if properly managed, promise to take from us, at no distant day, more manufactures than we now export to all the rest of the world besides. The blacks and the planters are sufficiently burdensome, without permitting them to shut out all competition, to curtail our commerce, and limit the employment of our shipping. The Brazilians take from us now all the manufactures they are able to pay for; but, if we took their sugar and coffee in return, they would, of course, be enabled to take from us a much greater quantity. The immediate effect of a more liberal policy would be, it is estimated, the additional employment of from fifty to a hundred thousand tons of British shipping."

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 7—VOL. VIII. BALTIMORE, APRIL 13, 1833. [VOL. XLIV. WHOLE No. 1,125.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

¶ The time seemed so properly fitted to give a sketch of the speech of Mr. McDuffie, in the South Carolina convention, that we have inserted it. There are points made in this speech which are of deep interest to the voluntary, or free laboring classes;—and our reading of this speech clearly shews the opinion of Mr. McDuffie, that these have been reduced to a close, or much closer, approximation to the condition of the involuntary, or slave laboring classes, than heretofore. If those interested in the latter deserve success for the steadiness and fidelity with which they have pursued their purposes, what shall be said of the former, who, divided and huzzinga, have been "nailed down to the counter like base money?" They were told what would happen; and, as we apprehend, must reap the harvest which they sowed to the whirlwind! When they feel—they will believe; but belief may come too late, if the enemy acts wisely. We would, however, that this feeling had come upon them, at once—while strength remained to "correct the procedure," and that every one might surely know the real cause of reduced wages for labor, and increased prices of goods. But they are doomed to understand this seeming paradox. They will know the meaning of the word COMPETITION, and find out that cost to a consumer is exactly proportioned with his ability to obtain—that high prices and low prices are only comparative terms—that the money-value of an article has no necessary connection with its real value; that diamonds may be advantageously exchanged for an equal number of potatoes, and a quart of gold coin be "judiciously" sold for a quart of wholesome water.

¶ We publish an interesting note from Mr. Carey to the editor of the United States Telegraph—but have no intention of renewing a discussion of the subject to which it relates—at present.

¶ We hope that the privilege of making exchanges of papers with whom we please (when editors are pleased to exchange with us), may be permitted! Our list is a great deal too heavy—for, as has been more than once observed, the reception of a newspaper imposes a sort of obligation to examine it—and much time is thus expended without profit; and yet we have been roughly scolded by some, because that we have reduced our exchanges. A further reduction must be made—and we wish all persons interested to believe, that, when the REGISTER ceases to reach them (allowance being made for the irregularity of the mails), an exchange is declined.

Good! The saying, that "Satan can quote scripture," is strictly applicable to the following. Our kind neighbors in Canada have not only grossly abused us because of our protecting system, but rendered their best services to "nullify" it by smuggling, and other fraudulent operations: but when the principle of that system comes home to themselves, they perfectly understand it! So will South Carolina—when American cotton shall be taxed 3d. per lb. in England, and East India cotton be admitted free of duty; the supply of the latter being adequate to the whole demand, and its quality rendered equal, at least, to our Uplands—both which will probably be the case, very soon after the expiration of the East India company's charter.

The Quebec papers complain of an alleged project of the British government to alter the duties, in the United Kingdom, which give preference to the timber of the colonies. The Mercury observes—

"The lumber trade has been created and grown under the protection. Its destruction would be ruinous to the individuals engaged in the trade, and injurious to the country generally, to the agricultural population of which, the persons employed in the trade, at present, form the principal consumers in the colony who are able to pay for what they consume."

It was "abominable"—in the United States, to levy high duties on British cottons and cloths, that American farmers might have a domestic market for their bread-stuffs and meats—seeing that Britain, (for one out of an hundred examples, and the first on the list), imposes a duty of 8s. 4d. the piece on "anchor stocks," if imported from the United States, but of only 10d. if imported from Canada*—but it is perfectly right, and sound political economy, in Britain, to keep up the ten times greater duty, and so forbid the use of anchor stocks from the United States, that Canadian farmers may have a market for their products!

And the pricked bull-calf begins to roar! Aye, the Old Bull, himself, will roar, when he shall honestly "practice on those maxims which he recommends to others!"

THE ENGLISH "SYSTEM." A letter dated Liverpool, February 23, says—"The evil with the people in Ireland is the want of food. Statutes and bayonets and gunpowder therefore cannot cure the evil; they are not the remedy. To kill is no cure. The great cause of all the misery in Ireland is, (not parsous and churches and priests, laws, Catholics or Protestants), but the consumption in England of all the staple productions of Ireland, without an equivalent return to that country, to be diffused among its people, in the promotion of arts and manufactures. All the crops of Ireland are expended among the manufacturers and artisans of England, evidently precluding the people of Ireland from similar employment. This whilst industry is fattened in England by the nutritious produce of Ireland, the people of that country grow lean for the want of it."

"FREE TRADE." A trial at law has just been decided in favor of the corporation of Liverpool, plaintiff, against Bolton, Ogden & Co. representing the American merchants of that city. The action was to try the right of the city to "exact certain duties and tolls upon all goods coming from abroad, consigned to persons not freemen of the city." This decision will take out of the pockets of the American merchants about 60,000 pounds a year—and this is equivalent to a bounty to that amount in favor of British traders. The house of Bolton, Ogden & Co. are said to pay at least five thousand dollars a year to the corporation for their duties.

¶ The American merchants at Liverpool pay an alien tax which amounts to nearly three hundred thousand dollars a year. If the drab-gaitered gentlemen and other English adorers of "free trade" doing business in New York, were taxed at the same rate, that great city would not, perhaps, need any other revenue, much is said about the prodigal expenditures of the corporation! But, though such taxes are very right on Father Bull's side of the Atlantic, they are very wrong on Brother Jonathan's side: so nullification and secession would be treason, if practiced north of the Potomac—but be strictly constitutional, when entertained south of that river.

THE CHOLERA awfully prevailed at Havana, at the date of our latest accounts from that city. From the 24th of Feb. when it first appeared, up to the 24th of March, it was believed that five thousand persons had died—1,000 whites and 4,000 blacks. On the day before the sailing of a schooner which has arrived at Baltimore, five hundred persons are said to have died. It was feared that many premature interments had taken place. Several persons, on their way to the grave, were roused by the jolting of the dead carts, in which they had been placed!

One individual had lost 50 out of 200 slaves! All sorts of business were suspended, except in relation to the sick and the dead. The captain general had ordered discharges of artillery to purify the atmosphere. The sale of specifics for the cholera had been prohibited.

This fearful disease has reached Matanzas. If it shall take a course through the West Indies, generally, what will be the state of Jamaica and the other British islands, in the present calamitous and awful condition in which they are otherwise placed?

The accounts of the sick, in the hospitals at Havana, are, indeed, awful. They were wretchedly provided for—and rather packed in rooms than accommodated, and their bodies were

*It is thus with respect to every article of wood which the British colonies can supply; and we might fill a whole page with things like the following, from the present British tariff:

Deals, 7 inches wide, not exceeding 45 feet long, and 3½ inches thick—£44, or 211 dollars, the 120. But the same if imported from a British possession, and not more than 4 inches thick, £5 or 24 dollars the 120. The quantity in the latter is 1-7th more than in the former, yet the duty is only a little more than one-ninth part.

Handspikes, of a certain size, £4 or $19 20 the 120: the same imported from a British possession, 5s. or $1 20 the 120!

But it is, perhaps, altogether useless to refer to these things.

buried in holes, without coffins or winding sheets. Brandy was drunk in large quantities as a preventive of the disease!

The interments in the Campo Santo, the principal burying ground at Havana, on the 22d March, amounted to 333—the whole number was hardly less than 500, that day. The city, however, was nearly deserted, and the mortality would, of course, decline.

LIBERIA. We have good accounts from the colony of free blacks, and means have considerably accumulated to give energy to emigration and secure the comfort of worthy persons, who seek the land of their ancestors that they and their children may have rank in society, according to real merit—without regard to the color of their skins! The beginning of a great nation has, probably, commenced—which, though it may not do much to relieve the United States of a species of population which is feared in some parts of our country, and degraded in all—still an opportunity is presented by which holders of slaves may liberate them, without those difficulties and dangers which attend this proceeding in all the southern states, and also enabled to entertain a hope that their condition will be improved. A want of confidence as to the latter, has prevented the emancipation of tens of thousands of individuals—and we think it is pretty clear, that emancipation, in the slave-holding states, without removal, is not productive of a general benefit to persons of color.

By the 16th annual report of the colonization society, it appears that the receipts of the society for the last year, have been $42,397 10; balance on hand from the last year, $11,090 15. $3,420 19 were received from England, and $5,180 paid by the managers of the Maryland fund. The expenditures have been for the same period, $52,644 22, viz: for transportation of emigrants and supplies for the colony, $36,892 07; salaries of agents, &c. $10,168 53; printing, $3,268 13; tuition of four young men for physicians at Liberia, $981 06. The whole number of emigrants transported to Liberia during the last year, is 790; of which number, 247 were manumitted slaves. A legacy of $10,000, from the estate of the late judge Workman, of Louisiana, and the same sum from the late Mr. Ireland, of New Orleans, and $1,000 by the late col. Rutgers, of New York city, attest the growing interest and favor with which this society is regarded. The managers of the Maryland state fund in the last year sent out 175 persons—viz. 29 to Hayti and 146 to Liberia; 20 of the latter being manumitted for the purpose. A much larger emigration is expected in the current year—453 persons are known to be manumitted, some at prospective periods, for this purpose.

Virginia has appropriated $18,000 a year, for 5 years, for the removal of persons who are now free, and born and residing in the state. The emigration to be under the ultimate charge of the American colonization society, at certain rates of compensation for expenses incurred, &c.

As instances of what is going on—the following may be mentioned:

The rev. Richard Bibb, of Kentucky, has liberated thirty-two of his slaves—furnished them with clothing, besides 444 dollars in money, and sent them to Liberia.

A party of colored emigrants left Louisville, Ky. on the 22d ult. for Liberia. It numbered one hundred and six persons, ninety-six of whom were manumitted in Kentucky, four were from East Tennessee, and the others were free. Among the latter is an emigrant from Brown county, Ohio, who goes out as a representative of three hundred persons in that county, who contemplate emigrating to Liberia, provided his report be favorable. The emigrants left Louisville in high spirits, having been liberally provided with money and provisions by the people of Kentucky. They were to be conveyed to New Orleans free of expense, in the elegant steam boat Mediterranean, accompanied by the secretary of the Kentucky colonization society. At New Orleans the charge of the emigrants will be assumed by Mr. Savage, of Ohio, who will accompany them to Liberia.

One or more large parties have left Tennessee—well supplied and liberally provided for.

The military force of the colony consists of nearly 800 men—well disciplined and fitted for service, if needed. This force might be increased on an emergency—but would appear sufficient for the defence of the colony.

A late number of the "African Repository," which is published at Washington, contains the proceedings of a meeting held at Chesterfield, Derbyshire (England), which was addressed by Elliott Cresson, esq. of Philadelphia, an agent of the American colonization society, in an able and eloquent manner. In the course of his remarks he stated the particulars of the purchase of Cape Mesurado, which if not wholly new, cannot fail of imparting interest, even at the present time.

"An American vessel, he said, trading on that coast was driven off by weather, with six Kroomen on board, whom they carried to Baltimore, where Elisha Tyson, an elder of the society of Friends, and general Harper, (a Catholic), each took three of them under their protection. The Rev. Ebenezer Burgess, and rev. S. J. Mills, (the agents of the society), took great interest in these expatriated Kroomen, and through their representations, the late American president Monroe, was induced to order a sloop of war to carry the Kroomen to their native land.—A plentiful provision of clothing was given to them, and they embarked for Africa, accompanied by these gentlemen. The captain of the vessel was unacquainted with the coast, but the Kroommen soon recognised it, and it is easy to imagine their joyful feelings, when they found that they were carried back to their homes, instead of that slavery to which so many of their countrymen had been devoted. They saw familiar objects from the vessel's deck—suddenly two of them were observed to be struck with the appearance of an old grey-headed African on the shore—they shouted with joy—he plunged into the waves, swam to the vessel, and threw himself into their arms—a pantomime of perfect joy succeeded—he was their father! They told how kindly they had been treated; they shewed him their garments which generosity had given them, and they said, in their language of unaffected simplicity, that the "white face" had given them "too much good." The news soon spread; their happy return was noised about; the native chiefs, struck with the contrast between these and other white men, proffered their soil as the future home of manumitted Africans; the purchase was made, (after the peaceful manner of Penn with the American aborigines), and the colony of Liberia, thus literally sprung on the ruins of slavery."

THE SUSQUEHANNAH. The navigation of this noble stream is much injured by various dams, for the supply of the Pennsylvania canals, or to force the river trade out of its natural direction. A late Harrisburg paper had the following paragraph concerning one of these dams:

"We learn that a portion of the Muncy dam has been torn down, not by the ice and flood, but by the hands of the raftmen. Six arks were sunk in passing the dam on Friday and Saturday last, and on Monday a company of raftmen demolished a sufficient portion of one end of the dam to admit rafts and arks through with safety. Thus while the legislature are appropriating millions to construct useless canals along our navigable streams, the people are nullifying their acts by tearing down their work. We want no stronger evidence of the truth of what we have always asserted, that the canals along our navigable streams were not only useless but oppressive."

SMALL BANK NOTES. Georgia has followed the lead of several other states and prohibited the circulation of bills under five dollars. It has, for some years, been thus in Maryland, and we have experienced no sort of inconvenience, except because that five dollars, in specie, are more than a person wishes to carry about him, on account of their weight. Perhaps three dollar bills might be advantageously allowed.

RAIL ROADS, &c. A rail road is to be constructed from Providence to Stonington, Connecticut, in continuation of the road from Boston. Thus will the difficult voyage round Point Judith be avoided, and Boston be rendered only about twelve hours distant from New York; and when the rail road from Baltimore to Washington shall be finished, the journey from Boston to the seat of the national government may be made in about or less than thirty continuous hours, without fatigue: plenty of time being allowed for sleep in the steam boats, though comfortable naps may be taken in the rail-road coaches, if desired. We wish that there was power in the general government to assist in such works!—and especially in those parts of the country where the local population and capital are insufficient to accomplish them. There is a "consolidation" in such improvements which the greatest sticklers for "state rights" should not object to: and besides, in many sections, they are much needed for public purposes. Perhaps, had even the present works existed at the commencement of the late war, a much larger sum of money than the whole cost of them would have been saved, in charges for public transportations and waste of time, as well as of goods—to say nothing about other advantages, yet more important.

The Charleston rail road is finished and available for transportation and travelling for a distance of seventy-two miles. A locomotive engine traversed the line last week, with the mail, several passengers and three or four tons of iron, in six hours, or at the average rate of twelve miles an hour.

With a continuous line of steam boats and rail road carriages, the journey between New York and Baltimore might now be accomplished in seventeen hours. When locomotives shall be placed upon the New Jersey rail road, only about fifteen hours will be required. In two or three years, it is probable that the distance between New York and Washington will be performed, by ordinary travelling, in seventeen hours.

Two new steam engines from England, the Liverpool and Pioneer, have been placed on the Petersburg rail road. The Intelligencer says:—

As an evidence of the power and speed of these engines, it is only necessary to state the fact, that on Monday morning last, a party of gentlemen left town at half past nine o'clock, in the coaches drawn by the "Pioneer," for the purpose of attending Greenville court, and remained at the court house about two hours and a half, and returned to town by six o'clock in the evening—the whole distance being 83 miles. When the necessary delays at the several depots are taken into consideration this trip will, we think, justify the assertion that they cannot "order these things better in France."

The (Baltimore) American of Tuesday last has a daily account of the receipts on the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, for the transportation of passengers and goods, from the 26th March to 5th April inclusive. The largest receipt was on the 3d April, $64 60—the least on the 27th March, $676 47—aggregate of the ten days $7,547 91—daily average $754 79. And it is suggested, and we think reasonably, that when the road shall reach even Harper's Ferry, its business will be doubled. Horse power is, at present, employed—but it is expected that steam will soon be exclusively used.

A Philadelphia paper says—The new engine built by the West Point foundry association, at New York, has been placed on the Philadelphia, Germantown and Norristown rail road, and after severe and repeated trials has been found completely to answer the expectations of the managers. Two engines are now in successful operation on this road, and their continual passing and re-passing each other, with their trains of cars, at great speed, afford a spectacle at once highly novel and interesting to our citizens. We understand the road is now in such excellent order, and the arrangements so well conducted, as to insure punctuality and despatch to visitors and travellers.

An act has passed the legislature of Virginia to authorise the making of a rail road from Norfolk to the Roanoke. The corporation of Norfolk has subscribed $69,000—and three-fifths of the whole capital being taken, a claim is made on the state for the other two-fifths.

The books were opened at Baltimore on the 6th inst. (to remain open for 30 days), for subscriptions to the stock of the Baltimore and Washington rail road.

A general meeting of the stockholders of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road is called to be held at the exchange, in the city of Baltimore, on the 8th of May next, to consider the act of the general assembly of Maryland, just passed, to provide for a continuance of the road to Harper's Ferry, &c. [The proposed compromise between the rail road and the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company.]

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT. The legislature of Maryland, in December session, 1832, passed a law abolishing imprisonment for debt, if not exceeding thirty dollars—which was repealed at the last session, being thought rather to benefit dishonest persons, than prevent wrongs on worthy men. We have always believed, (having had much severe experience concerning the whole subject), that far more injury results to society from fraudulent debtors than hard-hearted creditors. The general disposition is more to encourage and sustain an honest man struggling to pay his debts—than to oppress and imprison him; and such is the interest of creditors, which all men are most apt to pursue.

FLOUR—inspections. At Albany 51,390 bbls. in 1832. In Baltimore, for the quarter ending March 31, 1833—121,959 bbls. and 3,706 half bbls. wheat flour, 3,138 bbls. rye, 188 hhds. and 395 bbls. corn meal. At Petersburg, Va. same quarter, 9,453 bbls. and 314 half bbls. superfine, 1,428 fine, 294 middlings, and 43 condemned. At Richmond same quarter, 54,159 bbls. superfine, 1,060 half bbls. do, 4,658 fine, 2,090 middlings, 756 condemned.

"Mr. Clay is often sportive and amusing. The other day, during the debate on the revenue collection bill, Mr. Wilkins, whose hair is grey, and whose person is slender, said 'he was young and stout, and deemed now the best time to settle the spirit of nullification. He did not wish to leave it to posterity—and was willing to share his part of the danger.' Soon after he attempted to read a part of the South Carolina ordinance, but his eye-sight not being very good, he apologized for the omission. Mr. Clay, in a low voice, but heard all over the chamber, immediately taking off his spectacles, said, with an arch look, 'take these, my young friend.' The effect was ludicrous. Every body laughed, and Mr. Wilkins enjoyed the joke as well as the rest of us."

MR. MANGUM, one of the senators from North Carolina, in his speech on Mr. Clay's compromise bill, said—"It becomes not me to trace the motives of those who brought forward this measure—but I have no doubt that they are, in an eminent degree, honorable. He felt deep gratitude to those who had come to our deliverance, in the hour of our deepest gloom, when we saw no lights save the sparkles which gleamed from the steel of the enemy. If I were tenfold more ambitious than I am, I would not derive more GLORY than he has who restores peace to an empire like this. His laurels will grow green, and be forever cherished by a grateful people."

DEBENTURES. Having copied the article alluded to—it is just that the following counter statement should be given:

The Globe contradicts the statement of the Journal of Commerce, that the secretary of the treasury had "directed the payments on certain debentures on woolsens, &c. to be suspended, and the documents transmitted to be to Washington." No such order has been issued. What the story grew out of is this: the secretary was to pay these debentures out of monies in the treasury, and the certificate of the collector to the party of the amount of duty to be returned, was to be sent to Washington, whence, on its receipt, the money was immediately remitted to the claimant. This is the matter out of which so different a tale was made.

[N. Y. Standard.]

RETURN DUTIES. We understand that the amount of return duties under the 18th section of the tariff act of 1832 at this port, is estimated at about $1,200,000; that the amount of money already paid out is $120,000, and the amount of duties that has accrued during the month of March, under the new rates of reduced duty is $340,000. [Boston Morning Post.]

"YANKEE NOTIONS." Public dinners are not of frequent occurrence in the New England states, but the citizens of Roxbury, and its vicinity gave one to their late representative in congress, Mr. Dearborn, on the 28th ult. The following are some of the sentiments delivered on that occasion:

Hon. H. A. S. Dearborn—Who has uniformly and ably supported the interest, the honor and integrity of Massachusetts.

Mr. D. responded in an elegant and animated address, and drank to the health of his late constituents.

Gov. Lincoln was invited to attend—but could not. He sent the following—

The relation between the constituent and the representative—When the honorable services of the one are recognised with corresponding respect and gratitude by the other.

Regular toasts.

"The memory of Washington."
Gen. Lafayette—In America, the ardent apostle of republican liberty—in France, the impartial umpire between the monarch and the mob.

John Q. Adams—Like the sun, he appears greater towards his setting.

Daniel Webster—A Demosthenes, without venality—a Cicero, without egotism—a patriot, without stain.

The victory of the nullifiers—In such a conflict may they always have such a victory—a hole to crawl out of.

The compromise—Both parties are satisfied—and for the best possible reason—both are as they were.

J. C. Calhoun—Whether for good or for evil, still potent—God forgive him—the nation never can.

The new sugar process in Jamaica and Charleston—Clay-ed or not Clay-ed, that is the question.

The United States bank—Like steam—the greater the pressure, the higher it rises.

When children, we grieved at the story of Daniel among the lions: but the tables are turned; the lions now need all our sympathy.

High protecting duties—The highest duty of the patriot is to protect the union.

The land bill—There is no reliance on the executive, though based on Terra Firma.

Kentucky Clay—Not moulded or burned, but pure and unsullied.

The ladies—Our duties to them must be specific; we are not rich enough to pay them ad valorem.

STATE OF PARTIES. John Randolph, in one of his sketches quotes the following lines as descriptive of the state of parties in Washington.

As when a Barber and a Collier fight,
The Barber beats the luckless Collier white;
In comes a Dyer of cerulean hue,
And in his turn he beats the Barber blue;
Then comes a brick dust man, with rouge o'erspread,
And beats the Dyer till he beats him red;
The rallying Collier whirls his empty sack,
Knocks down the brick dust man, and beats him black,
Black, white, blue, red, in rolling clouds are tost,
And in the dust the combatants are lost.

We can imagine no better description of a state of parties in which every man has taken some other man's color.

[Alexandria Gazette.]

INDIAN TREATIES. In the Globe of the 19th March, the treaty with the Menominees, as finally negotiated by gov. Porter of Michigan, and ratified by the senate, is published. Its chief object is to stipulate a reservation for the New York Indians on the east side of the Winnebago lake—the New York Indians, including the remnants of the Stockbridge, Munsee, Brotherton, St. Regis and Six Nation tribes, assent to the treaty. The same paper, of Saturday the 23d, contains the Chickasaw treaty, duly ratified by the senate, stipulating for the removal of the whole "Chickasaw nation" west of the Mississippi. The Cherokees are now the only Indians remaining within any of the states.

INDIAN NAMES. We find in the Globe an Indian treaty signed by the following names:

Sau-sau-mau-nee-kaw, or He who walks naked.

Khay-rah-tshoon-saip-kaw, or Black Hawk.

Hee-tah-wau-saip-skaw-skaw, or White War Eagle, De-kaw-ray, jr.

Tsah-shee-rah-wau-kaw, or He who takes the leg of a deer in his mouth.

Wau-kaun-tsah-hay-ree-haw, or Roaring thunder, Four legs Nephew.

NEWS PAPERS. A case has been decided in New York, in favor of the New York Daily Sentinel against Lee, Powell and Co. wherein the principle was confirmed that persons receiving a newspaper, without ordering it discontinued, are liable in all cases for the payment of the same.

*It is denied that Mr. R. is the author of these sketches—but they are not any the worse for that.

THE PRESIDENT'S INTENDED TOUR. The following resolutions were adopted in the Massachusetts senate, relative to the reception of the president:

Whereas, information has been received that the president of the United States proposes to visit New England during the current year, and that he may be present in the capital of this state on the next anniversary of the Declaration of Independence: And whereas it has been the ancient usage and the uniform desire of this commonwealth, to receive the visits of distinguished public men, and especially of the chief magistrate of the union, with respect and hospitality—therefore Resolved, &c. That his excellency the governor be, and he hereby is authorised and requested to tender to the president of the United States, if he shall visit this commonwealth during the present year, the customary hospitalities, and the respectful congratulations of the state.

Resolved, That a committee consisting of the president and five members of the senate, and of the speaker and six members of the house of representatives, be appointed, who are hereby authorised to make all suitable arrangements in the name and behalf of the state, for the proper reception of the president of the United States, if his visit to this state shall occur before the next session of the general court, and also for the celebration of the next anniversary of the Declaration of Independence, if it shall be the pleasure of the president to be present at the capital of the state on that occasion.

MASSACHUSETTS. Messrs. Adams, Briggs, Choate, Davis, Everett, Grennell and Reed, are re-elected to congress. Mr. William Bailles succeeds Mr. Hodges, who declined a re-election. A choice was not made in the Boston or Norfolk districts, lately represented by Messrs. Appleton and Dearborn. So in the Essex North district—for Mr. Cushing 2,506, Mr. Osgood 1,829, Mr. Bradbury 987, and 219 scattering.

CONNECTICUT Messrs. Barber, Ellsworth, Huntington and Young have been re-elected, and Messrs. Foot and Tweedy take the places of Messrs. Ingersoll and Storrs, who declined a poll. They are all national republicans; and yet a large majority in the state legislature is friendly to the administration.

PENNSYLVANIA. Three other unsuccessful attempts to elect a senator of the United States were made in this state. The last ballot stood thus—for McKean 46, Rush 42, Dallas 22, Sergeant 13, Muhlenburg 3. The legislative convention then adjourned sine die; and the question will come up before the next assembly.

The fact that the late state loan was taken in the name of the speaker of the senate, Dr. Burden, led to an investigation concerning it—which resulted in the unanimous declaration of the senate, "that every thing in relation thereto was conducted in a fair, honest and honorable manner."

MARYLAND. Sixteen savings institutions were incorporated by the late legislature.

Twenty-four divorces were granted, out of about fifty applications. [Md. Rep.]

VIRGINIA. The Richmond Whig of the 4th April, under head of "Glorious!!!" says—Mr. Thomas J. Randolph, the grandson of Mr. Jefferson, with the weight of that illustrious patriot's name in his scale, has been banged out, horse, foot and dragons, in Albermarle. We rejoice (not from any dislike to Mr. R., towards whom personally, we entertain the most kindly feelings), but for the honor of the old democracy, in the result of this election. The question was fairly tried—the election was conducted purely on the ground of federal politics. The greatest exertions were made, we understand, in favor of Mr. Randolph.—But, all would not do. Old Albermarle was game to the backbone. She could not forget in favor of the grandson, that she had been the home of the grandfather.

This is a glorious consummation, and we doubt not to hear of many such. The most wonderful changes are going on throughout our state. Men who, upon its first appearance, hailed the proclamation with delight, upon due consideration of all its bearings, visit it with their profound, utter and unqualified execration. In six months, proclamation men will be as scarce as flies in winter. Mark that.

It is ascertained that Messrs. W. S. Archer, W. F. Gordon, J. Y. Mason, John M. Patton, N. H. Claiborne and John Randolph have been elected members of congress from this state.

ALABAMA. The university buildings are rapidly going on, and as many students are already attached as can be accommodated. The whole of this state was a wilderness, or the hunting ground of the Indian, a little while since.

An English writer mentions a conversation which he had with a "native of Alabama." The native must have been a young one. The population of what now is Alabama was less than 10,000 only 23 years ago—though now about 350,000—two-fifths being slaves. Ohio contains more than a million of free persons—but it was only 6 or 8 years since, we believe, that a "native" had been elected to the legislature of the state. Perhaps there is hardly yet a "native" in the judiciary of Ohio—or filling other like important offices.

FROM THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS. The St. Louis Times of March 23, publishes letters received from the Rocky Mountains, under date of Feb. 14, stating that the Black Feet Indians had attacked a party of traders, and killed two men—Mr. Vanderburg and Mr. Pillon. One of the Indians was killed.

INTERESTING AMERICAN ANTIQUITIES. We have been allowed (says a New York paper) by Dr. Akerly to translate the following extract of a letter he has received from a correspondent in Tobasco, who has been engaged for some years in occasional investigations into the ruins of the ancient city of Palenque. Our readers will be gratified to learn that he proposes to publish an interesting work, composed of materials he has collected there.

Capital of Tobasco, Jan. 8, 1833.

To Dr. Samuel Akerly, New York.

My dear friend—I was on my third interesting visit to the ruins of Palenque, on the 21st of July, when I received yours of the 24th of March last, so that I have not been able to answer it before.

It would be impossible in a single letter to give you the details of the astonishing objects I have seen. I shall therefore only inform you, that from September, 1819, till the end of October, 1832, I have been constantly at work, and have collected materials for a work in two volumes. I intend to dedicate it to you, as it will consist of letters addressed to you, if you permit. During my labors I have expended $4,500 in travelling and investigations.

I have in my possession a description of ruins of which neither Don Antonio del Rio, nor any other person, has yet been able to describe; and although the antiquary and draughtsman Waldeck, whom I accompanied to Palenque, has written some notes, he will not be able to accomplish any thing because he has had few opportunities and does not visit the ruins.

I have in my possession a number of idols, some of baked clay, some of stone, and others of an unknown substance, but which may be petrification, jasper, or a species of marble. I have one of massive gold, but unfortunately, only of the weight of four dollars.

I have a plan of Tobasco, with four itineraries, which conduct to the ruins, and a plan of the great palace, which is larger than that of the Tuileries in Paris. I have also some drawings, and a manuscript history of the ruins, which has been in my possession thirty years."

POMPEII. Our report of the last meeting of the royal society of literature, notices a letter of great interest from Sir W. Gell, relative to recent important discoveries at Pompeii. Col. Robinson, it seems, in boring as the French do for Artesian wells, first fell upon a spring resembling the Sciditiz waters, which is already much resorted to, and has performed many cures. But a far more striking discovery ensued—no less than that of the long anticipated port of Pompeii, with its vessels overthrown upon their sides, and covered and preserved by the eruptive volcanic matter, which has thus anchored them for so many ages. About thirty masts have been found. What a mine of curiosity lies below, to gratify our thirst for knowledge of these remote times! Earnestly do we hope that funds will be found to carry on the work of exploring briskly, and on a large scale, instead of the tedious and imperfect process hitherto adopted by the Neapolitan government. [Lond. Lit. Gazette.]

ROMAN CATHOLICS. This sect has increased rapidly in Great Britain. In Manchester, which a few years ago numbered only 70, there are now 42,000 members of this church. Many other large towns shew a similar increase. They have 11 colleges and 35 seminaries in the island.

MONKS OF LA TRAPPE. Ninety Irishmen of this community have returned to their own country since the extinction of the order in France, where they had expended £10,000 on their farm and abbey, at which all travellers were hospitably entertained, and a hundred of the neighboring poor provided with subsistence daily. Sir Richard Kane has given them 500 acres of land capable of being reclaimed by their own labor, and a subscription is commenced in Ireland for the purpose of supplying them with the funds necessary for its improvement.

[Dublin paper.]

BRITISH INCOME AND TAXATION. A question is often asked, what portion of a man's income is taken from him in taxes? Now, the total income of the people of G. Britain may be estimated on data which we have not room to specify, at £250,000,000. That of Ireland we may assume at £50,000,000, making in the whole for the United Kingdom £300,000,000. Of this sum more than one-sixth is drawn directly by government. But this is not the whole. The local taxes amount to a very large sum. The poor rates in England exceed £8,000,000. Other local taxes and contributions probably amount to £10,000,000 more. Then, as we have already explained, the higher and richer classes are exempted in a great measure from contributing their proper share of the national taxation. When these different circumstances are taken into view, it will hardly be disputed that one-third part of every man's income, in the middle and lower classes of society, is taken away by the tax collector. Every man who works nine hours a day is employed during three of these hours to enable him to pay his taxes. [Tail's Magazine]

STULTZ. The celebrated London tailor, Stultz, lately died at Aïres, in the south of France, on an estate lately bought by him for £100,000; his property besides this exceeds £400,000.

Stultz was the very prince of European tailors. He would not condescend to cut a coat or make a pair of breeches, for any but the nobility, or those who brought letters of introduction, and recommendation from persons of distinction, as individuals of decided fashion. It was a rare thing for any American citizen to be able to show letters from sources high enough, to afford him an opportunity to have his legs and shoulders measured by this famous knight of the thimble. [Continued.]

ENCYCLOPEDIA AMERICANA. We have received the 13th and last volume of this truly valuable work; and congratulate the public on the success which has attended the liberal and enterprising publishers, Messrs. Carey, Lea and Blanchard, of Philadelphia—trusting that they will be remunerated for the extraordinary expenses which they have incurred in revising, correcting and otherwise improving, by large and important additions, especially relating to American subjects, the original work—or rather plan of this Encyclopedia, first published at Leipzig, in Germany, in 1827-29. A great sum must have been paid for editorship and contributions, though many of the latter were gratuitously rendered, by distinguished gentlemen—but the result is highly satisfactory to the public, whatever may be its effect on the publishers. It is, we think, the most interesting work, for ordinary use, that ever issued from the press, regard being had to the number of its volumes; and we heartily recommend it to all who desire to refresh their recollections, or obtain a knowledge of "things in general." We have made many references to articles concerning which we had some personal information, and have the pleasure to state a general accuracy which can hardly be excelled, in a work of this kind.

"THE NATIONAL CALENDAR" vol. 11th, for 1833, edited by Peter Force and published by Thompson and Hounsas of Washington city, has just been received. We owe it an annual paragraph of commendation, for the extent and value of the information which it furnishes, on the annals and statistics of the United States, and the organization of the government in all its branches,—congress, the judiciary, the executive departments, the army and navy. It is the "blue book," in which the name and emoluments of every officer in the employ of the United States, at home and abroad, can be found, and the names of all the foreign agents by whom communication is kept up between this and other nations. There are in it besides, a large number of official documents for the year, of the first public importance. It is an invaluable book for references on all topics connected with the acts, duties and compensations, of all the agents of the federal government, and many other matters of public concern. Mrs. AUSTIN. A Boston paper, speaking of an opera to be performed in the Tremont theatre, thus speaks of this famous "cantatrice."

"The whole is to conclude with the last act of the Tempest, in which Mrs. Austin, as the sylph-like Ariel, will sing, among other morceaux delicieux, the beautiful air of "where the bee sucks," in which she is so very unsuccessful that the audience, a few evenings since, called upon her to rehearse it no less than four times—themselves willing to submit to any inconvenience rather than she should forego such an opportunity for improvement; and we have no doubt that a crowded auditory will be present this evening to witness her advancement in taste and science."

This is equal to the compliment that Fielding, in his "Tom Jones," paid to his friend Garrick, through the mouth of Partridge; who did not think that Garrick, (in Hamlet), was at all worthy of commendation—because that he, (Partridge), if he had seen his father's ghost would have been as much frightened as he (Garrick, as Hamlet) was!

THE EXPEDITION. Captain Back and his associates in the enterprise to discover and relieve captain Ross and his fellow adventurers, of which we made mention a few days since, arrived at this port in the Hibernia, from Liverpool. The undertaking, though we fear a hopeless one, is deserving of great praise, as well for the benevolence of its primary, as for the importance of its ulterior object. [N. Y. Com. Adv.]

CHURCH ARTILLERY. During the delivery of a lecture on church property, by Mr. F. Coghlan, while on his political tour through Somerset, enumerating the various degrees of ecclesiastics, the name of canons attracted the attention of one of his hearers, who interrupted the lecturer as follows—"zur, stop zur, I wish to ask a question, zur—what sort of gannons be they? Be they brass, or be they iron gannons, zur?" [English paper.]

HURRICANE IN CHINA. Brief notices have been published of a typhoon, or hurricane, which was experienced in China on the 3d of August. The Canton Register speaks of it as "more disastrous than any before felt in China." It says:

"The loss of life and property in native craft is, from all quarters, reported as terrific. Many bodies have been washed up at Macao and among the islands. Junks and smaller vessels are seen in great numbers wrecked, cast ashore or dismantled, especially at Lantao, and many are known to have gone down at sea; among the rest, are four out of the six junks which had started for T'en-tsing; two of these had returned, one dismantled; the others, which had from 400 to 500 chests of Malwa on board, sunk with all hands.

In Canton and the suburbs, above a thousand houses and sheds, besides 20 temples, have been wholly or partially overthrown, and about 400 persons crushed beneath them. By the destruction of boats, and of public places erected on stakes over the water, about 230 persons have lost their lives. The number of small boats destroyed is not ascertainable.

At Keang-shan, the ravages of the typhoon were on an equal scale; 400 places of abode and 10 temples having fallen. Eleven passage boats, 20 trading boats, and about 60 small boats, were destroyed. The total loss of life was about 130 persons.

At Macao, 10 houses, 8 passage boats, 7 or 8 temples, and between 50 and 100 small boats are destroyed. Several junks swamped or ran on shore. Five war junks were lost at the Bogue and among the islands. Some officers and about 30 men perished.

VENEZUELA. The "Redactor" of this city, confirms, on the authority of the Caracas Gazette, the reported prevalence of a mortal disease in the department of Apure. It is stated that in Montecal, and in all the other towns in that department, the fever has entered every house—and that in some of them not an individual has been spared. The few persons who are able to remove, are fleeing to distant places, abandoning their dwellings, cattle and all the property they cannot carry with them. Of the poor who are sick, the greater part die; and their bodies remaining unburied, increase the impurity of the atmosphere. These disasters have been greatly aggravated by the want of physicians, medicines and assistance; but we are glad to learn that the Venezuelan government has sent a physician and proper supplies for their relief.

This department is represented as one of the most fertile in that region, abounding in rich pastures, where the wild cattle are fed, the hunting of which is one of the principal employments of the inhabitants.

HIGH SPORTING! As I have seen a challenge from "Julia," by Bertrand, the favorite of the south, and understand that a similar challenge has been made by "Medoc," the favorite son of "Eclipse," the champion of the north, each to meet, on their respective courses, any nag that can be produced, for the sum of ten thousand dollars—four mile heats; and as it is not possible for me to accommodate both parties, and not wishing to make an invidious distinction between the two; I therefore propose, as the best means of affording a general accommodation, to meet them both in a sweepstake next fall, over the Broad Rock course, with Mary Randolph, by Gohanna; four mile heats; ten thousand dollars entrance; half forfeit; to close on the first of May next, and free for any other horse, mare, or gelding, in the world. WILLIAM WYNN.

March 14th, 1833.
N. B. The above course is named, not only because the part owner of the mare is the proprietor of the course, but because it would be a central ground.

The Bonnets O' Blue having sustained an injury in one of her hocks, will never again appear on the turf, and therefore settles her racing accounts, which stand thus:

She won the great sweepstakes at New York, seventeen subscribers, $500 each—eight starting,	$6,250
She won the stakes at Tree-hill,	800
Her match against Goliah	5,000
The club race at New York, four mile heats, against Black Maria, and others	1,000
Her match against Clara Fisher,	5,000
Sale of her,	4,000

$22,050

Paid her entrance when she was beat by Sally Hornet,	$30
Her match with Little Venus,	5,000
Balance in her favor	17,030
	$22,050

These are all the races she ever started for, and the above account is true, as the records will show. [Turf Register.]

FOREIGN NEWS.

London dates to Feb. 27—Paris to March 2.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

Under the head of the Paris exchange, of 23d February, the Gazette de France says, that "owing to the new threats of England and France, the advice given by Russia to the king of Holland, and the annoyance of the existing state of affairs to Prussia, a speedy solution of the Belgian question was so strongly anticipated as to influence the funds very sensibly; the 3 per cents. which opened at 78 rose to 78 70, and left off at 78 50."

The menaces here referred to are contained in the following note. After recapitulating the substance of the preceding negotiation, the ministers of France and England declare—

Art. 1. After exhausting all means of conciliation to produce an amicable arrangement between Holland and Belgium, his Britannic majesty, in concert with the king of the French, that if by the 15th of March, his Netherlands majesty shall not send to the foreign office a note explaining the basis upon which a treaty of commerce between the two parties may be concluded, a French army, supported by a British naval force, will again enter Belgium, and will not again leave it till the treaty of 15th Nov. 1831, shall have been fully complied with.

Art. 2. The embargo on Dutch ships of war and merchant ships, shall be maintained both in France and England, till the above treaty be complied with.

Art. 3. France and England, before resorting to forcible measures, demand of Holland the abolition of the recently established toll.

Art. 4. The French and English governments, desirous of establishing the commercial intercourse of two governments whose relations are hereafter to be altogether friendly, and not willing that the treaty to be made should be onerous to either party, will endeavor so to conciliate the interests of the two belligerent powers, as that the treaty may be signed and ratified by both powers in the course of the present month of March.

Art. 5. The undersigned representatives of France and England, finish by reiterating to the Dutch government the declaration in the first part of this note, and they hope that his Netherlands majesty, sensible of the real necessity of terminating a question which keeps in suspense the commerce of all Europe, will cut the gordian knot and transmit to us admissible propositions.

TALLEYRAND.
PALMERSTON.

London, 10th February.

This note was followed by a new convention between France and Belgium.

A Ghent paper states that, the Dutch made a sortie on the 27th Feb. from Zebzeete, and captured a post of civic guards, consisting of 3 officers and 50 men. Reparation had been demanded for this violation of territory.

Brussels papers state that the question of a toll having been established on the Scheldt has been resolved to the satisfaction of all parties, that river being now as open as ever to the navigation of all nations.

FRANCE.

Paris, Feb. 26. On Saturday evening general Lafayette called at the residence of the ministers of foreign affairs, where his presence surprised more than one member of the diplomatic corps. The general came to intercede with the minister for some Polish refugees, and to propose to him to subscribe to a ball which the Polish committee of Paris give on Saturday next for the relief of the unfortunate families thrown upon their charge by the disaster of Warsaw.

The government has just purchased the library of the late baron Cuvier for 72,000*fr.*, and the Egyptian manuscripts of M. Champollion, jun. for 50,000.

The order recently issued for dismantling Strasburgh and other strong fortresses has been recalled by the French government, but on what grounds we have not heard it explained.

The Moniteur of this morning, official part, contains the following article:

Paris, Feb. 25. On Friday, 22d February, at half past 5 o'clock, P. M. madame the duchess de Berri sent to general Bugeaud, commander of the citadel of Blaye, the following declaration:

"Under the pressure of circumstances, and influenced by the measures of the government, although I had the most urgent reasons for keeping my marriage secret, I think it due to myself, as well as to my children, to declare that I was secretly married during my residence in Italy."

Citadel of Blaye, 22d Feb. 1833.

MARIE CAROLINE."

This declaration having been transmitted by gen. Bugeaud to the president of the council, the minister of war, was immediately deposited among the archives of the chancery of France.

The declaration of the duchess de Berri gives a death blow to the legitimist party in France. Every one thinking what reprobation was excited throughout Europe by the marriage of Marie Louise to count Neipperg. We are curious to see what language the organs of legitimacy will now adopt.

"The affair of the duchess is ascribed to a young and handsome French viscount—not named.

Liberty has been promised to the duchess—who has announced her willingness to return to Naples.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

London, Feb. 25. The reports of dissonances in the cabinet have latterly gained more credit. It is said that two of the ministers of greatest influence are engaged in an intrigue, the result of which will be a rupture with the leaders of the whig party, and an alliance with the tories. It is asserted that several members of the cabinet, with lord Grey at their head, have threatened to hand in their resignations if such a state of things continue.

His majesty's ministers will take into immediate consideration the affairs of the East Indies. It is said the commerce with China will be made free.

SPAIN.

The Madrid Gazette of the 14th of Feb. contains a royal decree requiring a levy of 25,000 young soldiers to replace those who, by virtue of the decree of the 8th Feb. 1827, had performed their six years service. This levy, says the decree, is for the maintenance of the army upon the peace establishment.

The mission of sir Stratford Canning, has failed completely. The Spanish government refused to lend itself to the views of the British cabinet, and M. Zea, whose credit lord Palmerston was desirous of overthrowing, seems destined long to remain at the head of the Spanish cabinet.

The parent country, under the liberal and enlightened auspices of the queen-regent, will, it is said, acknowledge the independence of all her ancient possessions in the western hemisphere—Cuba, of course, excepted, which would benefit greatly by opening a trade with the revolted states.

PORTUGAL.

The letters received from Lisbon this morning concur in representing the army of Don Miguel as in such a sickly and disorganised state, that it is generally supposed the siege of Oporto will soon be raised. Wagons for transporting the sick were arriving from every direction. It is asserted that the forts and advanced works were about to be constructed on the environs of Lisbon, in the anticipation that the army of Don Pedro would march upon the capital. * [Globe.]

TURKEY AND EGYPT.

Accounts from Constantinople in January 31, says—that the agents dispatched by the French charge d'affaires at Constantinople, and by the Russian general Muraviev, to the head quarters of Ibrahim pacha, to open negotiations, have returned to Constantinople without accomplishing the object of their mission. A kind of armistice had, it is true, been concluded, but the term of it had nearly expired at the departure of the courier from Constantinople.

The representatives of the European powers are said to be highly dissatisfied with the state of affairs, as they expected a more favorable result from their proposals to Ibrahim pacha. It was thought, at Constantinople, that if an arrangement between Turkey and Egypt should not be effected soon, France would take an active part in the affairs of the east.

Vienna, February 20. By an extraordinary conveyance we have received news from Constantinople that Ibrahim pacha is continuing his march, and that the main body of his army has arrived at Aksehir, and his advance guard at Kulahia. He declined entering into any negotiation, and would not suspend his military operations, except on positive orders from his father. Under these circumstances, the sultan had recourse to the Russian ambassador, who immediately sent orders to Sebastopol, for a Russian squadron to join the Turkish fleet in the Bosphorus. The sultan likewise asked for a body of Russian soldiery, which had arrived at the Danube, but this aid the ambassador refused. Every thing is perfectly tranquil at Constantinople and it is generally believed that Mehmet Ali will accept the propositions which the two plenipotentiaries of Russia have gone to Alexandria to submit to him.

It is stated that the Turkish fleet had entered the port of Constantinople, and that the Persian envoy has frequent conferences with the reis effendi.

ADDITIONAL ITEMS.

The London Standard asserts that lord Althorpe had tendered his resignation—which was not either absolutely accepted or refused.

A meeting was held in Liverpool on the 27th February, adverse to lord Grey's bill of coercion for Ireland. It was numerous and respectfully attended, and seemed animated with strong and decisive feelings on the subject. In three days, upwards of thirteen thousand signatures were attached to the petition adopted on the subject.

A London paper of the 3d March, notices a report, the accuracy of which is however rather doubtful, that the question of the renewal of the East India company's charter is to be settled on the following terms:

Three or five years are given to the company to wind up their accounts, but the trade is at once to be thrown entirely open; the commercial capital is to go towards the liquidation of the Indian debt; the territorial possessions are to remain in the hands of the company; the dividends of the proprietors are to be secured upon the territories of India for a certain number of years, (ten is mentioned), and then the capital is to be paid off at £100; the directors are to be reduced to twelve, &c. &c.

The Irish suppression bill was still under debate in the house of commons. It was ardently defended, and as ardently opposed. The best talents of the house were fully brought out—and much confusion sometimes prevailed.

The Erin steam vessel, plying between England and Ireland, has been lost in a gale. Part of the wreck had been washed on shore. It was believed that she had not less than ninety persons on board—all of whom perished.

Two female infants, united by the abdomen, like the Siamese twins, were lately born in England, and were to be exhibited.

In the house of commons on the 1st March on the presentation of a petition, Mr. Wilks asked whether the government contemplated any measures for the abolition of negro slavery. The chancellor of the exchequer replied, that, at present, he could not give any precise answer.

It has at last been decided, that Joseph Pease, the Quaker, who it was feared would lose his seat in the imperial parliament, on account of belonging to a society which sanctions affirmation instead of swearing—shall retain his membership. The subject was brought before the house of commons, and after some explanatory remarks from the hon. Mr. Wynn, and the solicitor general—

The speaker then put the question—"That Joseph Pease, esq. be allowed to make his solemn affirmation at the table instead of his oath."

The ayes seemed almost universal, and not one no was heard.

The speaker gave his decision—"I think the ayes have it"—amid tremendous cheering.

This is, really, pleasant intelligence—and shews that "reform" in England, means—something.

POLAND.

The latest intelligence from this ill-fated country is contained in the following article.

Since the press in Germany is under the severe control of Russia, Austria and Prussia, no information from Poland can be obtained but with the greatest difficulty. I must add that the Russian government takes the greatest care that its cruel ukase should not be known in foreign countries. I find, however, the means of informing you that the establishment of the mint and its steam engine have been carried away to St. Petersburg, that the prisons are still full, and the fate of the imprisoned is not as yet known. Every thing indicates great poverty in the Russian finances. The increase of taxes, and the confiscations, without waiting for the sentence of the courts, is going on with greater vigor. Prince Czartoriski's magnificent country seat at Pulawy has been announced in the Warsaw newspaper as confiscated, and offered for sale; and in Volhynia and Podolia the confiscations are almost general, without paying the mortgages on those estates. The system of transplantation continues to carry away to Siberia and the Caucasus the peasants and the small gentry. The measure which provoked the whole population was the violation of the church of Chlenstokow, held in the greatest veneration. There was in that church a miraculous image of the holy Virgin. For many centuries, kings, princes, the wealthy, and the poor, carried to that church their offerings in diamonds, gold, silver and most rich exvotos. It was respected during the invasions of Turks and Tartars, but not by the Russians. That rich treasure, amounting to millions, has been robbed and carried away to St. Petersburg. The annihilation of the Roman Catholic church—the introduction of the Greek schismatic religion—the total extinction of the Polish nation, is openly declared and sworn! The most provoking circumstance is the audacity with which the Russian government, in perpetrating these barbarous cruelties, denies and contradicts them in foreign newspapers.

Later—London papers to the 6th March.

The Irish enforcing bill was read a first time in the house of commons on the 5th of March, after a division—463 against 89. The 8th was appointed for a second reading of the bill. The great majority in favor of it, and in a reformed parliament, would shew that the present condition of Ireland requires an action beyond the admitted provisions of the constitution, and to be excused only because of the supposed necessity of the case. In the debate on the 4th, Mr. Emerson Tenant, a supporter of the bill, held the following language:

"These additional powers were not all that was necessary to put down disturbance. No; the ground work of disturbance in Ireland was poverty [hear, hear!] and predial agitation paved the way for political agitation. The fiercest agitation would fail of success, if they would only direct their attention to this point. As it was, he found the people reckless from want, and too ready to join in any scheme, however desperate. Let them alleviate the condition of the Irish peasantry—afford them opportunities of obtaining remunerative employment—snatch them from starvation—and give a legal maintenance for the helpless and the infirm—[general cheering.] Let them do this, and agitation would cease. But if they did not do this, the reign of agitation would be perennial [hear, hear, hear!] He regarded this measure as precautionary, and not final."

The farmers and gentry of parts of the country of Wexford have formed themselves into parties of nightly patrol, for the preservation of order.

The ministers seem resolved on the prompt abolition of slavery in the West Indies—but it is now stated that they are willing to allow some compensation to the owners of slaves.—The whole project will, probably, be laid before parliament soon after the Irish suppression bill, and Irish church reform bill, &c. are disposed of. It seems clear that laws will be passed for the abolition of slavery.

The money market was "firm," because of the great majority in favor of the Irish suppression bill!

The Carlists of France are much embarrassed by the duchess of Berri's avowal of her marriage. It is not stated to whom she is married, and some doubt whether she is a married woman—though she ought to be one.

The chamber of deputies has decided an allowance of 6,000*fr.* or £240, to the widow of gen. Daumesnil, who both in 1814 and 1815 refused to surrender the castle of Vincennes to the allies.

Much is said about the affairs of Holland and Belgium—not worth repeating. The queen of the French was about to visit her daughter, the queen of Belgium.

Things are quiet in Spain. Nothing new from Portugal—except that a malignant fever prevailed in the armies of the rival brothers.

It is said that the Russian ambassador to Egypt has succeeded in inducing Ali pacha to suspend the further march of his army towards Constantinople.

LETTER FROM GENERAL LAFAYETTE.

TO THE INHABITANTS OF BOGOTA.

Translated from the Constitucional de Cundinamarca for the New York Daily Advertiser.

La Grange, July 29th, 1833.

Not knowing whether the first expression of my gratitude has ever reached you, I have thought the present time the most propitious occasion to address once more to the respected inhabitants of Bogota my lively and sincere thanks.

On the first anniversary of your revolution of 1830, you were pleased to address me your kind felicitations. On this second anniversary I wish to repeat to you how much I feel honored by your high esteem, and how deeply I am affected by your kindness.

On reading again your valued letter, which I shall preserve through life as a treasure dear to my heart, I cannot but compare your hopes then expressed with the present state of Europe. Be convinced, however, that our popular week, so justly celebrated by you, has already greatly favored the emancipation of this part of the world, and that, in spite of obstacles, both foreseen and unforeseen, the principles and practice of true liberty will triumph in Europe, over the pernicious influences which are exerted to retard its progress. Thus we also count, I confidently assure you, on the independence of noble Poland, whose efforts you admire, and whose misfortunes we have now to deplore.

Among the results of our revolution, I have been particularly pleased with the relations established between France and the new states of the republican hemisphere. The sympathies of the French people for you have their origin in the time when your patriotic section of South America gave the first example of heroic insurrection. I hope that the mutual bonds which ought to unite our two governments, will daily become closer and stronger.

The wishes felt by all generous minds on this side of the ocean, to see your new republics rise to the highest grade of liberty, security, and public and private prosperity, are not devoid of all personal interest; for at the present time, when in spite of the long experience of above half a century in North America, malevolence and aristocratic and monarchical prejudices still throw a doubt over the superiority of republican institutions, it is important to the civilization of the world to prove that those institutions, far from being an occasion for disturbances and enmity, every where secure the peaceful enjoyment of all the rights of the man and the citizen.

General Santander, whose friendship I have had the pleasure of cultivating here, and to whom you entrusted your letter, will please transmit you this my second reply. His residence in the United States of the north must have given him every opportunity to know the affectionate sentiments and fraternal sympathy which will ever be felt for you in that part of your hemisphere.

May the citizens of Bogota accept the tribute of my gratitude for favors which gratify me, and which I acknowledge with pride; while they accept my wishes for their general and personal happiness, together with my profound respect.

LAFAYETTE.

The Bogota papers inform us that this autograph letter is deposited in the library of the national museum, which has recently been restored and re-opened.

LETTER FROM MR. CAREY.

From the U. S. Telegraph.

DUFF GREEN, esq.—Sir: A misconstruction of a passage in your paper some days since, in which you comment on my late valedictory, induces me to request the favor of a place for a few lines in reply. It has been supposed, from the passage in question, that my withdrawal from the defence of the protecting system, which you style "a bad cause," has arisen from a change of opinion. This is an inference which my language did not warrant, and which is entirely erroneous. Every fact that comes to my knowledge, connected with the subject, serves, more and more, to confirm me in the soundness of the doctrines. Our national experience affords the strongest corroboration of it.

In 1783 and 84 we tried free trade; that is, regulating our import according to the wants of the government, and what was the consequence? Distress and desolation overspread the face of the land; paper money, instalment and tender law were introduced, accompanied by an insurrection which endangered the union.

We tried the same experiment in 1816. With the exception of coarse cottons, to favor the south, and some few other articles, the duties were calculated merely for the purpose of revenue. What was the result then? Nearly the same degree of distress and desolation as in the former case.

The first really protective tariff ever enacted in this country was in 1824. What has been the result? A spread of prosperity never exceeded, in the same space of time, in any other country in the world.

Holland tried free trade in 1816. What was the result? Hear the language of one of her statesmen:

"It is the tariff of 1816 which has opened the door to the productions of foreign industry. From that period there has been a constant deficiency in our finances.

"It is since 1816, that the ninth part of the nation is reduced either to mendicancy, or to require assistance.

"It is since 1816, that manufactures and commerce have declined with giant strides.

"It is since 1816, that the metallic medium of the nation has been lavished to pay tribute to foreign industry.

"This disappearance of the specie is most perniciously felt by the reduction of the price of houses, which, except in Brussels and the Hague have fallen since that period more than one-third.

"It is ascertained, that the immense number of breweries and distilleries, which formerly existed in both parts of the kingdom, have undergone prodigious diminution."

Russia made the same fatal experiment in 1818, with the same destructive results. Pray attend to the declaration of the emperor Alexander in the proclamation restoring the protecting system:

"In proportion as the prohibitory system is extended and rendered perfect in other countries, that state which pursues the contrary system makes, from day to day, sacrifices more extensive and more considerable. It opens its ports to all foreign productions—and all ports are shut against the articles it was in the habit of exporting. It offers a continual encouragement to the manufactures of other countries; and its own manufactures perish in the struggle which they are as yet unable to maintain.

"It is with the most lively feelings of regret we acknowledge it is our own proper experience, which enables us to trace the picture. The evils which it details, have been realised in Russia and Poland since the conclusion of the act 7—19 of December, 1818. Agriculture without a market, industry without protection, languish and decline. Specie is exported, and the most solid commercial houses are shaken. The public prosperity would soon feel the wound inflicted on private fortunes, if new regulations did not promptly change the actual state of affairs."

I have withdrawn from the arena in consequence of the utter destitution of co-operation throughout the whole of last year, on the part of those vitally interested, and the hopelessness of any in future. I am not easily discouraged; but it is obvious that it were worse than Quixotic for any individual, however zealous or ardent, to attempt, unaided, to stem the torrent that is sweeping away the system which has diffused such prosperity over the country. I am as much attached to the cause as I was in March, 1819, when I began; and, with proper support, would advocate it gratuitously to the last hour of my life, notwithstanding the various revolting circumstances by which the advocacy has been constantly attended at almost every step of my progress.

That the system at present adopted will produce most injurious effects, I feel confident; but not to the same extent as in 1783, and 1816. The extraordinary enterprise of our citizens, their excellent machinery, the wide extent of our Atlantic border, the almost boundless internal communication by our immense rivers, our canals and our rail roads, will avert a large portion of the evils which befel us in the two former periods, and enable us to compete with foreign rivals on much more equal terms.

THE TREASURY BUILDING.

From the National Intelligencer, of April 6.

We observe an intimation in a letter from this city, published in the Journal of Commerce, that the papers destroyed, in the late conflagration of the treasury building, "relate to unsettled accounts." We have no doubt that this statement was according to the best information of the writer. But, as our statement was different from this, and as we took no little pains to obtain the facts accurately by an examination on the spot, before we put them on paper, we have felt it to be our duty to inquire more particularly into the matter, to vindicate or to retract our own account of the affair. We find that we were correct in our statement, almost to the letter. The mass of papers relating to unsettled accounts were in the offices of the comptroller, first auditor, and register; and were all saved. Some settled accounts, of old date, which were in the garret, as we stated before, and also in the cellar, were lost.

Among the offices attached to the treasury department, which were in a different building from that destroyed, we omitted to mention the general land office, the records and papers of which remain, of course, not only safe, but undisturbed.

—We are very sorry to learn, that our mentioning the room by the name by which it was indicated to us by the officers about the building (as Mr. F. Laub's room) was understood to be intended as a reflection on Mr. LAUB. Very far from it. Such an idea never entered our head for a moment, and we now peremptorily disclaim it.

We have not yet heard the result of the investigation concerning the destruction of the treasury building, though it was promptly entered upon and earnestly pursued. Strong reports, however, are abroad that the conflagration was not accidental.

The Georgetown Gazette of the 10th, says—"The recent investigation entered into with so much spirit in relation to the late fire at the treasury building, was closed on Saturday evening last about 8 o'clock. The result had not transpired yesterday—Though doubtless it will soon be made public. The steps taken by the secretary of the treasury in relation to this unfortunate affair, are highly creditable to him. The loss of public property of any description should never be suffered, without being made to undergo a rigid examination into the causes.

INDIAN EXPENSES.

From the act making appropriations to carry into effect Indian treaties, &c. as published in the Globe, we make the following abstract:

For the Winnebagoes , for treaty of Sept. 1832,	$23,382
For the Sacks and Foxes ,	69,474
For the Shawnees and Delawares , October,	42,250
For the Kaskaskias and Peorias ,	8,630
For the Appalachicola tribe	13,000
For the Potawatamies of the Prairie , by treaty of October 1832, and January 1833,	124,779
For the Kickapoos , by treaty of Oct. and Nov.	71,232
For the Potawatamies of the Wabash , October,	283,761
For the Potawatamies of Indiana ,	81,520
For the Piankeshaws and Weas ,	22,262
To enable the president to extinguish Indian titles in Indiana, Illinois and Michigan, in addition to grant of last year,	3,871
For expenses of the treaty at Battle des Morts , in addition to former appropriation,	400
For removal and subsistence of the Creeks , &c. in addition,	16,561
For arresting and guarding Ioway murderers,	1,023
For locating Choctaws , (not before provided for)	1,500
For expense of Chickasaw deputation to Washington,	1,650
For expense of keeping twelve prisoners of war of the Sacs and Foxes as hostages, &c.	2,500
For sundry small items—together,	4,030
For expenses of removing and subsisting the Choctaw, Creek, Cherokee, and Ohio Indians,	474,013
For holding a treaty with the Potawatamies to extinguish their remaining title in Illinois,	10,000
For carrying into effect treaty with Chickasaws , to be refunded out of sales of their land,	100,000
For do do with the Ottowas ,	47,400
For do do with the Menominees ,	58,600
For several small items—together,	5,000
For expense, if found necessary, of repressing Indian hostilities on the frontiers,	100,000

$1,506,838

The greater portion of this million and a half of dollars is for enabling these Indians to remove, compensating them for their improvements, and providing blacksmith's shops, school masters, &c. in their new settlements. There is also a proviso in the bill to compensate the American board of foreign missions for the value of their improvements, &c. in the Choctaw settlement, sold at the treaty of the Dancing Rabbit creek.

LOTTERIES ABOLISHED IN MASSACHUSETTS.

The bill for the suppression of lotteries in the state of Massachusetts, was approved by the governor on the 23d ult. The first section imposes a fine of from one hundred to two thousand dollars upon any person who shall make, sell or offer for sale, or have in his possession with intent to sell, or offer for sale, or be in any way concerned in the sale of any lottery ticket, or certificates, taken on security for any lottery ticket, or shall be in any way concerned in the management or drawing of a lottery, or shall knowingly permit the drawing of lotteries, or sale of, or raffling for tickets in any building owned, rented or occupied by him. One half of the penalty is given to the informer. A second conviction is made punishable, in addition to the fine, by imprisonment in the house of correction, for a term of from three to twelve months.

The second section creates a penalty of from thirty to one hundred dollars, for advertising the sale of tickets or certificates, or for the exhibition of any sign or symbol in any way indicating where they may be purchased.

The third section provides that the making, selling or offering for sale, or having in possession with such intent, of tickets or certificates in fictitious lotteries, or lotteries not authorised by any state, shall be punished by imprisonment in the state prison, for a term of from one to three years. In this case, the person accused is held to prove that the ticket was a genuine ticket in a lottery authorised by some state, his failing to do this is to be held as proof that the ticket is fictitious. On a conviction under this section, the prosecutor is entitled to a reward of fifty dollars from the commonwealth.

*Considerations sur le projet de loi, concernant le nouveau système financier du royaume des Pays-bas. A Bruxelles, 29 Juin, 1821, page 29.

The fourth section authorises justices of the peace to make preliminary examination or complaint as in cases of other offences.

The fifth section forfeits to the commonwealth the money which any lottery adventurer may receive for any prize drawn in any real or fictitious lottery, to be recovered by information or for action for money had and received.

The last section repeals all former laws on the subject except as to actions or prosecutions already commenced under them.

RAIL ROAD COMPANIES—NEW YORK.

From the "New York Annual Register," by Mr. E. Williams, for 1833, the following schedule of rail road companies incorporated in that state, is copied. [We take this opportunity to express our opinion, that Mr. Williams' annual is the most valuable work of its kind published in the United States. Mr. Force's "National Calendar," also stands at the head of the list, for interesting matters belong to its class.]

INCORPORATED RAIL ROAD COMPANIES.

Albion and Tonawanda—from Albion to Batavia, incorporated in 1832, capital	$250,000
Auburn and Erie canal—from Auburn to Erie canal, incorporated in 1832, capital	150,000

COBBETT IN PARLIAMENT.

Among the measures of reform which Mr. Cobbett proposes to introduce in British legislation since he has become a member of the house of commons, is one that that body should assemble in the morning and carry on its deliberations by day. At present it does not meet till evening, and frequently remains in session during the whole night. An healthy and vigorous legislation, it is urged, is incompatible with late hours, and that the public are entitled to the best time of their representatives. "All night work should, if possible, be avoided," says Mr. Cobbett, "birds of omen, bats, toads, and all noxious things, did their work at night;" if he ever published an English Dictionary as a companion to his Grammar, he would give to some words new definitions, as for instance, "midnight," "the time which bats, boroughmongers and banditti find to be most favorable for committing their depredations." The chief argument set up against this proposal, is the inconvenience it would occasion to the ministers, whose presence in a British parliament is absolutely necessary, whilst their time throughout the day, is occupied with the business of their departments. Another objection to it, not however, so deeply avowed, is that a complete change in the habits of life of many of the members would be necessary, were it would be convenient for them to meet at the comparatively speaking, early hour contemplated by Mr. Cobbett.

[They who are not ignorant of the history of Ireland must remember that Mr. Plunket—now lord chancellor of Ireland—was one of the most eloquent and most zealous of those who opposed the union projected and effected by Mr. Pitt and lord Castlereagh, three and thirty years ago; and they will understand the annexed extract from a report of a speech recently inflicted by Cobbett upon the reformed house of commons:]

"In agitating and discussing the subject of the repeal, they had a right to go back to the opinions which were expressed by public men at the time when the union was first brought forward, notwithstanding those men might be in power now. The noble earl at the head of the government was justly cited as an evidence; and there was (said the hon. member, slapping the table with huge force) another man whom I shall now cite, and if there ever was a thing known which would make a man hate his name, the evidence which he would now bring forward, out of that man's own mouth, ought to have that effect. After using every argument that ingenuity, truth, reason, or justice, could inspire him with, against the union, after declaring the law by which it was effected to be one which wisdom, honor, and justice combined to repudiate and to disclaim, the person to whom he referred said, 'For my own part I will resist this iniquitous measure to the last drop of my blood, and to the last gasp of my existence, and when the period of my dissolution approaches, I will, like another Amalek, take my children to the altar and swear them, as Hannibal, to eternal hostility against the invaders of my country's freedom.' (Cheers). Such was the declaration of the man to whom he alluded. And where was that man? Was he alive? Was he an exile from his injured, his deplored country? Had he fled the scene of her sorrows, and hid his head in a foreign clime? What! was it possible! Did he perceive that man in the present lord chancellor of Ireland? (Laughter). Yet indeed, could it be? Chancellor of Ireland, and perchance but an untoward and hateful destiny, the keeper and manager of those dungeons into which were to be cast the unhappy men who now sought to vindicate his opinions. And where, too, are all the young Hannibals? (Immense shouts of laughter). Where those youthful martyrs whom he was to swear at the altar—ay, 'swear to eternal hostility against the invaders of his country's freedom?' Where were they? He would tell men where they were and what they were doing. There was Hannibal the first—(laughter)—the hon. and rev. Thos. Plunket, dean of Down, in the gift of the crown, including a district of six parishes—"bless his capacious soul!"—(a laugh)—a benefice of £2,863 per annum. Then comes Hannibal the second—the hon. John Plunket, an assistant barrister of the county of Meath, £600. Crown prosecutor—oh, oh! and there will be business soon for him—£800 and another appointment of £300—making a total of £1,700 a year for this youthful patriot. Next came Hannibal the third—the hon. David Plunket, prothonotary and examiner of the court of common pleas in Ireland, £1,500; having besides patronage to the extent of £4,100 a year. Again, a fourth Hannibal starts forth in the guise of Patrick Plunket, who, as secretary to the banker's commission, received £900; and from other sources an income, altogether, of £2,100. The hon. and rev. William Plunket next put in his claim, but he must be considered an ill-used man, for though he was incumbent of the living of Bray—

"Several hon. members—a vicar of Bray! (loud laughter.)

"Mr. Cobbett—yes, vicar of Bray; yet his income was but £470, with a house and glebe. The hon. Robert Plunket, another of the reverends, closed the list of this devoted family."

[The manners of St. Stephen's chapel are well displayed in a London reporter's account of the manner in which Cobbett was treated while proposing an amendment to the answer to the king's speech.]

"The hon. member was proceeding, when he was interrupted by repeated coughs and other discordant noises. 'Sir,' said he, addressing the speaker, I appeal to you to be so good as to keep order. The house is very much mistaken if it is supposed that I am to be put down. I am not silenced in that way, I assure you; and if this course of proceeding is to be persevered in I shall adjourn the house. (Laughter and cheers from the benches in the rear of the hon. member). The best way is for you to sit and hear me quietly, for I do assure you I was quite prepared for this. [The noises here partially ceased.] The hon. member continued. The people expected something more than they had hitherto obtained from the reform ministers—[loud coughing]—instead of their asking a reformed house of commons for leave to render Ireland the scene of bloodshed and civil war. [Loud coughing.] "If, sir," said Mr. Cobbett, "we cannot have order, I will adjourn the house. You may depend upon it I will not spare them a word, they shall hear every word I intend to utter. [Laughing and cheers.] The people [continued the hon. member] expected from the house of commons to hear that some measures of relief were to be applied—[loud coughing, which interrupted the hon. member, who good naturedly shook his head, and waited till it had partially, not wholly ceased]—and they also expected to hear from ministers some recommendation to the parliament to take from those plunderers, who now feed upon their earnings, their ill-gotten wealth, and relieve them from those who had so long put their hands into the public purse. But no, none of these topics appeared in the speech from the throne. [Coughing, and attempts to drown the hon. member's voice.]"

CONDITION OF JAMAICA.

Kingston, 11th Feb. 1833.

You have heard of the splendid estates and sumptuous living of the Jamaicans: of their planters who could vie with the princes of the earth in their gorgeous palaces and rich equipment. Alas! those days are past. Their estates are a burthen, and even their life is held by a slender tenure. They know not but that their food, served by a numerous retinue, contains the deadly poison. How horrible to fear the assassin and the incendiary, in the most familiar faces. Yet such is the case, and one of the fairest islands of this fair earth must be abandoned to beings whose situation has made them little superior to the beasts, and whose course is downward. You well know that I am no friend to slavery. Far be it from me to advocate it. I give facts.

Under existing circumstances, I am well assured that the white inhabitants cannot remain. Their costly sugar estates will not pay the expense of management. Credit is entirely extinct. An estate of 200 negroes could not hypothecate the ensuing crop for £200. In fact, merchants in England direct their factors to give no credit bottomed on cane top. Mortgages relinquish immense sums rather than pay trifling annuities on estates. A hundred negroes were sold for $7,500. But legislation here and at home, a change of time, competition, and for aught I know, the natural and necessary consequences of the system of slavery, have brought about this state of things.

Certain it is that real estate is considered almost without value, a heavy island debt is impending, taxation intolerable, and life itself exceedingly precarious. I learned the above in conversation with two gentlemen who have been long in the house of assembly. The inhabitants generally labor under a keen sense of injury done them by the mother country, and look to ours as the land of promise. In consequence, many are making remittances to our cities. Some gentlemen of character and fortune have already removed, and many are preparing to follow. Those gentlemen informed me that the emigration would be immediate and large. They inquire with great earnestness respecting the agriculture of the free states, as nothing would induce them to live again in a slave country.

SOUTH CAROLINA CONVENTION.

From the Charleston Mercury.

JUDGE RICHARDSON'S SPEECH.

I have already (says the correspondent of the Mercury) given you the purport of what Judge Richardson said, on the 15th, upon Mr. Phillips's motion to strike out the preamble of the ordinance. The following are his remarks, somewhat more in detail.

He set out by saying, that he approved so entirely the enacting clause of the ordinance, that he might even have omitted his objections to the preamble, if that question had not been set on foot by others.

He regretted that the convention could not content itself with the act, about which all seemed to agree; that it should have been thought necessary to join to that act, reasons, upon which we were certain to differ.

If preambles were to be employed, they should, at least, perform the proper business of a preamble. They should strongly and succinctly set forth the great motives to the legislative act; and, above all things, they should always found themselves as strictly as possible, upon perfectly correct facts. They should recite nothing that is not perfectly just.

Yet your preamble contains, among the chief facts that it alleges, two that are palpably incorrect.

Its first statement is this—"that congress has made such a reduction and modification of the duties upon foreign imports," as brings them down to a revenue standard.

I ask gentlemen, is this so? Are the duties reduced already to a revenue standard? I believe if the act is consulted, it will be found, that no reduction happens till the 30th of December next: that it is, even then, but a very partial reduction: that, upon one important article of southern consumption—low priced plains—the duties have been raised 45 per cent; in short, that this entire "reduction and modification," is future, and cannot therefore be spoken of, in the terms that you employ.

The second statement, in the preamble, seems to me little better founded. It is, that the duties are by the act, "brought down to a revenue standard."

In this declaration, I cannot, after the most careful and dispassionate investigation that it was possible for me to give, by any means concur. If I in any sort understand the true merits of this compromise, they fall short of what the preamble attributes to them. I cannot, with the utmost effort of my vision, perceive that this modification reaches a revenue point. I grant that it is a step towards it; the second great step. For the reduction of last year was another, and the first.

I am far from believing that even your ultimate rate of 20 per cent. (which you are only to reach in 1842), will then be low enough. I am willing, however, to accede to your present steps, because the late act has really done much. I regard it as the inception of the overthrow of the American System. It is proof of that change, on which I had always relied—the change of public opinion. This is its true effect—no more.

MR. MCDUFFIE'S REPLY.

Mr. McDuffie said, that it had not been his intention to speak upon this question. The remarks of the gentleman from Sparta-burg compelled him to take the floor.

That gentleman objects to the preamble as asserting "that a reduction had been made." If the gentleman had been good enough to read that which he objected, he would have seen that it asserts no such thing. The words run thus,—"Whereas the congress of the United States by an act recently passed, has made such a reduction and modification of the duties upon foreign imports, as amounts, substantially, to an ultimate reduction of the duties to a revenue standard."

But, were it even as the gentleman supposed, what would be the common understanding of the words? Would any man apprehend them as conveying what was not true? I heard that very gentleman, last summer, speak in the very same form of the act of 1832, which had certainly not then gone into force. He then said, "that act had reduced the duties to the extent of between six and twelve millions."

His first objection therefore, becomes a mere verbal criticism—a technical quibble.

As to his second, let us see if the act does provide for an ultimate reduction of the duties to a revenue standard.

That principle is distinctly laid down in the bill; and it is joined to the further declaration, that no more revenue shall be raised, than is necessary to defray the economical expenses of the government. These, with a system of ad valorem duties, and a class of free articles, make the general principles of the bill.

Among the articles made free, in December next, are the very important ones of linens, silks, and worsted goods: classes of commodities exceedingly important to us; and which will give us, beyond all question, exchanges for our particular productions, amounting to at least 15 millions of dollars per annum. Linens, most especially, are strictly an article of southern trade: and all these would be paid for, by our productions only.

If this reduction do not go into immediate effect is it not as speedy as any of which the gentlemen can shew me an example. Was an instant reduction ever seen? Was such a thing ever claimed? Could it be made, without ruin to the commercial interest.

If the gentleman will examine, I assure him that he will find the reduction on the protected articles only, which is to happen in December next, between three and five millions; besides ten per cent. general, on the receipt of duties of all such unprotected articles, as pay more than twenty per cent.

Surely then, all these advantages made the bill not entirely unfit to be compared with that of 1832, which this gentleman and his friends magnified as "the best of all possible bills"—as a bill that it was a species of impiety not to fall down and worship.

What is our present position as to this question, compared to our former one? Four years since, what said your popular president?—the man who, from the boundless ascendancy of popular favor, wields the whole force of your democracy? He said that a system, for the purposes of protection alone, would never in this country be abandoned—"that this was neither to be expected nor desired."

What said he; once again? "That no arrangement of the duties could ever be expected to take place, which would not always leave a large surplus revenue in the treasury."

I ask the gentleman, where is now the man who would dare say this? There is not such a one in congress. Even Mr. Webster, the boldest champion of the system, now shrinks from such an avowal, and covering before the strength of our principles, admits that only such revenue may be raised, as the economical administration of the government requires.

How would he have been regarded four years ago, who set up even a claim to this principle? Sir, he would have been treated as a mere madman—a political Quixote.

But "this," it seems, "is but the second step." So says the honorable member, whose opinion I can little expect to shake. My own, however, made up in close view of all the facts, is utterly opposite; and I here solemnly declare, in the presence of God, that the act of 1832 would never have been touched, except for the acts of this state. Sir, the fact was avowed to me by a union member of this state—one of the most distinguished of his party, and high in the confidence of the president.

But the gentleman refers all reduction to the agency of the executive. Has he forgotten when, only last summer, we were told with the utmost pomp of statements almost under the great seal, "that the tariff was completely brought down to the wants of the government?" Can he not remember how these were heralded to us here, for purposes that I need not now mention? Why sir, all the world knows, that this tariff of 1832 was a Jackson tariff. Upon that tariff was he voted for—upon that tariff elected. Think you, sir, that his last message would have been sent, if his election had been then pending? Never! No, sir. That tariff, not yet put in execution, was his, and as such, openly avowed as the final settlement of the question. Every man who refused to accept it was denounced. It was the test, the very bond of Jacksonism, held up as such to the whole host of the timid or the corrupt; and reverently kissed as the new covenant of faith, by all who aspired to be the friends of the president.

Within a little three months, lo! he comes to us, with a message to recommend a reduction of the duties!—of duties not yet gone into effect—of duties, just now clamorously proclaimed to have been reduced to their lowest possible rate—of duties, to be content with which, had just now been the very test of Jacksonism!

And what was the high motive that urged him to this? I speak it with regret, for the president, and with shame, for the country: but I only speak what I know, when I say that he did it, to crush the party that he hates, in this state. He did it, that he might be able to hold up these declarations to them and say, "audacious rebels! look what Andrew Jackson has said! Traitors to you are! why did you not wait?"

To this, it was impossible for us to reply, unless humbly, in such sort as this: "How, may it please your majesty, was it possible for us to guess this? Was it easy to divine that you, the Ajax of the tariff just adopted, were, in the next moment to turn its destroyer? What, but the spirit of prophecy, or of omniscience, could have foreseen a course so devious."

As for Clay's bill, I voted for it, with strong reluctance. I did not regard it as doing enough. On this question, my peculiar views are well known to be different from those of the chief part of the southern country. Had I consulted them alone, I should have said "accept only of uniform ad valorem duties." I did not, however, think that my particular personal opinions should be forced upon the south; and I acquiesced in the undivided wishes of our friends.

It is true that what has been obtained must be regarded as in some sense, an achievement. It is, for the moment, a victory. But it is only such, if the people, now awakened, refuse to let it lull them into even an instant's security. There is, in this general government, a proclivity to consolidation, that nothing except the most resolute watchfulness can stay. The southern states are made, by their peculiar position and institutions, the centinels of the liberties of this confederacy. Were I to die this night, my last words should be, to bid them act, as if the day were at hand, when they must defend their freedom.

Strong as is the present cause of contest, and powerful as is the necessity that compels us to maintain this battle, a yet deeper cause, bringing with it a still more imperative necessity of resistance, lies beneath the present question. We were threatened with it, even at this session, and in the very midst of questions, that already asked the whole wisdom and moderation of the country to appease them. They told us, openly, that we must pay for the vice in our institutions; that the free labor of the north must not—shall not be degraded to the same footing with the slave labor of the south.

If, then, I am disposed to accept this compromise, it is with a distinct announcement to our people, that their zeal, their courage, their vigilance, must not be abated; nor must they, for a single instant, intermit their military preparations. I tell them, that we have greater need to be prepared to defend ourselves against these people, than against a foreign enemy. I have heard them, even in congress, talk openly of attacking us; and that, in a manner, with an exultation—that would render fiends themselves as fit confederates for us, as these men.

Without such preparation, and without a strong military spirit, no people ever yet maintained its liberties. But all our peculiar circumstances—all our institutions—render a thorough system of defence absolutely indispensable to our safety, as well as freedom. Our militia should be as well trained as the armies of Napoleon.

It is, besides, possible that this accommodation—this compromise—may not be respected. As that compromise should be our very utmost concession, we must hold ourselves ready to take the most decided steps, the instant that it is violated.

As for the force bill, it is clearly an attempt to vest in the president all authority whatsoever. Gigantic as are the powers that it gives he will know full well how to eke them out, with supplementary violence, if an occasion ever should arise, that could, by chance, render a yet wider discretion necessary. Of his skill and moderation, in constraining the law, we have no unapt example in his notion of hanging the Hartford convention, under the 2d section.

The powers now conferred upon him are far more than dictatorial. Rome, it must be remembered, never appointed a dictator except in the very last public necessity, when the existence of the state was threatened. Here it is done for much more than a year, and upon a mere question of the revenue laws.

Finally, to compare this bill with Mr. Verplanck's, which the presidential party attempt to place above it, as far better for the south. This bill has the principle of equal duties. Mr. Verplanck's had no principle whatever. In this, the minimums are totally abolished: in that, a number of specific duties were retained. In this, there is no heavy burden on the great articles of consumption. In that, those very articles are heaped with extravagant duties.

As to the reduction under the present bill, it must not be overlooked, that the largest annual diminutions are made to fall precisely on those things which are taxed the most.

The correspondent of the Mercury, adds—I give you the general substance of the above; and, I believe, with not a little fidelity. As to its spirit, however, and that overwhelming energy of utterance; that intensity of thought and passion, with which he pours out his strongest passages; I cannot, of course, give you the slightest image of that. I have only attempted his speech, indeed, because I knew that the public curiosity demanded it, and because there was little probability of his publishing it.

Yours, &c.

SOUTH CAROLINA—SCRAPS.

Before the Natchez left Charleston, capt. Zantinger gave a splendid entertainment on board his ship, to a very large company of ladies and gentlemen—the latter of both political parties. On the departure of the Natchez, the Courier, a union paper, bid her "God speed," at which the Mercury took offence. The Courier thus rejoins:

The Mercury quotes our farewell apostrophe to the Natchez, and appends to it the following dogrel lines, which are certainly entitled to all the praise that bald wit, impotent spite, and unmeaning profanity, can win for their common offspring:

"God bless the royal troops, though treason seoff;
God bless their pigtails, though they're now cut off!
And if at Washington old Nick should revel
As president elect, God bless the devil!"

The Mercury may well say that it does not "boast of the passage of CLAY's bill as a triumph." Such ebullitions of ill-nature as the foregoing betoken any thing but the feeling of victory. We confess ourselves at a loss how to appreciate that patriotism which finds cause of offence in our invocations of blessings on the gallant ship which has for sometime reposed so gracefully on the waters of our harbor, dispensing its hospitality to our citizens, without distinction of party, and proudly unfurling to the breeze the honored and glorious flag of "union and liberty."

We find the following article in the Charleston, (S. C.) Mercury, it is a precious piece of coxcombery and deserves to be embalmed, like the holy beetles in Egypt:—

The Courier asks whether the United States flag formed any part of the decorations of the state rights ball. It did not; and there was reason that it should not. The ball was given by those who had volunteered to defend their state from invaders sent against her under that flag. Our harbor has not yet been evacuated by the president's forces, and the flag of the union is seen daily floating over our forts strengthened against South Carolina. Besides the United States flag is identified with the bill of blood, so long as that infamous bill remains un repealed. When that is torn from the statute book, and all hostile manifestations against our state have ceased, and we can think of the union without thinking of tyranny, then, and not till then, can the flag of the union regain in the bosoms of Carolinians, the reverence and affection it once commanded.

The Camden, (S. C.) Journal says: The nullifiers of Georgia appear to be rather more fiery than those of our state. The members of the club at Macon, on hearing that Mr. Forsyth had voted for the revenue collection bill, assembled and prepared an effigy of their senator, which they suspended by the neck, and after amusing themselves for an hour with grinning and making wry faces at it, they set it on fire!—But this was not sufficient—fearing they would not acquire "renown" enough should they stop here, they loaded a 34 pounder, and, at the distance of eight paces, fired at the senator and completely demolished him—not "a vestige of the noble figure could be found," not even—a "grease spot!"

The Richmond Whig, which has strongly condemned both the president's proclamation and the "force bill," thus speaks of the new nullifying ordinance of South Carolina:

"Contrary to our hope, the force bill has been nullified by the S. Carolina convention—an injudicious step we think, and almost as supererogatory as the act itself. When by the repeal of the ordinance at November, the enforcing act was deprived of subject matter whereupon to act—when no appeal had been taken to congress against it, and no opportunity offered for the deliberate reflection of the country to perceive its utility, impolicy and unconstitutionality, we must think that South Carolina has acted with a precipitancy unworthy of her own dignity, and extremely calculated to embarrass her friends and impair the success of their exertions for a legislative removal of the grievance. Do we not know that the principal difficulty in compromising the tariff was the apprehension that the act would be ascribed to intimidation? Do we not know that the argument which has arrayed, by its plausibility, almost the whole American people against her, was—"what—shall twenty-three states yield to the dictation of one?" She has again, needlessly, exposed her conduct to the same odium, her cause to the same prejudice, and her friends to increased embarrassment. If before, her attitude was so formidable a bar to the repeal of the tariff, how much more so will it be now, when the same urgency does not exist, when the same long continued efforts have not been used, and when even those who justify the principle of nullification, are compelled to condemn its every day and unnecessary use?"

GEORGIA AND THE CHEROKEES.

From the U. S. Telegraph.

The National Gazette contains a communication on this subject, in which it is attempted to be shown that the bloody bill cannot be made applicable to the Cherokee case. For some reason or other, we cannot conceive what, the Gazette countenances the same idea. We do not wish to charge the Gazette with an attempt at deception; but does not the Gazette know, what is well known here and elsewhere, that the sections referred to were introduced, we might almost say, expressly for the purpose of being applied to the Georgia case. It was soon known that it was intended for them to be so applied; and whatever doubts might have been entertained upon the subject, were soon removed by the Indian delegation. They indirectly refused to sell, although the government made them an offer of two millions and a half, and would have gone to three millions. We are not sure but that three millions were offered. Has the Gazette never heard that it was with difficulty the president could be got to sign the bill? The truth is, the administration was outwitted. They discovered it, but not until it was too late. The president gave himself up, bound hand and foot, to his new friends, and they had not the least compassion for him.

But what will Georgia do when the mandate of the supreme court comes? Will she acknowledge her sins, repent and obey? Will she look to the white house for countenance and forbearance? In vain! the proclamation stares her in the face. Will she look to her union and proclamation men—her advocates of the bloody bill, her Forsyths and her Waynes? It will be needless. They have sold her to the Philistines, and shortly hope to receive the price of their treachery. Will she look to the union men of the adjoining states? Alas! their cry is submit! submit! the law of congress must be executed!

From the Georgia Recorder.

In conversation with one of our representatives, since his return from Washington, we learned that previous to the passage of the enforcing bill, the Cherokee delegation, then at the seat of government, for the purpose of treating for their lands, showed every disposition to make a treaty; so much so, indeed, that the secretary of war considered that the basis of the treaty had been settled to the satisfaction of the chief, and that it required but the formalities of the business to complete it. When lo, and behold, so soon as the law for forcing the states was passed, the secretary, to his astonishment, was first informed of their change of opinion, by the reception of a note from the chiefs, very politely inquiring at what time it would be convenient for them to take leave of their great father, the president. As they only waited that ceremony to return to Cherokee.

GOVERNMENT DEPOSITES.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, SATURDAY MARCH 2.

The following resolution reported yesterday by the committee of ways and means coming up for consideration:

"Resolved, that the government deposits may, in the opinion of the house, be safely continued in the bank of the United States."

Mr. Polk said he hoped that gentlemen who believed the time of the house at this period of the session, to be necessarily valuable, would not press the consideration of this resolution upon the house at this juncture. During the small remainder of the session, there were several measures of the highest public importance, which remained to be acted on. For one, he was extremely anxious that the session should close by 12 o'clock to-night, in order that a sitting upon the Sabbath might be avoided. He would not proceed in expressing his views until he should understand from gentlemen whether they intended to press the house to a vote on this resolution. [A remark was made by Mr. Ingersoll, which was not heard distinctly by the reporter.] Mr. P. proceeded. As it had been indicated that the gentlemen intended to take a vote upon the resolution, he would ask whether it was possible for the members of the house to express their opinions on this subject with an adequate knowledge of the facts? The committee of ways and means had spent nearly the whole session in the examination of one or two points connected with this subject. The range of investigation had been of necessity much less extensive than the deep importance of the subject required—but before any opinion could be properly expressed, it was important that the facts developed by the committee should be understood. There had been no opportunity for this—and there was no necessity for the expression of a premature opinion unless it was considered essential to whitewash the bank. If the friends of the bank deemed it indispensably necessary in order to sustain the bank to call for an expression of opinion, where the house had enjoyed no opportunity of examining the testimony and proof upon which alone a correct opinion could be formed, he should be compelled briefly to present one or two facts to the house. It had been one of the objects of the committee of ways and means to ascertain the circumstances relative to the postponement of the redemption of the 3 per cent. stock by the bank. With the mass of other important duties devolving upon the committee, as full an investigation of the conditions of the bank as was desirable, could not be expected.—The committee, therefore, had been obliged to limit their inquiries to this subject of the 3 per cents—the other subjects of investigation were only incidental. Upon this main subject of inquiry the whole committee, majority as well as minority, were of opinion that the bank had exceeded its legitimate authority, and had taken measures which were in direct violation of its charter. He would read a single sentence from the report of the majority which conclusively established this position. In the transactions upon this subject the majority of the committee expressly say, in their report; that "the bank exceeded its legitimate authority, and that this proceeding had no sufficient warrant in the correspondence of the secretary of the treasury." Could language be more explicit? It was then the unanimous opinion of the committee, upon this main topic of inquiry, that the bank had exceeded its legitimate authority, and that its proceedings, relative to the 3 per cents, had no sufficient warrant in the correspondence of the secretary of the treasury. The bank of the United States, it must be remembered, had been made the place of deposit for the public revenues, for the purpose of meeting the expenditures of the government. With the public money in its vaults, it was bound to pay the demands of the government. Among these demands upon the public money in the bank, was that portion of the public debt, of which the redemption had been ordered. Had the bank manifested a willingness to pay out the public money in its possession for this object? On examination of the evidence, it would be found, that as early as March, 1832, the president of the bank, without the knowledge of the government directors, had instituted a correspondence with certain holders of the public debt, for the purpose of procuring a postponement of its redemption. There was at that time no cholera, which could be charged with giving occasion to the correspondence. When public notice had been given by the secretary of the treasury, of the redemption of the debt, the president of the bank immediately came to Washington, and requested that the redemption might be postponed. And what was the reason then assigned by the president of the bank, for this postponement? Why, that the measure would enable the bank to afford the merchants great facilities for the transaction of their business under an extraordinary pressure upon the money market. What was the evidence upon this point? The proof distinctly shewed that there was no extraordinary pressure. The monthly statements of the bank established that there was in fact a very considerable curtailment of the facilities given to the merchants in the commercial cities.

Mr. Wickliffe rose to a question of order. The subject under consideration was a resolution declaring that the bank was a safe place of deposit for the public revenue. He submitted whether it was in order to discuss upon this resolution the redemption of the 3 per cent. stock.

The chair (temporarily occupied in the absence of the speaker by Mr. Taylor) decided that the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Polk] were in order.

Mr. Polk proceeded. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Wickliffe] appeared to be very sensitive upon this subject. It was not long since that gentleman in a toast given at the Jefferson dinner expressed the most decided hostility to the bank.—He would leave to that gentleman to explain the reasons which had produced the sudden change of his opinions, and from a violent opponent had converted him into a most zealous advocate of the bank. What was the object of explaining this matter of the 3 per cent. stock? Not to waste the time of the house which was now so precious, but to shew that the management of the bank relative to the 3 per cents, distinctly proved that the bank was not able to pay the public money deposited in its vaults for the redemption of the public debt without obtaining a loan from abroad. The minority of the committee of ways and means had not disputed the ability of the bank to discharge its debts in its own convenient time—but had the bank promptly paid the public money deposited in its vaults when called for? As early at October, 1831, the bank had anticipated that during the course of 1832 it would not be allowed the undisturbed and permanent use of the public deposits. In the circular orders to the several branches which were then issued the necessity was stated for collecting the means for refunding those deposits from the loans which were then outstanding. Efforts were made by the branches of the west to make collections for that object; but those efforts entirely failed. The debts due upon loans made by the western branches had not been curtailed. It was found impossible to curtail them. As the list of discounts had gone down, the list of domestic bills of exchange had gone up. The application before alluded to was made in March to Mr. Ludlow, of New York, who represented about 1,700,000 of the public debt to postpone its redemption. This expedient also failed. Then the president of the bank came to Washington for the purpose of procuring the postponement of the period of redemption upon the ground that an extraordinary pressure existed, and the public interest would be promoted by enabling the bank to use the public money in affording facilities to the merchants of the commercial cities. And what next? In July, the president of the bank and the exchange committee, without the knowledge of the head of the treasury, or of the board of directors of the bank, instituted a secret mission to England, for the purpose of negotiating in effect a loan of five millions of dollars, for which the bank was to pay interest. The propriety object of this mission was not laid before the board of directors, and no clue was afforded to the government. Mr. Cadwallader went to England upon this secret mission. On the first of October the bank was advised of the arrangement made by Cadwallader, by which it was agreed in behalf of the bank, to purchase a part of the debt of the foreign holders, and to defer the redemption of a part. Now, it was well known to every one who had taken the trouble to read the charter of the bank, that it was expressly prohibited from purchasing public stock. On the 15th of October it was discovered that Cadwallader had exceeded his instructions. This discovery by the bank took place immediately after the circular letter of Baring, Brothers, & Co. of London, announcing the arrangement, had been published in one of the New York papers. This circular gave the first information to the government, or to any one in this country, as far as he was advised, excepting the exchange committee of the bank, of the object of Cadwallader's mission. In the limited time which could now be spared for this discussion, it was impossible to go through the particulars of this scheme. It would be seen on examination of the transaction, that the bank had directly interfered with the redemption of the public debt, for the obvious reason that it was unable to refund the public deposits. The cholera was not the ground of the correspondence with Ludlow. It was not the cholera which brought the president of the bank to Washington, to request the postponement of the redemption of the debt; nor was it the cholera which led to the resolution of the exchange committee of the bank to send Cadwallader to England. The true disorder was, the impossibility in which the bank found itself to concentrate its funds and diminish its loans. It had been stated in the report of the majority of the committee, that the certificates of the greatest portion of the 3 per cents. had been surrendered. It had been said that there was now less than a million of this debt outstanding. In point of fact, it would seem from the correspondence, that between one and two millions of the debts of which the certificates had been surrendered, had been paid by the bank becoming debtor to the foreign holder instead of the government. The directors appear to suppose this has not been the case, but the correspondence shows that the certificates have been sent home under this arrangement. After this brief explanation of the conduct of the bank in relation to the public deposits, he would ask, whether it was necessary to sustain the credit of the bank by adopting this resolution? Is it supposed because a majority of the house were friendly to the institution, that it is necessary for them to declare the opinion expressed in this resolution on faith—and faith alone? He had no desire that the resolution should be negative. If he was compelled to vote on the resolution, he should vote against it—but he was willing that congress should defer the expression of its opinion until the facts upon which it must be founded are understood. This opinion could make no difference as to the duty of the government. Whenever the secretary of the treasury shall deem the public deposits unsafe in the bank, it is made his duty to withdraw them, and to lay his reasons before congress. The previous opinion of the house—especially an opinion expressed without means of examination, neither takes from nor adds to the responsibility of the secretary of the treasury. Pressed as the committee of ways and means have been with their various duties, they had, at a late period, called for the correspondence of the bank in September, October, and November, in order to ascertain, as far as might be practicable, by that means, the condition of the debts due to the bank in the west. What had been seen in this correspondence? That such had been the condition of one of the western branches, great alarm had been felt as to its power of going on, and prompt assistance had been necessary to prevent its stopping payment.

Mr. Wickliffe inquired what branch the gentleman referred to?

Mr. Polk. That at Lexington, Kentucky.

Mr. Wickliffe said, any difficulties in which that branch had been involved, had arisen from its accommodations to Jackson politicians.

Mr. Polk. Jackson politicians! The member from Kentucky can best answer to his constituents what sort of Jackson politicians have been accommodated by the bank. Much had been said in certain quarters of the persecution of the bank, and of the malice of the administration towards that institution. The whole crime of the administration is the demanding the public money from the bank for the purpose of paying the public debt. As to the condition of the western debt, about which so much had been said, and which was represented to have been so much reduced, it will be found that the principal reduction consists in what Mr. Cheves called race horse bills. The old debt is paid by drawing a new bill, payable in a different place. When that bill becomes due it is paid by another of a similar character. Unless these successive discharges and creations of debt diminish its aggregate amount, it will be found that very little, if any curtailment has taken place.

The hour allotted to morning business having expired,

Mr. I. Bates moved the orders of the day.

Mr. Ingersoll expressed a hope that the debate would be permitted to proceed.

Mr. Bates, then withdrew the motion.

Mr. Polk resumed. It was no fault of his that the report of the committee had come in at so late a period. He felt it to be his duty to offer a very brief exposition of the reasons why he did not regard it as proper for the house to express its opinion upon this subject without any opportunity for examination. The facts collected by the committee would go forth, and every man could then form his opinion. He would move to amend the resolution by striking out the whole after the word "resolved," and inserting "that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject." He would not pursue the discussion while so many important subjects pressed upon the house on the last day of the session. Whatever might appear to be the condition of the bank at a superficial glance, a careful scrutiny of its measures and its affairs would satisfy any impartial mind that its condition was not that which had been represented by its zealous friends. Without dwelling upon the particulars, he would sum up his objections to the resolution in its present form by stating that the bank had unwarrantably interfered with the arrangements of the government in reference to a great national object. In this, both the majority and minority of the committee had agreed. The secret of this interference would never have been disclosed but from the accidental publication of the circular of the Barings addressed to the European holders of the 3 per cents. The correspondence which had now for the first time been drawn from the bank was most material and important in the decision of the question, and was until this time entirely unknown either to the treasury department or to the house. He could have hoped that the friends of the bank would not have pressed the resolution. Had it been properly in order, he would have adverted to the manner in which the bill relative to the sale of the bank stock had been treated—and all reply to the arguments of those who opposed it prevented by the previous question. He enjoyed the satisfaction of having endeavored to discharge his duty to the country in relation to this subject. Should he live, he trusted to be able to contribute something further towards the development of the transaction of this institution. From what had already been disclosed, it appeared that the most important business of the bank is exclusively transacted by the committee of exchange appointed by the president of the bank, and under his immediate direction. That this committee makes no report of its proceedings to the board of directors, and that none of the directors appointed in behalf of the United States are members of this committee. It appeared to him to be the most consummate folly to go through the ceremony of appointing directors for the purpose of protecting the public interest—while these directors are excluded from all knowledge and participation of the more important transactions of the bank. He would appeal to the house whether we ought to be satisfied with the management of an institution so deeply connected for good or evil with the great interests of the country in which those appointed to guard the public interest are totally deprived of all means of knowledge of its leading measures.

Messrs. McDuffie and Ingersoll rose simultaneously. The former gentleman was named by the chair. Mr. McD. then remarked that he would give way to the member of the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Ingersoll, of Connecticut, said, the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Polk), who had just addressed the house, could not regret more than he did, the late period at which this question is presented. But who were chargeable with the delay? Not, certainly, the bank, nor any of its friends. No sooner was this subject referred, and the news of it had reached Philadelphia, than Mr. Biddle addressed a letter to the chairman of the committee of ways and means, respectfully offering every facility to the proposed investigation, and inviting the utmost latitude of search. There had been also constant and untiring efforts made to bring the report forward earlier in the session, that it might receive the action of the house before the adjournment. The friends of the bank, he repeated, were the last who should be held responsible for the tardy movements now complained of.

Mr. Polk here rose and said, that he had asked but for the postponement of a single day, to enable him to complete the minority report. That was refused, but the chairman having accidentally left the majority report at his lodgings, the delay he had requested was obtained.

Mr. Ingersoll resumed. It was not that to which he alluded. An effort had been made a week ago to have the report made—the examination of witnesses was then closed, and our labors were about to be submitted to the house, as he supposed, when, to his surprise, the gentleman from Tennessee asked for delay, to send to Philadelphia for further correspondence, which would necessarily require some time to have copied, and but for this, we should have had the subject before us several days since, with ample opportunity for the fullest examination, and the freest debate. Then, as to the witness summoned, they were nearly all brought before the committee on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee. He took his own course—every body was examined whom he saw fit to send for, as was certainly right and proper. He, (Mr. I.) did not complain of this; but surely we ought not now to be responsible for this course, since, in consequence of it, the report has been kept back to the heel of the session.

Mr. Polk said he had called for the examination of no one, excepting the directors appointed by the government, and gen. Cadwallader.

Mr. Ingersoll. Gentlemen had summoned whom they pleased; he, (Mr. I.) had called not a single witness. He was willing to trust the scrutiny to the hands of the opponents of the bank—let them probe it to suit themselves. All he asked was, when they were done, that they would permit the house to pass its opinion, and send the whole to the people for their ultimate decision. For himself, he must confess, he was sick of seeing reports sent forth, unaccompanied by any opinion of either house of congress upon them. The people have been surfeited with such papers—we have had majority reports, and minority reports, and what an hon. member from S. Carolina, (Mr. W. R. Davis), he believed called unicorn reports, but they all brought us to no practical result, so long as they were not acted on by the house. They filled the flying folios of the newspapers of the day, or crammed the mails in the shape of public documents during the recess, without benefitting any class of our citizens much, except the legions of speculators, nonied and political, who sometimes turn them to a profitable account. It was time that these matters were treated in a different way—that the representatives of the people should now act. This resolution, he rejoiced to see, had something tangible in it: it invites us to speak out, and to say, under the solemnity of our oaths, whether the government deposits ought to be continued where they now are, and have been in safety for the last seventeen years—or whether they shall be carried into the market, to be bid for by the local institutions. Will gentlemen now turn from this inquiry the moment we have reached it, and tell us that it does not belong to us—that it ought not to be settled before we separate? Have we then been employed all winter, in our committee room, to no purpose? Or, have we been working, day and night, merely to raise a smoke for political effect, at the end of the session, under which a new set of majority and minority reports are to be launched upon the public—still leaving the opinion of the house on these grave matters unrevealed? Has not congress been directly called upon, and from high authority, too, to express an opinion? Did not the secretary of the treasury, in his annual financial report, invite it; and was not the subject brought to our view in the executive message, at the opening of the session? We have not sought for this inquiry, but we cannot shun it, with credit to ourselves, since it has been put to us.

What, then, is the condition of the bank of the United States, as a place of safe deposit, compared with the other banking institutions of the country? From the evidence now spread before the house, he would assert with confidence, that it was decidedly more sound than the state banks, to which the funds must go, if taken from their present place of deposit. Nay, from an exhibit lately made of the affairs of the bank of England, it will be seen that the United States bank, in proportion to its capital, is the strongest of the two, applying the same tests to the comparative statements of each. Let us see how these different institutions appear by each other's side. The bank of the United States has now about nine millions of specie, to a circulation of about seventeen millions and a half. All the local banks in the union, combined, have but between ten and eleven millions of specie to a circulation of about sixty-eight millions. The bank of England, by its latest returns, had, speaking in dollars, about twenty-six millions of specie to a circulation of about ninety millions. And yet, with facts like these staring us in the face, it is gravely suggested that the deposits would be in less danger of being squandered if removed to the local banks, with their circulation six times beyond the specie in their vaults: ay, sir, to local banks, which left you saddled with a certain "unavailable fund" of nearly a million and a half, when you used them as places of deposit on a former occasion. The banks of the state of New York would probably come in for a larger share of the government deposits than those of any other states; for there the greatest portion of the revenue is collected; and let us see how they stand. It appears by an official statement, recently published by sworn commissioners, that they have but about $1,700,000 in specie, to a circulation of about twelve millions; and it will further appear by the evidence reported, that at the time when those banks had but this inconsiderable amount of specie on hand, they were indebted to the United States bank, more than two millions of dollars, which might have been called for at any day, thus draining them of every specie dollar.

Will any man, can any man, with these statements before him, say that the safety of the public funds requires their removal to the local banks? It was in vain to blink this question by going into the extraneous matter of the three per cent. arrangement, which had been now nearly brought to a close. The secretary has put the question to us in regard to the safety of the bank as a place of deposit for the public money, and we are bound at all events to respond to that. But if gentlemen are determined to rake up the three per cent. affair, he was willing to meet them there also; for he believed that transaction, from beginning to end, to have been fair, prudent and honorable, and intended much more to aid the mercantile community, especially those indebted to the government on custom house bonds, than for any particular accommodation to the bank itself, except so far as it might be benefitted by shielding its customers and the local banks too from an unusual and unnecessary pressure. Much stress has been placed on the mission of general Cadwallader to Europe. It had been called a secret mission, unauthorised by the board of directors; and particularly without the knowledge or authority of the government directors. Now, sir, it is an undeniable fact, that early in the spring of 1832, in the month of March, at a regular meeting of the board, at which two of the government directors, residing in Philadelphia, were present, (the third being accidentally in the country), the president submitted his views in relation to paying off the three per cents. in the course of the year, more than one half of which he stated belonged to foreigners, the withdrawal of whose funds might possibly expose the community to great inconvenience, unless some measure should be taken for deferring a part of the payments; after which it was, by the board

"Resolved, That the subjects of the communication just made by the president, be referred to the committee on exchange, with authority to make, on behalf of the bank, whatever arrangements with the holders of the three per cent. stock of the U. States may, in their opinion, best promote the convenience of the public and the interests of the institution."

This resolution is recorded in the books of the bank; it was passed in the presence of two of the government directors, and at the next meeting of the board, was read over in their presence, and in the presence of the third government director who had then returned to the city. There was no secrecy in all this. The record had been always open, as the books of the bank always were, to the inspection of every director; and every government spy who might have a right to examine them. One of the directors on the part of the government belonged to the very exchange committee to whom the subject had been referred. He alluded to Nicholas Biddle, who had for several years, and under different administrations till January last, been appointed a director by the government. And although since this controversy has arisen in regard to renewing the charter, Mr. Biddle had been cast off by the administration, yet he was an honorable and an honest man, and no one on this floor would say to the contrary. This committee, thus organized, and thus fully empowered as has been shown, by the board, to make all the arrangements which they might see fit in regard to the payment of the three per cents. sent general Cadwallader to England, as he had been entrusted with a similar mission under the presidency of Mr. Cheves, and through his agency a portion of the European holders of the three per cents. have agreed to give up their certificates to the government, thus clearing the United States from any further liability, and taking the house of Baring & Co. of London, in whose hands the bank has ample funds, as security for their money, which they will receive with interest in October, 1833. By this arrangement the business men of our country, who are debtors to the bank, have not been disturbed in their usual accommodations, though their discounts must have been materially curtailed, and the local banks pressed in their turn too for balances, had these foreigners all been paid at the counter of the bank, on this side of the Atlantic—and the result to the government, (the certificates being surrendered), is the same as if the specie had been shipped abroad in exchange for the stock certificates. So high is the credit of this institution in Europe, as appears by the correspondence which had not been received at the time the directors appeared before the committee, and therefore is not in the evidence reported, that some of the foreign holders have refused to take the money, and insisted on the bank's keeping it at an interest of only three per cent. till next October, under a previous offer. They have, however, while doing this, surrendered their certificates so as to exonerate the treasury from any liability to them. The bank had the funds in Europe in the hands of its agents, to pay them off, and through its agent made a tender of the money, which the holders declined taking. Let it be remembered too, that when general Cadwallader embarked, it was wholly uncertain whether the condition of the treasury would enable the secretary to pay off the debt advertised to be paid, without obtaining money for this favorite purpose of the secretary, from this same unabsorbed bank. Mr. L. said he wished the house to mark, and the country to know, that on the 19th of last July, the secretary addressed a letter to the president of the bank, stating that if the funds of the United States should happen to be inadequate to the redemption of the three per cents. he must rely on Mr. McLane for the necessary facilities. Here is the letter of Mr. McLane; that there shall be no mistake about it, you shall have its very language. It is dated, treasury department, 19th July, 1832, and reads thus:

"Sir, it was not until to-day that I have been able to ascertain the amount of the appropriations made at the last session of congress, and therefore I have not been able to decide before now upon the amount of the three per cents. to be redeemed on the first of October. I find, as was supposed when you were here, that we shall be able to pay off about two-thirds at that time. A notice will accordingly be given in to-morrow's paper, for the payment of that amount on the first of October, and the remaining one third on the first of January. This has been done with the understanding had between us, that if it should happen that the public monies are insufficient to complete those payments, the bank will delay the presentation of any certificates of which it may have the control until the funds are sufficient to meet them, the interest to be paid by the United States during the interval."

Yes, sir, the treasury department was arranging with the banks if the state of the public funds should require it, to hold back the stock certificates, which the secretary had invited in by an official advertisement, and which he was bound to pay when presented. All this was very right in the high officer at the head of the treasury; but it is a mighty offence when the bank, through its agent, proposes an arrangement, not more exceptionable certainly, with the original holders of the certificates in Europe. We can make a flourish about paying off the national debt, while the secretary of the treasury has at the same time a private understanding with the bank, to "delay the presentation" of the stock certificates which it may happen to hold, even if "interest is to be paid by the United States during the interval;" but if the bank proposes to allow interest to the European stockholders, though their certificates should not be delayed, but surrendered up—that is a very different affair; it so shocks the sensibility of the secretary, notwithstanding he penned the letter of 19th July, that he sends the matter to us, as a grave subject for inquiry, and hints a doubt as to the safety of his deposits. Now, sir, the bank had precisely the same right to come to the arrangement with the European stockholders, even if it had been agreed with them to "delay the presentation" of their certificates, as Mr. Secretary McLane had to come to an understanding with the bank "to delay the presentation" of any certificates within its control, on being paid the interest. The secretary is not the United States, nor the government—he is but a high and honorable public servant, and the bank is a humble one. When, therefore, gentlemen ask what authority the bank had to do what it has done, let them first tell us where and how does the accuser of the bank, the secretary of the treasury, obtain the power to do what he has done. It is true he did not have to resort to the bank, as things turned out, for funds to enable him to meet his payments; nor did it become necessary for the bank to "delay the presentation" of the certificates; but that does not vary the right of either to enter into their respective arrangements. If the secretary's letter of 19th July, recognizing the understanding to "delay the presentation" of the certificates when the funds might fall short, has worked no harm, neither has the arrangement of the bank agent worked any harm in regard to the three per cents.—for more of those certificates have been actually paid off and surrendered to the treasury, than would have been, had no movement been made about them. It may be a little curious to know how the secretary had met these payments without resorting to the bank for aid. Mr. I. said he had looked into this matter, and believed the business had been done in this way. The secretary had taken monies that had been appropriated by congress to other objects, the unsatisfied appropriations, so called, and applied them to the payment of the public debt. The annual report on the finances had informed us that there were due from the treasury about five and a half millions of dollars for unsatisfied appropriations: nearly the whole of this amount had been taken by the secretary, and applied towards the extinguishment of the funded debt. Besides this, congress at the last session granted pensions to the gallant remnant of our revolutionary worthies who had not received the benefit of former laws—thus providing for a debt which, above all others, should have been promptly discharged, inasmuch as it had been already long delayed. There would be due to these men, according to the estimate of the secretary of war, sent to us early in the session, about four millions of dollars, including the arrearages. This was over and above the five and a half millions of unsatisfied appropriations before referred to. There has not been force enough in the pension office to pass upon these claims as promptly as it was supposed they have been; and consequently but a moderate amount had been disbursed on their account prior to the first of January. What was not paid to these venerable men, but would have been, had there been force enough in the offices to examine and decide upon their claims, had been also turned over to swell the payments of the funded debt. He did not say there had been fault in this, but there was hardly a member of congress who has not his drawer at this moment filled with letters from these men, many of them decrepid, and bowed down by the frosts of eighty winters, complaining that they have not yet been able to receive what congress granted to them eight months ago, and beseeching their representatives to aid them in procuring the little pittance to comfort them in this inclement season. Many of them have stood at the pension office, "like shivering beggars at a bolted door," while we, in this gorgeous hall, are boasting of having paid off the debts of the revolution. If these claims had been paid within six months from the time congress had authorised them to be paid, it was evident that the secretary of the treasury could not have accomplished his payments of the public debt, even taking to his aid the five and a half millions of other unsatisfied appropriations, unless he had resorted to a temporary loan, or had relied on the bank to "delay the presentation" of the certificates, allowing interest for the accommodation. Mr. I. said he should not undertake to decide how far it was proper in a secretary of the treasury to take money which has been once appropriated, before the appropriation is satisfied, and apply it to a different object, even though that object be the payment of the public debt. It is a power which congress does not ordinarily exercise: we do not grant compensation for a horse lost in an Indian fight on the frontiers, without expressly providing that it is to be paid "out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated." And can the head of a department do what congress cannot, or does not?

Mr. Polk wished to understand, whether the gentleman from Connecticut contended that the commissioners of the sinking fund, had no authority to order the redemption of more than ten millions of the public debt in one year. He had understood they were expressly authorised to go to any extent beyond that sum that the condition of the treasury could authorise.

Mr. Ingersoll—The standing appropriation to the sinking fund is ten millions annually, perhaps this should be satisfied in preference to other appropriations, but during the last year, about seventeen millions have been applied—and this excess over the ten millions cannot be applied by the commissioners, unless there is a surplus to that extent in the treasury. But, does the gentleman from Tennessee, call money already appropriated to one object, and for which the treasury is liable—a surplus? Is money due to revolutionary pensioners, a surplus, which may be taken to sink the funded debt? It was not so understood by that distinguished statesman so often alluded to, and never mentioned but with the most profound respect, the lamented Lowndes, who had for several years stood at the head of the committee of ways and means. He was for always retaining in hand at least two millions of dollars, not in the ragged trash of broken banks, but of sound money, over and above the sums appropriated for the service of the year. The policy of his masterly mind is delineated in an act which he penned and carried through congress in 1817, for the redemption of the public debt, an act which ought to stand as one of the most enduring monuments of his fame. You will see by it, what he meant by a surplus. The third section provides, "That in addition to the sum of ten millions of dollars, hereinafter annually appropriated to the sinking fund, there shall be appropriated for the year 1817, the further sum of nine millions of dollars, to be paid out of any monies not otherwise appropriated, at such time within the year, as the secretary of the treasury shall deem most conducive to the public interest, to be applied by the commissioners of the sinking fund, to the purchase or redemption of the public debt." The surplus here transferred to the sinking fund for that year, is expressly limited to "money not otherwise appropriated."

The 4th section of the same act directs "That, after the year 1817, whenever there shall be at any time after the adjournment of congress in any year, a surplus of money in the treasury, above the sums appropriated for the service of such year, the payment of which to the commissioners of the sinking fund will yet leave in the treasury at the end of the year a balance equal to two millions of dollars, then such surplus shall be, and the same is hereby appropriated to the sinking fund, to be paid at such time as the situation of the treasury will best permit, and shall be applied by the commissioners thereof to the purchase or redemption of the public debt."

It is true that this 4th section of Mr. Lowndes' act, reserving two millions in the treasury beyond the appropriations for the service of the year, has been since, very unwisely, as he, [Mr. I.] believed, repealed by a law which originated in the senate in 1830. That law, the act of 1830, authorises the secretary, whenever the treasury shows a surplus of funds, "to cause such surplus to be placed at the disposal of the commissioners of the sinking fund, and the same shall be applied by them to the reimbursement or purchase of the principal of the public debt at such times as the state of the treasury will best admit."

You can, therefore, under this act, take the two millions which Mr. Lowndes' prudence would have reserved, if the secretary so wills it; but still you can take nothing that is not "surplus;" and what is meant by surplus has been already shown by the act of 1817 to be money in the treasury above the sums appropriated.

Mr. Polk wished to know whether there was not on the 1st of October three millions in the treasury, and on the 1st of January 700,000 dollars over and above all claims of every description upon the treasury, and unavailable funds.

Mr. Ingersoll—No—not of legitimate funds belonging to the United States. On the 1st of January the treasury was scraped to the bottom. There was on hand about 700,000 dollars of monies received from the Danish government for spoiliations on our commerce, which belonged to American merchants, for whom it had been recovered: and within a few days afterwards, the greater part of that, as he had been informed, had been expended, leaving only a little over one hundred thousand dollars beyond the amount of warrants issued; and the whole of that would have vanished long before, if the pensioners of the revolution had been generally attended to, and their claims allowed, to say nothing of the five and a half millions of unsatisfied appropriations outstanding against the treasury at the close of the last year.

Mr. Boon now moved the orders of the day, which the house refused.

Mr. Ingersoll then said, after the great indulgence he had received, he felt that he could not better repay the kindness of the house just manifested by its vote, than by declining to take up more of its valuable time on this the last day of the session, though there were other topics on which, under other circumstances, he would be desirous of being heard. He preferred the house should act, rather than listen to him; he would therefore, before he sat down, move for the previous question, on the resolution, and as we have had a speech from each side, he hoped the motion would be sustained by common consent, that we may decide this question at once, and pass on the other business which must be attended to before the session closes. He accordingly moved the previous question, but withdrew his motion for the present, at the request of

Mr. McDuffie, who said he was aware that this was not the proper period to go into a discussion of this subject, and had it so pleased the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Polk) he should have been content that the house should have given a silent vote on the resolution presented to it. He differed from that honorable gentleman as to the propriety of adopting it. He believed that it was not only right, but that, under the circumstances of the case, it was the solemn duty of the house to express their opinion as to the proposition contained in the resolution. What were they to be told that the disposition of the public revenue of the country was a question for a secretary of the treasury? That officer, had, indeed, a limited discretion, enabling him to take the public deposits out of any bank during the recess of congress, his act being subject to the judgment of the congress at its following session. It was congress, and not the secretary, that was to be the judge where the funds of the nation should be placed.

Who had brought this question before congress? Was it the bank? No. It was the president of the United States—it was the secretary of the treasury; and they had presented the subject in a form which made it the solemn duty of the house to pronounce its opinion on the grave and weighty matter submitted to it. But the gentleman from Tennessee had asked the house very gravely, whether they were prepared to pronounce judgment against the administration, and against all who voted with him on this subject? Ah! Was the administration then on its trial before that house and the country? so that if the house should declare that the national bank is a safe place of deposit for the funds of the government, it was to be viewed as a condemnation of the president and his secretary? Mr. McD. knew of no principle on which such a conclusion rested than this, that the greater the truth the greater the libel. When the house declared that the bank was a safe place of deposit for those funds, it spoke the truth. None dare to say that it was not the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. And had congress come to that pass, that they dare not tell the truth to the American people because the president and his secretary had expressed a different opinion, and that without the shadow of foundation? Mr. McD. had been utterly astonished that any department of this government should have expressed so extraordinary an opinion as that the national deposits were not safe in the bank of the United States. He solemnly declared that through every period of the investigation which had taken place he had but one opinion, which was, that in the whole civilized world there did not exist a bank more perfectly competent to meet all its engagements, and which better fulfilled all the ends for which it had been created. He would go further, and declare it his opinion that there was no such bank in the world, and no such currency in existence any where. No government had received such facilities from any bank whatever as the American government had constantly received, and was still receiving from the bank of the U. States. While the bank had funds in its possession to pay all its debts, meet its whole circulation, and all its other engagements of every kind, and had more than 42 millions of dollars for its stockholders that government should tell the people that their deposits were not safe there—and that congress must not have the firmness and justice to declare to the contrary? It was most extraordinary! Were they to make every question a party question? Must every man be exactly in the vein of the president and his secretary? Was the house to be held as making an attack upon the president because it told the truth? a truth which the gentleman from Tennessee would not himself deny? Did the gentleman himself believe, on his conscience, that the government deposits were not safe in the bank? He did not. There was not a man in the United States capable of comprehending the subject, who could hold, or would avow such an opinion.

Mr. McD. said he would tell the house, in a few words, the reason why he wished this resolution to pass. He presumed that the president of the United States had made this communication to congress with a view of getting the opinion of congress on the question submitted to them. The question was now presented to the house in the shape of a resolution, and he should regard its adoption as perfectly conclusive in a practical point of view. Any administration which, after the expression by congress of the opinion advanced in this resolution, should withdraw the national deposits from the bank would deserve, as it would assuredly receive, the execration of the country. Mr. McD. hoped that no gentleman's opinion as to the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the bank would prevent him from expressing his honest conviction as to the state of its affairs.

Mr. McD. would not speak what he thought about this proceeding. He would not say that it was persecution; but he would say that the opinion expressed by the president of the United States, and the secretary of the treasury, was, under all the circumstances, the most pernicious and the most unwarrantable ever put forth by public men. What, in fact, had saved the whole community from one universal wreck? Nothing but the fact that our commercial community possessed too much intelligence to believe what had been told them by the administration. In any other country such a declaration would have produced a panic which, however unfounded, must have brought the bank to ruin. Thanks be to God, and to our commercial community, the thing had been but a few days' wonder, and had passed away; and such a declaration, if put forth now from the same source, would have no more influence in the community than if it proceeded from the most insignificant individual in the country.

Mr. McD. said he was anxious till the period should arrive when the public deposits should no longer be subject to the control of the government. He was anxious to avoid this speculation of funds in market, and the local banks bidding for them. Then gentlemen would see a game worthy to be contemplated by a philosopher. A secretary of the treasury, with power to place the public funds wherever he pleased, could control the government and the people, principalities and powers—all, all would be at his beck, they could not resist him. But God forbid that these funds should be put in market as a means for political gamblers to make their way to power.

If the deposits were to be taken out of the bank of the United States, where were they to go? He presumed it required no miraculous inspiration to foretell that they were to go into the banks of New York. And if they did, how would the transaction stand before the eyes of posterity? To take the government deposits out of a bank possessing more than half of its whole circulation in specie, and place them in banks whose specie capital did not amount to one-seventh of their circulation!

He never could give his assent to this, nor would he countenance any measure which might be seized upon as giving a pretext to do so. After a grave question had been made by the president as to the soundness of the bank, if congress should say nothing, that officer might conclude, as he had once done in reference to a certain Indian treaty which he had submitted for ratification. The senate not having acted upon it, he considered himself at liberty to carry it into execution. He might say, "I told congress that the United States' bank was an unsafe place for the public money; they said nothing to the contrary: silence gives consent; and therefore transfer the deposits without further ceremony."

Mr. McD. observed that he wished to say a few words to which he was prompted by a sacred sense of duty; they had reference to the president of the bank, Mr. Nicholas Biddle. He knew that gentleman well; and he conscientiously believed that there did not live a more honest or a more honorable man on the face of the earth. No man in the United States possessed a more thorough knowledge of banking in all its operations. And never had an institution been managed with more perfect judgment or more consummate ability than this had been by him.

As to the issue made up between the secretary of the treasury and Mr. Biddle, Mr. McD. had nothing to do with it. But, on the mere question of finance he would say, that if the secretary had taken the advice of Mr. Biddle in reference to the French claims, he would have saved the treasury several thousands of dollars. The advice of the president of the bank had been asked by the secretary as to the best mode of drawing for the French indemnities. The advice had been promptly given, viz: that the secretary's wisest course would be to draw a bill at once, and the bank would purchase it as, if he postponed it, the rate of exchange would probably be higher. The secretary had rejected the advice, and postponed drawing until the anticipated rise in exchange had taken place, and then had been much disappointed and displeased because he could not get the same terms from the bank as had been offered him before.

Mr. McD. said that he did not know for what purpose a discussion on the subject of the three per cents. had been brought forward. He would only say that the gentleman from Tennessee seemed to dwell, with emphasis, upon an equivocal phrase in the report of the majority of the committee of ways and means, and had labored to shew that the committee had declared that the bank had "exceeded its powers." He would give to the house an explanation of the facts which had led to that expression. The agent of the bank had made a contract with the holders of government securities abroad which the bank had not authorised him to make. The directors had disavowed the contract. If a disavowal of a contract was to be construed into a transcending of the powers of the bank, the gentleman was welcome to make the most of it. The greater part of this stock, however, was now paid off—little more than a million remained. The gentleman had said that more than a million of dollars had been obtained on condition that the bank would become responsible instead of the government; and this the gentleman seemed to consider as a going in debt, on the part of the bank. But did not the gentleman know that the bank held, in the hands of the Barings, three millions to meet this? They had more money than was sufficient to pay it all, and all the three per cents. outstanding beside.

Mr. McD. concluded by asking what the house was prepared to do with the resolution which was before it? All it called upon the house to say was that the deposits were safe in the bank. If any man doubted this, let him say so.

The previous question was then called, and the resolution adopted by yeas and nays, as follows:

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 8—VOL. VIII. BALTIMORE, APRIL 20, 1833. [VOL. XLIV. WHOLE No. 1,126.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

¶ We have thought it best to defer the insertion of the report of the minority of the committee on manufactures of the house of representatives (Messrs. Adams and Condict), until we can conveniently give it entire, by the aid of some extra pages—which cannot be done until we shall have completed the supplement to the last volume and sent out its title page and table of contents. We are hurrying these as fast as possible; but such a mass of solid matter is not easily prepared for the press.

¶ The present sheet has a greater variety of articles than usual—some of them are as follows: the official report concerning the conflagration of the treasury building—a circular from the postmaster general on abuses of the franking privilege—a long account of a grand military celebration at Charleston, S. C. with the speeches of gov. Hayne and gen. Hamilton—the speech of Mr. Tyler, at a public dinner given to him in Gloucester county, Virginia—the emperor of China's prayer for rain—a letter from Mr. Calhoun, on being invited to a public dinner at Edgefield—law case concerning naturalization happening in South Carolina—message of the governor of Massachusetts concerning a certain act of incorporation—present state of Mexico, (official)—Foreign news, with the proclamation of king Otho, of Greece—French “free trade,” &c. &c.

¶ It will be seen by referring to Mr. Calhoun's letter, and the speeches of gov. Hayne and general Hamilton, that an exercise of the “right of nullification” by the state of South Carolina, having caused the recent adjustment of the tariff—is hereafter to be held as the “rightful remedy,” in either of the twenty-four states, for the redress of any real or imaginary evil arising out of the laws of the United States, or the decisions of the supreme court, &c.—for each state being “sovereign” cannot be mistaken in its judgment on constitutional questions, nor restrained from carrying out its ordinances! It is true—the “force bill,” or “bloody bill,” stands forth in protest against this sweeping doctrine; but its feebleness was established in a repeal of the tariff act of 1832 previous to a repeal of the ordinance of South Carolina; and, though nullification has not been formally acknowledged in congress as the “rightful remedy,” it certainly has been respected as an efficient one; and, if its practice is sustainable, the union is now dissolved—it has no more principle of adhesion in it than may be found in a shovel-full of sand. As heretofore observed—no consideration has yet presented itself to our mind, which, whether in reference to the principle, or the expediency of the measure, would have induced us to accept the late arrangement of the tariff.

EXTREME NONSENSE. By the 4th clause of the 8th section of the constitution of the United States, congress has power “to establish a uniform rule of naturalization,” and yet into such absurdity has “nullification” led some in South Carolina, that judge Bay, at Charleston, found power in the state authorities to amend the acts of congress on this subject! What next? But the court of appeals of the state of South Carolina has unanimously put down this folly of judge Bay. See the decisions in a subsequent page. There is such a thing as a citizen of the United States!!!

THE CHOLERA. Accounts from Havana to the evening of the 4th instant give us the pleasing intelligence, that the cholera had almost entirely subsided, and business was resuming its usual course. At Havana, as well as at New Orleans, it appears that when this fearful disease seemed about to sweep away the whole population, as it were, its desolating career was suddenly arrested. At Montreal, New York, &c. it subsided more gradually.

We have the daily returns of interments in the principal burying ground at Havana from the 28th of February, to the 25th of March, inclusive. The aggregate is 3,983—to wit: 876 white and 3,107 colored persons. The interments were 37 on the 28th February, and 333 on the 29th and 261 on the 24th March. There are five burial grounds where no accounts are kept. From 2 to 3,000 are supposed to have been interred in them. The whole number of deaths in the space of one month is estimated at from 9,000 to 10,000! The population of Havana is said to be 150 or 160,000; but so great was the panic that about one-half the inhabitants were thought to have fled from the city.

VOL. XLIV—Sic. 8.

Among those who died of this disease were William Shaler, esq. commercial agent of the United States, at Havana—aged 55; and the archbishop of St. Domingo, Dr. D. Pedro Valera Y. Ximenes, acting bishop of Havana—aged 74.

A letter received by the editors of the New York Daily Advertiser, dated Matamoros, Mexico, March 4, says—“The cholera has reached this country and prevails at many scattered places. At Rancho, out of a population of 475, only 25 remaind alive.”

The cholera still prevailed at St. Martinsville and Franklin, in Louisiana. At the former it is said to have assumed a character of extraordinary malignity, carrying off many respectable citizens, and a large number of slaves. It was more mild at Franklin.

Later advices say—that the deaths by cholera, at Havana, officially reported, amounted to fourteen thousand six hundred and fifty-four.

The deaths at Matanzas are reported at from 200 to 250 a day!

A VERY DESIRABLE MACHINE. A machine was exhibited to us, two or three weeks ago, for knitting stockings, &c. exceedingly well calculated, we think, for family use, and very desirable, as affording employment, at home, to females dependent upon it for subsistence and the support of their families, for its cost, including the patent right, will not exceed fifteen dollars; it is only about one foot square, and of the weight of ten pounds; so that it is easily transferable from place to place, as may be required—and no more power is needed for the crank than to move that of a common hand organ—and, except when a stitch is dropped, or one required to be added, a very small degree of attention or care is demanded. A girl 12 or 15 years old might give motion to, and attend three or more machines, if arranged for the purpose of being worked together, as they might easily be. Each machine will make from one to two pair of long men's stockings in a day, of woollen yarn—such as is usually worn in the winter season. The machine does not appear liable to get out of order, and but little instruction is necessary.

The machine that we saw in operation was fitted for knitting woollen stockings such as are above mentioned—but machines may be made for fine work in cotton, thread or silk.

We are glad to learn that a skillful machinist, resident near Baltimore, has obtained the right of making a certain number of these knitting machines; and it may be expected that its quality and capacity will soon be fully tested. It is the invention of John McMullen and Joseph Hollen, Jr. of Birmingham, Huntingdon county, Pennsylvania. The stitches are made just as if common knitting needles were used—except that the stocking requires to be afterwards joined at the seam.

BITUMINOUS COAL. It is estimated that there are 20,000 acres of land near Blossburg, Pa. capable of yielding 50,000,000 tons of bituminous coal, and iron ore is also said to be abundant. It is proposed to make a rail road to the Chemung canal, and from thence, by the Erie canal and the Hudson, to send this coal and iron to market at the city of New York, a distance of 450 miles. But a direct line from the city to these mines, is said to be only 225 miles.

Immense quantities of first quality bituminous coal is found near Clarksburg, Virginia. It is so easily obtained, that it sells for little more than two cents per bushel, delivered in that town.

BRITISH FASHIONS. The queen of England's drawing room—ladies dresses.

Her majesty—Dress of white satin, the skirt richly ornamented with bouquets of diamonds and variegated geraniums; train of white velvet lined with white satin, elegantly trimmed Duchinghamshire blond and geraniums to correspond with the dress; the body and sleeves splendidly ornamented with diamonds and blond; Head dress a diadem of diamonds and feathers; necklace and earrings en suite. THE WHOLE OF BRITISH MANUFACTURE.

Her royal highness the Duchess of Kent.—An elegant British blond dress over rich white satin, the body and sleeves richly trimmed with diamonds and blond; train of pink velvet lined with white satin, and trimmed with ermine. Head-dress, feathers and diamonds. THE WHOLE OF BRITISH MANUFACTURE.

Her royal highness the princess Victoria.—A handsome British blond dress over white satin: Ornament, pearls and diamonds.

¶ Neither the queen, nor the mother of the heir apparent of the British throne, will “go twenty rods out of the way to kick a sheep,” as John Randolph said that he would—as the dress of both are wholly of British manufacture. They are high tariff-ites!

TRIBUTES TO VALOR. The legislature of Maryland has voted "suitable swords" to col. Nathan Towson, of the U. S. army, and capt. John Gallagher, of the navy;—and the general assembly of Virginia has, in like manner, voted swords to Robert B. Randolph, Hugh Nelson Page and Alexander K. Eskridge, of the U. S. navy, for gallant services performed in the last war; and also to the oldest son of lieut. col. Armistead, for his father's defence of Fort Mifflin.

THE ARMY. The troops which had been collected at Charleston, have chiefly returned, or are about to return, to their former stations.

THE NAVY. The frigates United States, Brandywine and Constellation, and the corvette John Adams, were at Mahon on the 10th January last all well.

A FRESH NOMINATION. On Saturday last we received a letter from a gentleman of the south, who has been a subscriber to the REGISTER from the beginning—nearly twenty-two years ago, which says—

"The small noisy squad of nullifiers here contend—that, but for South Carolina nullification, Mr. Clay's bill would never have passed congress; and, as it has produced a reduction of the tariff, it is the TRUE and RIGHTFUL REMEDY; and therefore, nullification is now settled as a CONSTITUTIONAL right; and also, that John C. Calhoun is the greatest man in the world, always excepting BENJAMIN WATKINS LEIGH."

And, on last Monday, we received the Petersburg (Va.) Intelligencer, which contained the following paragraph:

THE NEXT PRESIDENCY.

We understand that at the Chesterfield election on Monday last, the opposing candidates William R. Johnson and Samuel Taylor, esqrs. united in expressing a decided preference for BENJAMIN WATKINS LEIGH, esq. as the next president of the United States. How this nomination will be relished at head quarters, we know not; but by this early movement, the people would appear determined to take the matter in their own hands and to act for themselves. Let our fellow citizens once cast off their leading strings—adopt the habit of thinking and deciding for themselves; and there will be no necessity for future legislative caucuses in Richmond.

EDITORIAL WARS. Mr. Leggett, of the New York Evening Post, and Mr. Webb, of the New York Courier and Enquirer, after a long and rude paper war, had an affair of scratching, biting, spitting, and pounding, in Wall street, on the 9th inst. in which both claim the victory! Mr. Leggett seems to have been the assailant. He had previously challenged Mr. Webb, who declined to fight him, because that he could not regard Mr. L. as a "gentleman," but offered satisfaction to Mr. L.'s "friend," if he felt disposed to carry out the quarrel. The latter declined, saying that he left Mr. Leggett to "satisfy him (Mr. W.) of his gentility in his own way." Hence the battle. Neither party suffered much personal injury.

About twenty duels have been fought between editors of Paris papers because of the duchess of Berri, and some of them terminated fatally; but peace has been restored—as all the parties now agree that this woman is "no better than she should be."

OFFICIAL NOTICES, &c. The right honorable sir Charles Richard Vaughan, his Britannic majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, having just returned from a visit to England, and resumed the exercise of his functions, was, on Monday, the 8th inst. presented anew to the president, in his official character, by the secretary of state.

On Saturday, the 6th inst. Don Jose Maria Montoya, late charge d'affaires of the United Mexican States, near this government, who has been called to other duties in the service of his country, delivered his letters of recall, and took leave of the president and secretary of state; and on Thursday the 11th inst. Don Augustine Yturbe delivered to the secretary of state his credentials as the successor of Don J. M. Montoya, and was received by this government, as the charge d'affaires of the United Mexican States.

Appointments by the president.

Arthur Middleton, jr. of South Carolina, to be secretary of the legation of the United States at Madrid, in the place of Charles S. Walsh, removed.

T. A. Howard, of Indiana, to be attorney of the U. States for the district of Indiana, in the place of Samuel Judah, removed.

Joseph S. Cabot, of Massachusetts, to be a commissioner under the law to carry into effect the convention with the Two Sicilies, in the place of Peter V. Daniel, resigned.

Charles S. Russell, of Massachusetts, to be consul of the United States at Valparaiso, in the place of Michael Hogan, deceased.

The vice president, Mr. Van Buren, it seems, will make a permanent residence at Washington. He has taken one of the "Seven Buildings."

The collector of the port of New Orleans has received an anonymous note, enclosing $500 in a note of the bank of the United States, which sum, it is requested, may be placed to the credit of the government, for duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, heretofore accruing, and not accounted for.

MURDERS AND SUICIDES seem about to become common! Within the last three or four months, we have seen accounts of several murders of young women, because they had given themselves up to their "lovers," and of one or two because that they would not!—and there has been an unusually large number of suicides. Some of the cases of murder related are horrible.

INDIANS WEST OF THE MISSISSIPPI. For the want of correct information, certain lands had been assigned both to the Creeks and the Cherokees who had emigrated to the west of the great river. The commissioners now in that part of the country have prevailed on both parties to yield a portion of their just rights, and, by a treaty made between them, adjusted a very embarrassing affair.

"THE ——— YANKEES" have invented very important machines for the better cleaning of sea-island cotton, which it is supposed will add much to the value of this staple. Cotton gins, as well as "Palmetto buttons," must be obtained from the east!

STEPHEN GIRARD'S ESTATE. The treasurer of the Girard trusts had made his report to the city councils of Philadelphia. He says:

"You will find annexed to the account a schedule of the personal property that has been passed to me for the city corporation, by the executors, in the present quarter, the par value of which is $2,088,177—and the valuation by the executors of the same, $2,403,235 67, and there is a large amount of personal property yet to be received."

MASSACHUSETTS. Had all the returns from the district been properly made, Mr. Dearborn would only have wanted four votes for a re-election to congress; but for want of these another election must have been held. The majority system is a very troublesome one—in triangular or quadrangular contests.

PENNSYLVANIA. The legislature of this state adjourned on the 9th inst. On the evening previous to the adjournment, governor Wolf vetoed the bill granting compensation to George Fisher, A. McAllister and others, for damages done by the construction of the Pennsylvania canal.* On the receipt of the veto message, a warm debate took place in the house of representatives; but the veto of the governor was finally sustained—yeas 32—nays 29. A few hours before the adjournment governor Wolf also vetoed the bill for incorporating the People's bank of York county. This bill had passed the house of representatives by a majority of 12 votes, and the senate by a vote of 22 to 8. Notwithstanding this show of strength in favor of the bill, the veto of the executive was sustained by a vote of 37 to 21.

During the session just closed governor Wolf exercised his constitutional power of vetoing bills in four different instances, and was in each case sustained by the subsequent vote of the house of representatives. By the constitution of that state, a vote of two-thirds of the two houses would secure the passage of a bill in opposition to the executive vote. But so far from approaching these two-thirds, the veto was in every instance sustained by a majority of votes.

Only one bank, we believe, has been incorporated at the late session of the legislature of Pennsylvania. Twenty-three acts were asked for—with an aggregate capital of $6,955,000.

NORTH CAROLINA. The commissioners appointed for the purpose, have determined upon the size and the plan of the new capitol to be erected at Raleigh, in the place of that which was destroyed by fire; the general plan of which, it was ordered should be preserved, with such extension, &c. as should be deemed necessary. It is decided that the new building shall be three stories high, 160 feet long, 64 feet wide, with east and west wings, 40 feet front, projecting 30 feet. The basement story will accommodate the public officers; the second story the legislature and its clerks, and the supreme court, and furnish a capacious room for the state library; and the third will contain rooms for the engraving clerks, &c.

CANADA. The Quebec Gazette contains a statement of the valuation of imports and exports during the past year, from which we select the following: Imported—Wines 411,201 gallons, valued $348,226; brandy and rum 1,334,801 do. valued $347,868; sugars 7,607,044 lbs. valued $488,860; coffee 174,899 lbs. valued $34,980; molasses 123,024 gals. valued $61,512; tea, 981,123 lbs. valued $494,680; salt, 260,227 bush. valued $52,044; tobacco, including segars, 271,857 lbs. valued $28,428. Exported—Lumber, valued, $1,170,832; staves, $274,940; deals, &c. $513,754; ashes, $3,015,016; wheat, 657,204 bushels, valued $764,618; flour, 51,057 bushels, valued $306,340.

THE FALKLAND ISLANDS. The British have taken formal possession of the Falkland Islands, expelled the Buenos Ayrean authorities, and hoisted the British flag—against all which the "Argentine Republic" has formally protested. By an arrival from these islands, we learn that a large schooner under the

*The Harrisburg Intelligencer says—the question as to the claims of Mr. Fisher and others, is not on the merits of the case; but whether damages can be obtained until the canal is completed, and the advantages as well as disadvantages taken into consideration.

Buenos Ayrean flag, carrying 10 guns and 36 men, was cruising on the west coast of Patagonia in December and January last, taking seals and boarding vessels on the coast, avowedly with the intention of making prize of all skins which had been taken at the Falkland Islands or in that vicinity.

SLAVERY. The intended plan of the British ministry in relation to negro slavery, is said to be, 1st. The immediate abolition of slavery in the colonies. 2nd. The compensation to the slave owner, at a fixed rate per head, for every slave. 3d. The raising of a loan for such compensation, to be paid off in thirty years. 4th. The manumitted slave to be compelled by the magistrates to work five days out of the seven, except when in crop, when they would work for six days. 5th. Two days amount of wages to be paid into the compensation fund, it being considered the remaining three or four days, as the case may be, as to in crop or not, would be sufficient for the support of the slave.

It is stated that 179,000 slaves were imported into the West Indies in the years 1828 and 1829—chiefly through the island of St. Thomas, if not to Cuba, direct.

CAPT. BACK'S EXPEDITION IN SEARCH OF CAPT. ROSS. We have already mentioned the arrival of Capt. Back, at New York, on his way to the northern regions, in search of Capt. Ross and his associates, who left England in 1829, in the steam vessel Victory, in the expectation of completing the discovery of the north west passage to the Pacific—the last accounts from whom was in the summer of 1830, then standing across Baffin's Bay. A hope is entertained that Capt. Ross, or some of his company, may yet be living—and for the purpose of rescuing him or them, and also to add to the information already obtained as to the real state of things in the wide and vast "world" of land and water which lies in the northern part of America, this expedition has been fitted out in England—£3,000 having been subscribed by individuals, and £2,000 contributed by the government. Capt. Back is well provided for his hardy and dangerous undertaking; and, having with him three persons who were attached to Capt. Franklin's expedition, there is some prospect, that, if the primary object of his enterprise shall fail, the second may be accomplished. At Great Slave lake he is to be joined by a party of the Hudson Bay people. This company has commissioned him, with a full command through all their territories, and over all their agents or servants, the governor alone excepted.

NULLIFICATION. In some parts of South Carolina the ladies have formed themselves into companies of invincibles, with a uniform of frock coats and pantaloons; an eastern editor says that the union men can never be induced to march against them. Query—if these ladies are really out of the bonds of union, might they not be made to surrender at discretion to the arms of an equal number of bachelor soldiers. Volunteers enough could be furnished from the west, fully equipped and capable of enduring all the fatigues of a southern campaign.

[Western Shield.]

AN INDICTMENT. Mr. Forsyth, one of the senators from Georgia, has been presented by a grand jury of one of the counties in that state, in the following terms:

"The grand jurors, sworn, chosen, and selected, protest most solemnly against the vote of our senator, John Forsyth, on the 'force bill,' and his conduct and objections to the introduction of Clay's bill. We cannot find language strong enough to express our disapprobation of such apostate conduct; for this measure seemed to be the only one calculated to allay the distracted condition of the country. We view also with deep abhorrence, the ultra-federal doctrines lately advocated by the said senator in the United States senate, and regard them as utterly subversive of the sovereignty of the states, and tending directly to a consolidated government with unlimited powers, without any check or control whatsoever; and we respond most heartily to a resolution of the republican citizens of Bedford county, Virginia, where they say, 'resolved, that the conduct of John Forsyth, in opposing leave to introduce said bill, (Mr. Clay's), was unworthy an American senator, and deserves the reprobation of every friend of the union.' We respectfully ask John Forsyth to resign his seat in the senate, that Georgia may send those there who will not misrepresent her political views and desires, but will maintain her sovereignty and dignity."

The foreman and twelve others of the jurors concurred in the preceding; but nine dissented, and asserted their rights in a counter-statement, as follows:

"It is with feelings of deep regret, that we, the undersigned, members of the grand jury, after having used our utmost influence to suppress the introduction of politics in our presentments, have to protest against the sentiments of a part of our body, which goes to reprobate and abuse our senator in congress, John Forsyth, whose greatest crime, perhaps, has been his opposition to nullification and zeal for the promotion of our present happy union, and firm support of the administration," &c.

And it was ordered, on the motion of Mr. Poe, solicitor-general, that said presentments be published!

CASE OF SLANDER. Joseph W. Parkins, ex-sheriff of London, has had a verdict of $3,500 damages and costs awarded against him, at New York, because of gross and indecent epithets which he applied to a widow lady, with whom he boarded, struggling to support her little family, and who sustained an excellent character. Mr. P. did not pretend to justify the words imputed to him; but insisted that he had not used them, and offered no testimony in his defence.

APPEALS TO THE PEOPLE! "In an elective government like ours, when the executive and legislative branches differ in their opinions as to the expediency or the principle of a law, the veto of the former is in effect a direct appeal to the people on his part. As the only sovereignty in the country, they, and they only, are to decide, at the poll, which of the two branches has acted in conformity with their wishes. The elections determine this, and from their decision there is no escape." [Globe.]

On which the Baltimore "Chronicle" of the 17th inst. says—This speaks the Globe, the official paper of government; and we place the remarks on record that there may be no denial or equivocation on the subject at a future day. The president has made his "appeal to the people" against the United States' bank, and "from their decision there is no escape," says the Globe. If the language of the official paper is to be understood as that of the president, then we have general Jackson's solemn pledge that, should the ensuing congress pass the bank bill, he will receive the act as that of the people and sanction it. This is holding out encouragement to the friends of that institution, at war with the former acts of the president, and in direct contradiction of the uniform language of his official editor—and it induces the hope, that the interests of the people are henceforward to have a preference with the executive, over those of mere party.

We may be mistaken, but we never doubted that the bank would be sustained by the people, and of course by their representatives. Its great utility has been too long experienced by the commercial community and the public at large, to admit the supposition, that the simple veto of the president can render the institution unpopular, or induce the withdrawal from it of public confidence.

THE POLES. Russian legation, Washington, April 15, 1833. Notice is hereby given to all subjects of the kingdom of Poland now residing in the United States, who have taken no part in the Polish rebellion, and who intend to return to Poland, or wish to prolong their stay in this country, that they are required to express such intention, and obtain permission to that effect, by addressing their request, in writing, to the imperial Russian legation in Washington, D. C. or the consular general in New York, within three months from the present date.

It is understood that this notice does not apply to those subjects of Poland, who, since the restoration of legal order in the kingdom, have received permission to go or to continue to reside abroad, and who are furnished with the proper passports for that purpose.

EXCHANGE—at Havana, March 24. "London, 1 per cent. discount. U. S. 10 per cent. discount. Bills abundant, no takers—even Mexican dollars are 1 per cent. discount against doubloons at the fictitious value of $17."

BRIEF NOTICES.

The inhabitants of the Cape de Verdes, notwithstanding the relief which has been afforded, are still in a deplorable condition—and another cargo of provisions is about being sent from Philadelphia. Late accounts mention horrible cases of deaths from starvation.

James Page, esq. is to take the place of T. Sergeant, esq. postmaster at Philadelphia, on the 1st of May.

The Delaware and Hudson canal company have advertised that they will deliver Lickawanna coal from their barges, at the door of the consumer in New York, at six dollars per ton, free of cartage; and they announce their intention to bring to that city a supply sufficient for all its inhabitants.

Judge Holmes, who recently died at Haddam, in Connecticut, was a member of the legislature of that state for sixty sessions. The example is so rare in the United States, that it merits particular record.

The duchess of Berri, soon expected to become a mother, is in the 46th year of her age.

On Tuesday last an accident occurred on the New Castle and French town rail road, which, though it caused no manner of injury to any of the passengers, might have been attended with most fatal consequences. As the locomotive, with its train of cars, heavily laden with passengers, was proceeding at full speed, a cow suddenly placed herself on the track in front of the engine. She was instantly killed—two cars passed over her, but the third was thrown off the rails, and happily against a bank—the rest were separated, the coupling tackle instantly giving way. If cows, &c. cannot be kept off the road, we should think that fixtures might easily be made to shove them out of the way, dead or alive. [We understand that such fixtures have been promptly made.]

The greater part of the late flourishing town of Cumberland, Maryland, was chiefly destroyed by fire in the night of the 14th instant. It broke out at 10 o'clock, P. M. and was not checked in its ravages until about seventy-five houses, the very heart of the town, were destroyed; and so rapid were the flames that many saved only the clothes which they had upon their backs. The three hotels, and the two printing offices, as well as the banking house, were burnt,—with every store in the town, one excepted. Most of the houses were brick, or 2 story log-buildings.

At a meeting of the citizens of Cumberland held at the court house, a committee was appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the extent of the calamity, &c. The committee said—

"It is ascertained that the entire business portion of Cumberland has been destroyed. All the taverns, all the stores in the place, but one, are now in ashes, about thirty flourishing mechanics all in prosperous business, have been reduced to ruin, and their families left without a shelter to cover them. The three physicians of the town have lost nearly all their property and medicines. It is believed that two-thirds of the inhabitants are houseless.

The value of property destroyed and the description of citizens to whom it belonged, the committee have estimated and classed as follows:

7 Merchants, whose loss in real and personal property and goods, is estimated at	94,000
3 Physicians	12,000
3 Hotels, including the losses of the owners	50,000
30 Mechanics, (real and personal property, stock, &c.)	71,000
Citizens not included in the above description,	31,000
Citizens not residing in the town,	14,000

Total loss $262,000

The whole amount of real estate within the city of Philadelphia has been valued, for purposes of taxation, at $25,813,144. The estimate of the expenses of the city for the current year is $407,000.

A late Philadelphia paper says—Mr. Audubon returned to this city yesterday. From him we learn, and it affords us pleasure to state the fact, that within the last six months more than fifty subscribers have been added to his list, for his great American work on Ornithology. These at $800 each make the sum of $40,000.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From London papers to the 16th March inclusive.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

The speeches of Mr. Stanley, and others, shew a horrid state of things in Ireland—and many brutal murders have just happened—"as if," says the Times, "to take away all pretence for further opposition to the bill, and from the government all excuse for failing to push it vigorously through the remaining stages of legislation."

There is no doubt that many persons engaged in the assassinations and arsons and robberies which take place, are forced to lend their assistance, for the preservation of their own lives, and the safety of their families. The chiefs in wickedness recruit men and push them forward, under the penalty of death for disobedience; and the poor creatures have no one to whom they dare apply for protection; for, in many places, the law cannot afford it. They are thus committed, and the doing of one crime leads on to another without end, except in the jail or in the gallows. In the county of Kilkenny, of 938 crimes committed in the space of seven months, 920 were "connected with White-footism;" and in other counties the state of society was nearly as bad. "Runs" upon the bank for gold had been made—but the supply was sufficient; and the merchants and dealers retailed by refusing to make purchases for exportation, so long as a "run" existed, and much inconvenience had been suffered by the owners of grain, &c.

Sergeant O'Loghlin made his first appearance as a judge in the Queen's county a short time since, in consequence of the indisposition of chief baron Joy. This is the first instance that has ever occurred since 1690, of a professed Roman Catholic judge sitting on the bench in Ireland.

The Irish church reform bill was brought into the house of commons on the 13th, by lord Althorp, and read a first time by a vote of 186 to 46.

The debate on the Irish suppression bill was not ended in the house of commons—though several of its sections had been discussed and settled. The ministers agreed to certain amendments, requiring much unanimity in the courts martial provided in the bill, &c.

FRANCE.

Nothing important is mentioned as having recently happened. The papers are filled with speculations relative to the duchess of Berri, and her situation.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

We have the usual supply of reports and suggestions as to the state of affairs between these kingdoms. The queen of France, with the princess Maria and the duke of Orleans, had attended the theatre at Brussels, with the king and queen of Belgium. The royal party was received "with deafening shouts of applause, by an immense audience." "Not a spare place could be found in the theatre at 3 o'clock in the afternoon." Mad. Malibran was to have sung in a concert at the palace—but the price which she demanded was so extravagant, that the marshal dispensed with her services.

GREECE.

King Otho arrived at Napoli di Romania on the 6th February, and on the following day issued the following proclamation:

Proclamation of Otho I. to the Greek.

Called among you by the confidence of the high mediating powers, to whose protection you are indebted for the glorious termination of a long and destructive war, called, also, by your free suffrages, I ascend the throne of Greece to fulfil the engagements I contracted, on accepting the crown when it was offered to me. You have, after a bloody struggle, and with the sacrifice of your dearest interests, acquired a political existence and independence, the fundamental basis of the happiness and prosperity of nations. You have shown yourselves, by your courage, the worthy descendants of your ancestors, whose glory has outlived centuries without losing its lustre, but till now you have been prevented reaping the fruit of your noble efforts. Your fields are uncultivated, your industry scarcely nascent, your commerce, formerly so flourishing, entirely paralysed. It was in vain that the arts and sciences expected to find again their former country at the moment when peace was concluded. Despotism, which prevailed among you, was followed by anarchy, which inflicted upon you its horrid scourge. What the love of your country by a noble effort has acquired for you, has been taken from you by discord and the most sordid egotism.

To put an end to your calamities, to a civil war, which wastes your brightest faculties to no purpose; to direct your efforts henceforward to one aim, namely, that of the prosperity, happiness, and glory of your country, which has become mine also; to efface, by degrees, under the influence of peace and order, numerous vestiges of calamities which have afflicted your fine country, endowed by nature with so much profusion; to take into consideration sacrifices made, and services rendered to the country, to protect by the ægis of the laws your persons and property against arbitrary rule and licentiousness; to procure for you, by means of institutions well matured, solid, and adapted to the state and wishes of the nation, the blessings of true liberty, which can subsist only under the empire of the laws; to accomplish the regeneration of Greece, such is the pleasing but glorious task I have imposed upon myself. I sacrifice to her a delightful and happy existence in the bosom of the beloved country of my ancestors, and impressed with the same sentiments which animated my august father when first among the sovereigns he stretched forth to you his succoring hand during your heroic struggle for your liberty, it is with confidence I address you, and call upon you to combine with fraternal concord your efforts with mine, to the sole end of promoting the public good. Let us not suffer the success obtained by your courage, your perseverance, your patriotism and your trust in divine Providence, to be sacrificed by the convulsions of discord and anarchy.

Let not your name, to which so many noble deeds have insured immortality, be stained by the errors of base passions, whatever may be the efforts which that great task may require of us. Our success will be an ample reward for ascending the throne of Greece. I promise you to protect conscientiously your religion—to maintain the laws with fidelity—to administer impartial justice to all—and to preserve in fact, by the assistance of God, your independence, your liberties, and your rights. My first cares have been directed to the re-establishment and consolidation of tranquillity and order, that every one may enjoy in peace, and without fear, entire security, forgetting the political errors of the past. I expect with full confidence that every one will henceforth submit to the laws, and to those who are charged to execute them. Let every one return to his home; I shall thereby be delivered from the painful necessity of pursuing, with all the rigor of the laws, the disturbers of the public peace and rebels. May divine Providence bless our united effort, and give new lustre to this noble country, the soil of which covers the ashes of the greatest men recorded in history; and the inhabitants of which have recently proved to their contemporaries, that the heroism and noble sentiments of their immortal ancestors are not extinguished in their hearts.

It is stated in an article from Smyrna, that Greeks residing at Constantinople, and in Russia, had, for several months past, made large purchases of land in Greece; but the speculation has ceased, in consequence of the Greek peasantry, who were formerly attached to the globe as vassals on the estates thus sold, being resolved to claim the rights of free citizens, and to refuse to perform any service as vassals.

A French paper says—"It appears that Colocotroni was still at open war with the government, and it was publicly affirmed and believed at Napoli that he was supported by Russian aid. It is not, however, probable that the Russians would encourage a war against the authority of the very man for whom their influence has so materially contributed in procuring the throne of Greece. There were several English, French and Russian ships of war in the port of Napoli when king Otho arrived, with the three admirals of the same powers commanding the station in the Archipelago. They had, it seems, made it a point to be present at the landing of the king whom the governments had sent to Greece."

TURKEY AND EGYPT.

It seems now certain that the Russian emperor had lent his fleet in the Black sea to prevent an attack upon Constantinople by the Egyptians, and had also prepared an army for the same purpose—no doubt intending to reserve this "slice of Turkey" for his own use, when convenient to take it: but it appears that the mission of the Russian general Muraviev, to Alexandria, has been successful—and that Mehemed Ali had sent orders to his son Ibrahim to suspend hostile operations, for the present. It was expected that a convention would soon put an end to the disputes between the sultan and the pachia, rendering the latter independent in name, as he has long been in fact.

PORTUGAL.

Don Pedro's troops in Oporto were suffering for the want of provisions, and Don Miguel's army by sickness. Neither seems able to act efficiently against the other. It looks most probable, however, that Don Pedro will be compelled to return, unless aided by England or France.

LATEST NEWS.

From London papers of the 23d March.

The Irish enforcing bill was proceeding steadily through the house of commons, and would pass. The 23rd of April had been assigned for introducing the ministerial plan for the abolition of slavery in the West Indies.

The Miguelites suffered severely in an attack which they made on Oporto, on the 4th March. It is said that 600 of them were killed. Pedro's loss was comparatively small.

It is reported that an agreement has been made between Turkey and Egypt, through the mediation of France and England, by which the porte cedes to the Egyptians the whole coast of Syria from Tripoli to the borders of Egypt, including Jerusalem, &c. and a tract in the interior. All the rest of the conquests of Ibrahim to be given up.

Several of the Greek chiefs have summoned their adherents to lay down their arms, and take the oath of allegiance to king Otho.

Discontents are said to exist in several parts of Italy—and that at Bologna the people and the troops had come to blows.

FRENCH "FREE TRADE."

M. Thyers, the trade minister in France, has delivered the following important observations to the chamber of agriculture, commerce and manufactures. After a few remarks upon the importance of protecting the trade of France, he proceeds as follows:

"It is with this view, gentlemen, that the government has called you together. You will represent the three greatest interests of the state: agriculture, which extracts from the earth the raw material and means of sustenance; manufacture, which transforms the products of the soil, and imparts to them all the perfection which they are capable of receiving from the hand of man; commerce, which exchanges the products, and disperses them throughout the globe. These three grand divisions of human labor are all equally noble, useful, and worthy of solicitude and protection. Unhappily they appear sometimes to have opposite interests; occasionally, manufacturing industry, which needs protection, seems contrary in its views to commerce, which has need of liberty. It is in reconciling them that the whole art of government consists. Placed between the manufacturing artisan of Lyons, who demands a vent for his products, and the skillful artisan of Lille, who seeks a protection for his; between the agriculturist of Bordeaux, who wishes the seas of the north to be open to his wines, and the proprietor of the Bois de Champagne, who invokes a protection for his iron, the government entertains a predilection for neither; it cherishes an equal affection for all; it seeks in what manner the general prosperity, which is the sole object of its vigilance,—the sole duty of its institution,—can be deduced from the balance of these conflicting interests. It is for you, gentlemen, to aid and enlighten it in the endeavor to accomplish this task which is perhaps more difficult now than it has been at any former period.

"The world has now entered into a new career. All nations wish to approximate, to enjoy a mutual understanding with each other, and to interchange their wealth. Efforts are making to convert by degrees absolute prohibitions into tariffs, and high tariffs into moderate tariffs. France will not be the last to follow this example; but, in entering upon a new and more liberal system, the object of which is the progressive enfranchisement of industry, the government is bound to declare that it means to pursue it with prudence and caution. A government founded upon institutions like ours should have no prejudices: and I think I may affirm that ours has none. But if it has no prejudices, neither is it actuated by any blind spirit of system; it recognizes but one authority—experience. It wishes neither to stop nor to gallop on; it wishes to walk. There is one fact acknowledged by every mind disciplined by study and reflection—namely, that in no age or country can an instance be cited in which any considerable and substantial good has been effected hastily.

"The government will not, therefore, forget that if manufacturers require liberty they also require protection. There is no example of a powerful and wealthy manufacturing industry that has not originated under a protecting tariff. The English navy, which seems to have been born only in the ocean, in which nature has placed it, grew up, however, under the bold and restrictive act of Cromwell.

"With the exception of systematic and absolute minds, mankind are almost agreed upon these questions; no one desires either unlimited liberty for manufactures or an exclusive absolute protection. The object in view is a wise measure of protection and liberty, by graduating the tariff, according to age, to circumstances, and to the state of interests.

The government has three important questions to propound to you:—

"It will consult you respecting, probably, the greatest of our agricultural and manufacturing interests—the conditions under which the introduction of foreign wool should be allowed.— You will weigh the interests of our agriculture, which require the vivifying presence of flocks, and those of our beautiful manufacture of woollen cloth, long the first in Europe, and which requires that the raw material should not be dearly bought. It is superfluous, of course, to tell you that the government projects no measure this year; it is merely desirous of obtaining your advice and direction in one of the gravest and most frequently agitated questions.

"The second question has in view the consulting you respecting the best means of obtaining a good collection of facts. In this respect we are sadly behindhand. All true science, every sound legislative resolution, ought to be based upon a knowledge of facts, and yet every day our uncertainty respecting them checks us in our legislative discussions. We have only been able to reach some certainty with respect to the facts shown in the custom house registers. The smuggling trade, which takes away a part of the products, conceals from us likewise a knowledge of some of the facts. It is regarding this first of the elements of economical science that we have to consult you.

"The government will inquire of you, in the last place, whether it is expedient to direct, this year, an exposition of our manufactures. You, gentlemen, who have recently left our manufacturing towns, will be able to acquaint us with their wishes and conveniences.

"These three questions are intended as an indication—they are not a limit. You will be free to propose to us whatever your knowledge and patriotism may suggest as useful. The government will listen with serious attention to your wishes and your advice."

The editor of a London paper, on publishing the preceding says—

It will thus appear that the French intend to adhere to the RESTRICTIVE SYSTEM, and certainly not to admit, (at least this year), our iron, our cotton twist, or any of our manufactures, at a reduced duty; but, on the contrary, the prohibitory system, (notwithstanding the prophecies of Mr. P. Thomson), will be continued by Louis Philippe and his liberal deputies, in spite of the relaxations of our own commercial code, and the encouragement we have held out to a free trade. What will the political economists and free traders say to this?

"British 'relaxations' and 'encouragements!'" In what has Britain relaxed, except in regard to articles in which she fears no competition? Are not even bread-stuffs and meats, and the chief products of the forest and of the sea, as if prohibited by her? Does she not impose a duty of seven cents the square yard even on calicoes? She makes a great fuss about her "relaxation" as to silks—their importation was prohibited until 5th July, 1826, and they yet pay a duty of thirty per cent. on her own valuations of them. She is also boastful about her "free trade" in gloves. These were prohibited until July, 1826—but they pay a duty of from eight to fourteen cents per pair—all women's gloves or mits being subject to the latter duty. What else? We should be thankful if some who talk so much about British "free trade" would descend from their heroicisms into simple statements of facts.

MEXICO.

Translation of a letter from Bernardo Gonzalez, minister of foreign affairs of Mexico, to the secretary of state of the U. States. Palace of the federal government, Mexico, Jan. 24, 1833.

The undersigned, secretary of state for foreign relations, of the United Mexican States, has the honor of informing you that the civil war, which has desolated the republic during the past year, has been terminated by the convention concluded at Zavaleta, on the 23d December, 1832, between the armies under the respective commands of general Don Anastasio Bustamante and general Don Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana; and that general Don Manuel Gomez Pedraza has assumed the duties of the chief magistracy of the legislatures of the states. The whole republic being now tranquil, and peace having been insured, the government is solely occupied in regulating the various branches of the administration, and restoring the constitutional system to its original state; in all which they trust, that they will be favored and protected by Providence.

The stipulations made by each party, together with the motives which dictated them, will be seen by reference to the treaty of Zavaleta, of which I send herewith a copy. The republic has thereby been freed from the horrors of anarchy, and we have now the agreeable prospect of an entire establishment of the constitution, and a rigid observance of the laws.

The president of this republic has considered it one of his first duties to request your kind offices in making known this happy event to the government of the United States, being assured that the amicable relations which have heretofore subsisted between the two countries, the highest gratification will thus be afforded to it and to you.

The undersigned has the honor of assuring you of his most distinguished consideration, your most humble, [Signed] BERNARDO GONZALEZ.

The principal points of the convention of Zavaleta, referred to above, are:
All elections of members of the general congress, or to the state legislatures, made since September 1, 1823, are declared null and void.

New elections are ordered throughout the whole republic, and the legislatures of all the states are to be in session by the 15th

February, 1833, or sooner, if possible; each is then to choose two senators, and two persons to fill the office of president and vice president. Those senators and the members of the lower house of congress to be in the city of Mexico by the 20th of March. The congress to meet the 25th March, and the votes for the election of president and vice president to be opened on the 26th, in the presence of both houses, so that the result may be made known on the 30th.

General Manuel Gomez Pedraza is to be recognized as the lawful president, until the 1st of April, when the term of office expires by the constitution.

The congress is to be petitioned to approve this convention, and to sanction the means which have been employed to obtain it—to pass an act of general amnesty, with regard to all that has happened since September 1, 1828—to reorganize the army, and remodel the laws respecting it—to revoke certain decrees passed by the late congress.

The convention is signed, first by general Bustamante, as general in chief, and the officers of the army under his command—then by general Santa Ana and the officers of his army, according to regiments and battalions.

CHINESE PRAYER FOR RAIN.

From the New York Observer.

On the 31st of May last, an official paper was published by the emperor of China, lamenting the want of rain. He had previously directed sacrifices to be made to the gods, and "devoutly knocked his head on the ground," but without effect. "His scorching anxiety had continued night and day, and hour after hour, he looked earnestly for rain; but none had fallen." He "had turned his thoughts in upon himself, and his government," but had found nothing amiss. "His own conduct," he says rather proudly, "ought to have induced a sweet harmony between the rain-bearing clouds above, and the parched earth below, but this had not been the effect;" and, therefore, in this official paper, the emperor directs "a mitigation of punishment for convicted persons in the province of Peking, (except in the case of great crimes)," and orders that "accused persons should be brought to a speedy and fair trial;" that "imprisoned witnesses should be at once confronted with the opposite parties, or be set at liberty on bail;" and that "all small offences be immediately disposed of and the parties liberated." "Thus, (he adds), we may hope for timely, genial and fruitful showers. Let the criminal band immediately obey these commands. Respect this."

This last contrivance was as ineffectual as all that had preceded it. The drought was severe; and continued still for many weeks. The emperor, kings and princes "fasted and prayed once in seven days, before altars dedicated to the gods of heaven, the gods of the earth, of the year, of the land, of the grain, and finally, to imperial heaven itself, and also to imperial earth, with all the saints." His majesty, moreover, sent a king to Tae Shan, "the great mountain," in Shangtung province, with Tibetan incense matches, to pray for rain in the emperor's stead. But all was of no avail, and at last on the 25th of July, the emperor offered up the following

PRAYER FOR RAIN, written by his imperial majesty Taoukwang, and offered up on the 28th day of the 6th month of the 12th year of his reign—July 25th, A. D. 1832.

"Kneeling, a memorial is hereby presented, to cause affairs to be heard.

"Oh, alas! Imperial heaven, were not the world afflicted by extraordinary changes, I would not dare to present extraordinary services. But this year the drought is most unusual. Summer is past, and no rain has fallen. Not only do agriculture and human beings feel the dire calamity; but also beasts and insects, herbs and trees, almost cease to live.

"I, the minister of heaven, am placed over mankind, and am responsible for keeping the world in order, and tranquillizing the people. Although it is now impossible for me to sleep or eat with composure; although I am scorched with grief, and tremble with anxiety; still, after all, no genial and copious showers have been obtained.

"Some days ago, I fasted, and offered rich sacrifices, on the altars of the gods of the land and the grain; and had to be thankful for gathering clouds, and slight showers; but not enough to cause gladness.

"Looking up, I consider that heaven's heart is benevolence and love. The sole cause is the daily deeper atrocity of my sins; but little sincerity and little devotion. Hence I have been unable to move heaven's heart, and bring down abundant blessings.

"Having respectfully searched the records, I find, that, in the 24th year of Keenlung, my imperial grandfather, the high honorable and pure emperor reverently performed a 'great snow service.' I feel impelled by ten thousand considerations, to look up and imitate the usage, and with trembling anxiety, rashly assail heaven, examine myself, and consider my errors; looking up, and hoping that I may obtain pardon. I ask myself—whether in sacrificial services I have been disrespectful? Whether or not pride and profligacy have had a place in my heart, springing up there unobserved? Whether, from the length of time, I have become remiss in attending to the affairs of government; and have been unable to attend to them with that serious diligence, and strenuous effort, which I ought? Whether I have uttered irreverent words and have deserved reprehension? Whether perfect equity has been attained in conferring rewards or inflicting punishments? Whether in raising mauso-leams and laying out gardens, I have distressed the people and waisted property? Whether in the appointment of officers I have failed to obtain fit persons, and thereby the acts of government have been petty and vexatious to the people? Whether punishments have been unjustly inflicted or not? Whether the oppressed have found no means of appeal? Whether in persecuting heterodox sects, the innocent have not been involved? Whether or not the magistrates have insulted the people, and refused to listen to their affairs? Whether in the successive military operations on the western frontiers, there may have been the horrors of human slaughter, for the sake of imperial rewards? Whether the largesses bestowed on the afflicted southern provinces were properly applied; or the people were left to die in the ditches? Whether the efforts to exterminate or pacify the rebellious mountaineers of Hoonan and Canton, were properly conducted; or whether they led to the inhabitants being trampled on as mire or ashes? To all these topics, to which my anxieties have been directed, I ought to lay the plumb-line, and strenuously endeavor to correct what is wrong; still recollecting that there may be faults which have not occurred to me in my meditations.

"Prostrate I beg imperial heaven, Hwang Teen, to pardon my ignorance and stupidity; and to grant me self-renovation; for myriads of innocent people are involved by me, a single man. My sins are so numerous, it is difficult to escape from them. Summer is past, and autumn arrived; to wait longer will really be impossible. Knocking head, I pray imperial heaven, to hasten and confer gracious deliverance—a speedy and divinely beneficial rain; to save the people's lives and in some degree redeem my iniquities. Oh—alas! Imperial heaven, observe these things! Alas! oh imperial heaven, be gracious to them. I am inexpressibly grieved, alarmed and frightened. Reverently this memorial is presented."

Remarks of the New York Observer.

This is a most singular production. It is one, too, of great value. It is worth more than scores of quartos and folios of the vain speculations which have been published concerning China. Even allowing that much of the coloring has been given to it for effect merely, (which we are slow to admit), still it exhibits an exalted personage in a most interesting and affecting point of view. It is withal a very serious document: as it conducts us to the anti-chambers of the "celestial court," and there shows us the "minister of heaven," scorched with grief, poring over his atrocious sins, and with trembling anxiety, recounting the errors of his public and private life; our sympathy is excited, and we, instinctively, re-echo his lamentation, Woo hoo! Oh, alas!

It exhibits weakness and darkness peculiar to the human mind, while unblest by the revealed word and by the spirit of the only living and true God. It shows, also, very distinctly, if we mistake not, the symptoms of an oppressed and declining empire. We predict nothing. We should rejoice to see "the great pure dynasty" long stand strong, flourishing in all the glory, peace, tranquillity, and prosperity which it now proudly and falsely arrogates. The welfare of the Chinese empire is the dearest object to our hearts on earth. But our own minds, in accordance we believe with the minds of millions, forebode an approaching change. We cannot deny the evidence of our senses; and we will not, knowingly, conceal the truth. Causes are operating on this nation—would they did not exist—which must produce tremendous effects. The state groans; and already convulsions begin to be felt. And oh, should the bands of government be once broken asunder, and this immense mass of population—an ocean of human beings—be thrown into confusion, the scene would be awful. We gladly turn from the contemplation of such a picture.

The emperor's anxieties, occasioned by the long continuance of the drought, are now terminated. By a paper in the Gazette, dated at Peking, July 29th, it is stated—that after the emperor had fasted, and offered the prayer, given above, before the altar dedicated to heaven—at about 8 o'clock on the same evening, thunder, lightning, and rain were intermingled; the rain falling in sweet and copious showers. The next day, a report came in from the shunteeing magistrate, that two inches had fallen; and on successive days, near the imperial domain, a quantity fell equal to four inches. For this manifestation of heavenly compassion, the emperor, in an order published, expresses his devout devotion and intense gratitude; and the 2d of August is appointed as a day of thanksgiving. Six kings are directed to repair to the altar dedicated (1) to heaven, (2) to earth, (3) to the gods of the land and grain, (4) to the gods of heaven, (5) to the gods of earth, and (6) to the gods of the revolving year.

The precise idea which his imperial majesty attaches to the words "imperial heaven," we will not stay here to determine. It is manifest, however, that such a variety of objects of adoration cannot be acceptable to HIM who has declared "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." Jehovah is not a man that he should lie;—he will not give his glory to another. The conduct of the emperor in praying, fasting, and self examination, ought to reprove the christian. But we shall do exceedingly wrong, if we attempt to excuse such abominable idolatry, and to throw the mantle of charity over that which God abhors.

It is a very remarkable circumstance, connected with the drought, that none of the priests of Taou and Budlia were ordered to pray as they usually have been heretofore on similar occasions. This single fact shows in how low estimation they are held by the emperor.

VETO IN MASSACHUSETTS. GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

To the honorable senate.

A bill entitled "an act to incorporate the proprietors of the second Baptist meeting house in Lowell," was yesterday laid before me, for my approval, which feeling myself constrained to, withhold, I now return the same, with my objections thereto, to the senate, where it appears to have originated, for revision, pursuant to the provisions of the constitution.

The first section of the bill proposes to constitute certain persons, by name with their associates and successors into a corporation by the name of the proprietors of the second Baptist meeting house in Lowell, with power to acquire and manage real and personal estate, not exceeding in value twenty thousand dollars. In the second section, it is provided, that the corporation may divide their estate into shares, as their bye-laws shall direct, and may make on such shares assessments not exceeding one hundred dollars, on each share, and authorises a sale of the shares of delinquent proprietors, who shall neglect or refuse to pay their assessments. The number of shares is no otherwise restricted, than by the aggregate amount of funds, which the corporation is permitted to possess. There is no where to be found in the bill, any limitation of the uses to which this property is to be applied, or any indication of the description of estate which the corporation may hold. Indeed, otherwise than by the name given to the corporation, and which neither defines, nor can control its powers, there is nothing to designate its intended character, or distinguish it from a monied, manufacturing, or other business institution. Taken in all its provisions, it is, in effect, neither more nor less, than a broad and bold authority to certain persons to "acquire and manage," with the facilities of an act of incorporation, property to the amount of twenty thousand dollars raised by assessment, divided and held in shares, and to be disposed of, at pleasure. In stating this position, it can hardly be necessary to remark, that the title of the bill, which seems to imply that the persons proposed to be incorporated are proprietors of a meeting house, is no part of the enactment, nor need it be repeated, that the name by which a corporation is created has little to do in regulating its operations. If it was designed to constitute a corporate body for religious purposes, the bill departs from the technical and definite phraseology, by which that design of the legislature is usually manifested. The reference which is had in the bill to the powers and requirements contained in an act concerning corporations, applies only to those powers which respect the organization of such bodies, and are made common to corporations of every description, where special and different provisions are not prescribed.

Holding, therefore, as I do, that if the bill should pass into a law, the corporation thereby created, would be competent to acquire, hold, and manage estate, real and personal, to the extent of twenty thousand dollars, wholly unrestrained in its uses, by the statute, and believing that in grants of this description, it must be the intention of the legislature to direct the application of the funds, I respectfully submit these considerations, as objections both to the expediency and propriety of the form of the present enactment.

A particular matter, certainly of this minor importance, might hardly seem to warrant me, in claiming for it so much of your attention. But I cannot forbear to avail myself of the opportunity which the objection to this bill creates, to express also my apprehensions of future embarrassment from the facility and frequency with which corporate powers are granted. The effect is to destroy individuality of interest, and to accumulate masses of property in aggregate bodies; to convert substantial freeholds into mere securities for transferable paper, or by locking up property from private disposal in the funds of another class of corporations, to induce to a reliance for the accomplishment of ordinary purposes upon public provisions, rather than the results of personal industry and exertion. Whenever large capital and combined means are required to effect great objects, whether of business or moral improvement, they may most effectually be secured under acts of incorporation. To such purposes, and to a wide range of interests, these legal facilities, doubtless, may be judiciously, if they are not of necessity accorded. But they must be limited in their application, by some rules of public policy. And I humbly and earnestly appeal to the consideration of the legislature, at least, as some guard against abuses of the authority conferred, that in every act of incorporation which their wisdom may sanction, the object of the grant, whatever it may be, shall be made manifest, and the powers which are to be exercised, either expressly or by distinct reference, be clearly and precisely defined.

LEVI LINCOLN.

Council chamber, March 20th, 1833.

CIRCULAR TO POSTMASTERS, Relative to the abuses of the franking privilege, and sending books in the mail.

Post office department, April 11, 1833.

Being informed by official reports, "that the abuse of the franking privilege is increasing to an extent which threatens seriously to impair the revenue of the department," that "it is not confined to correspondence from which no pecuniary advantage results, but is extended to the commercial and business transactions of the country—instances having been detected of its being practiced for the benefit of banks and vendors of lottery tickets;" that "every day, letters are left to be mailed, bearing the franks of persons who are, and for some time have been, many hundred miles distant;—and letters are received from the large cities bearing the franks of gentlemen well known to be remote from those places, the addresses being in hand writing different from the franks; with other circumstances attending, obviously showing that those, whose franks were upon them, could have no participation in, or knowledge of the letters:” and that “blank envelopes, with franks upon them, have been surreptitiously and otherwise obtained, with a view of covering correspondence, in violation of law?”—I deem it my duty to call on all postmasters, to be vigilant in detecting and preventing these frauds upon the revenue of the department; and strictly to obey that requirement of the act of congress, which makes it “their special duty to prosecute” for such offences.

It is because the letter is actually, or by construction of law, from the person authorised to send it free, that it is exempted from postage. The frank is merely the certificate of the fact that it is so. When, therefore, the circumstances connected with the letter, are such as to show that it is not from such a person, and that the frank on it is, in effect, a false certificate, postmasters will, in such cases, charge the letter with postage; and they are particularly required to do so, whenever the address on the letter is in a hand writing different from the frank, unless that circumstance is satisfactorily explained.

Penalties attach, whenever a person franks a letter from another, unless written by his own order, and on the business of his office, except that the secretaries of the state, treasury, war, and navy departments, and the postmaster general, may frank letters and packets on official business, prepared in any public office, in the absence of the principal thereof. In prosecuting for these penalties, postmasters will obtain the aid of the district attorney of the United States, and for that purpose, report to him the circumstances, and the names of the witnesses in each case; and they will cause the proceedings to be instituted in the district court of the United States; not only against those who abuse their frank, but also against those who procure it to be done. Attention is called to the subjoined references to, and extracts from, the law and regulations of the department. It has been reported by several postmasters, that numerous volumes of books have lately been discovered in the mails, the wrappers in which they were enveloped and franked, when mailed, having worn off; and that this mode of sending them through the country, has been practised to an extent that has subjected the conveyance of the mail to vexatious burthens and delay;—I, therefore, require all postmasters to be careful to ascertain, when bulky packages are left to be mailed, if they contain books, or any other article not authorised by law to be so transmitted; and on discovering that to be the case, to withhold them, in all instances, from the mail.

W. T. BARRY, postmaster general.

See pages 15, 16, 21, 26, 28, 29, and 52, of the law and instructions of the post office department, (edition of 1832) to ascertain who are entitled to the franking privilege.

Sections 24 and 25, of the act of congress, passed March 3, 1825, entitled “an act to reduce into one the several acts establishing and regulating the post office department.”

Sec. 24. And be it further enacted, That every person, who, from and after the passage of this act, shall procure, and advise, or assist, in the doing or perpetration of any of the acts or crimes by this act forbidden, shall be subject to the same penalties and punishments as the persons are subject to, who shall actually do or perpetrate any of the said acts or crimes, according to the provisions of this act.

Sec. 25. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall frank any letter or letters, other than those written by himself, or by his order, on the business of his office, he shall, on conviction thereof, pay a fine of ten dollars, and it shall be the special duty of postmasters to prosecute for said offence: provided, that the secretary of the treasury, secretary of state, secretary of war, secretary of the navy and postmaster general, may frank letters or packets on official business, prepared in any other public office, in the absence of the principal thereof. And if any person, having the right to receive his letters free of postage, shall receive, enclosed to him, any letter or packet addressed to a person not having that right, it shall be his duty to return the same to the post office, marking thereon the place from whence it came, that it may be charged with postage. And if any person shall counterfeit the hand writing or frank of any person, or cause the same to be done, in order to avoid the paying of postage, each person, so offending, shall pay for every such offence, five hundred dollars.

THE BURNING OF THE TREASURY.

OFFICIAL REPORTS.

Note of the president, directing an investigation in relation to the fire.

In consequence of the public loss sustained by the burning of the treasury building, and the destruction of some valuable papers, the president has deemed it proper, at the request of the secretary of the treasury, to direct an inquiry to be made into the cause of the disaster. He therefore directs a thorough and careful investigation to be made on the following points.

1. In what manner was the fire occasioned?

2. If accidental, how did it happen? Was it from any defect in the original construction of the building?—or was it occasioned by carelessness or negligence? And if by carelessness or negligence, to whom can it be attributed?

3. Were proper exertions used to preserve the books, papers, and public property in the building, as well as to save the building itself?

The attorney general is directed to conduct the inquiry, and the other members of the cabinet to aid in it. The witnesses to be examined on oath, and their depositions reduced to writing; and when the investigation is closed, the testimony to be reported to the president, together with the opinions of the members of the cabinet on the points above stated.

The president directs that the chief justice of the circuit court for the District of Columbia be requested to preside at the investigation, and to assist in it. ANDREW JACKSON.

March 31, 1833.

Report of the investigators.

Sir: We have made the inquiries directed by your order of the 31st of March last, in relation to the fire at the treasury building, on the morning of that day, and proceed to state the manner in which the investigation was conducted, and the result of the inquiries.

We commenced the examination of witnesses at the room of the secretary of state, on the day of the fire at two o'clock in the evening; and continued to take testimony at the same place every day until the evening of Saturday, the 6th instant. The proceedings were then unavoidably suspended until Wednesday the 10th instant, when some further testimony was taken, and the investigation closed. We have examined altogether more than fifty witnesses, and have called before us every person from whom it was supposed that any information could be obtained on the subject.

Chief Justice Cranch presided at the examinations, and gave to the inquiry his unremitting attention and valuable assistance. You are aware the secretary of the navy left Washington, in order to execute some official duties, before the investigation was concluded.

It appears from the whole evidence, that the fire was first discovered about half past two o'clock in the morning. The attention of two or three persons who reside in the neighborhood and in view of the building, was attracted by the light from the windows; and nearly at the same time the volume of smoke occasioned by the fire was observed by others who happened to be in the streets in different parts of the city.

Those who discovered the fire immediately gave the alarm, and hastened to the building; and when the first persons arrived on the ground, the guard within the house was still asleep, and unconscious of the fire, and was awakened by the noise made at one of the doors to rouse him. There is some difference of opinion among the witnesses as to the precise state of the fire at that moment. But taking the whole testimony together, we think it is fully proved, that when the first persons arrived on the ground, the room in the second story on the north side of the house, and immediately west of the projection in the centre of the building, appeared to be on fire in every part—that the flames and dense clouds of smoke were issuing from one or both of the windows of the room—and that there was then no appearance of fire in either of the adjoining rooms, nor in the garret, nor roof. In a very few minutes, however, the fire was communicated to the adjoining rooms, and to the garret and the roof; and the garret being filled for the most part with old papers and paper cases, the flames spread through it with great rapidity. The first engine arrived on the ground in twenty minutes after the fire was discovered, and the roof over the room in which it originated was then blazing, and very soon afterwards began to fall in. Every exertion to check the flames was immediately made with this engine, and others which arrived shortly after it. But it was soon evident that the want of a sufficient supply of water in the neighborhood of the building rendered it impossible to save it, and the fire continued to advance. And in about one hour from the time it was first seen, the whole building, with the exception of the fire-proof portion of it, was either consumed or on fire.

We have endeavored in vain to trace the origin of the fire, and are unable to impute it to any particular cause. Three of the witnesses who have been examined, passed near the building about half past one o'clock, or a little later, on the morning of the fire, and at that time there was no light from any of the windows, nor any thing in or about the house to attract attention or create alarm. The remains of the building have been carefully examined by skilful workmen, and they can discover no defect in its construction which may be supposed to have occasioned the disaster. On the night of the fire the usual precautions for security appear to have been taken. The regular watchman being sick and unable to attend, his place was supplied, under the direction of the superintendent, by a young man between nineteen and twenty years of age, who has been employed constantly for about eighteen months past, as one of the laborers at the building. And, according to the ordinary practice of the guard, he examined about ten o'clock at night all the rooms, except those in the fire-proof part of the house, and found the fires in the grates to be, as he supposed, entirely safe. The fuel used in the part of the building where the fire began, is anthracite coal; and in the room where it originated, the coal had sunk below the upper bar of the grate at the time of the examination by the guard; and the blower, resting on the ash pan, was placed as a fender before it, according to the usual practice. No fresh coal had been put on the fire after twelve or one o'clock on that day. The outer doors and the windows of the house were fastened in the ordinary manner in the inside, with the exception of a window in the fire-proof, which seems to have been very negligently secured, if secured at all, on that night. But there is no communication between that room and the part of the building where the fire commenced; and if an evil disposed person had entered at that window, he could not have made his way into any other room.

The regulations of the superintendent made it the duty of the night guard to make the examination of the rooms and fires above mentioned; but he was not required to keep awake all night; and, since the year 1826, it has been the practice for only one of the watchmen to remain during the night in the building, and he has been permitted to sleep after ten o'clock.

As soon as the fire was discovered, the proper exertions were immediately made by the officers of the government and the citizens who assembled, to save the books and papers. And the most active and praiseworthy efforts were used for that purpose; and, in some instances, the zeal of those engaged exposed them to much hazard. The secretary of the treasury was early on the ground, and by his direction the books and papers were placed, as they were brought out, under the care of proper guards—and on the same day, at an early hour in the evening, they were deposited in a house that was immediately engaged for the temporary occupation of the treasury department.

We cannot, at this time, undertake to state with precision, what papers and books have been destroyed; since those which were saved have not yet been perfectly arranged. The secretary of the treasury has taken measures to obtain a prompt and accurate report from the heads of the bureaux on this subject. But we believe that very few papers have been lost that are of much importance to the government or to individuals, and that the great mass of the most valuable books and papers have been saved.

The depositions we have taken accompany this report—and also drawings of the treasury building, which will enable you more readily to comprehend the testimony of the witnesses.

We have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

(Signed)

To the president.
April 12, 1833.

Report from the secretary of the treasury to the president.
Treasury department, April 12, 1833.

SIR—The report which will be made to you of the result of the investigation you have been pleased to institute, at the request of the secretary of the treasury, will present the information that has been obtained respecting the circumstances attending the recent conflagration of the treasury building. For your further satisfaction, however, it is thought proper to lay before you such other facts connected with the subject, as are within the knowledge of the officers of the department; and, as far as may now be practicable, to state the loss that has been sustained in the records and papers, and to offer such suggestions as may tend to greater safety in future.

With a view to this subject, the principal officers who occupied the building, viz: the first comptroller, first auditor, treasurer and register, were severally called upon; and their reports are herewith transmitted.

From all that has hitherto transpired, it does not appear that the disaster is attributable to any particular neglect or inattention on the part of those who had charge of the building. It is shown that past ten o'clock at night all the fires were in a safe condition, and that no lights of any kind had been used in that part of the building in which the fire originated. Though the person employed to watch that night was asleep when the fire was discovered, it appears that it was not considered his duty to be awake all night, and that, in fact, it has been the authorized practice, for many years, for the watchmen in the building to lie down to sleep after about ten or eleven o'clock. No satisfactory proof has been obtained of the cause of the disaster; and nothing need be here observed in addition to the report already adverted to.

By referring to the diagrams which accompany that report, the position of the apartments occupied by the several officers of the treasury may be seen. In the basement or cellar, three rooms on the south side were filled with boxes containing abstracts connected with settled post office accounts, and were in charge of the register's office; five other rooms were appropriated to the storing of fuel, and the residue were empty. On the ground floor, three rooms on the north side, in the eastern section, were occupied by the treasurer's office; the three rooms on the south side of that section, with one room on each side of the south door, and one room adjoining the treasurer's office on the north side, were occupied by the first auditor's office; all the other rooms on the ground floor, and the adjoining fire proof rooms, were occupied by the register's office. On the principal or upper floor, the six rooms in the eastern section of the building were occupied by the comptroller's office—the residue of the rooms on that floor, and the fire proof adjoining, were occupied by the secretary's office. In the attic, or garret, the middle room on the south side, was appropriated to papers and records belonging to the secretary's office—the two adjoining rooms on the east, and those of the comptroller's office; the south eastern corner to those of the treasurer's office; and all the residue to those of the register's office.

The fire was discovered in the second room west of the staircase, on the north side of the house, on the principal floor—being the room immediately adjoining the projection in the centre of the building, as laid down in the diagram, and being one of the rooms belonging to the office of the secretary, and occupied by Mr. A. Laub, (who was also the superintendent of the building), Mr. Wolf, and Mr. T. Dickinson. It was discovered between half past two and three o'clock. The great progress it had made when discovered, and its rapid advance afterwards, until the total destruction of the building, are set forth in the testimony accompanying the report, and are besides so well known to the president as to need no further description.

The secretary, though not among the earliest, was nevertheless early in arriving at the scene of the conflagration. He soon saw from the progress which the fire was making, and from the whole inadequate means of checking or subduing it, that the entire building would probably be consumed. His attention was, therefore, immediately, and almost exclusively, directed to the preservation of the papers and records in the accounting offices and in the register's office. Many of the clerks and citizens assisted with great zeal and activity, as well in getting those papers and records out of the building, as in preserving them afterwards. Under the direction of the secretary, the several collection of papers, books, records, &c. that were made, were placed in charge of the clerks, or well known and trusty citizens. By these united exertions all the important papers belonging to those offices have been saved. Those belonging to the treasurer's office have also been preserved.

The flame, however, was so soon communicated to the garret and roof, particularly that part of the roof above the stairs leading to the garret, as to render highly dangerous, and indeed impracticable, any effort to save the papers and records belonging to any of the offices, which had been placed in the garret, and consequently they were all lost.

As soon as the papers, books and other records were taken out of the accounting and register's office, the secretary's attention was turned to procuring suitable buildings for the immediate accommodation of the department. After various inquiries and negotiations, he succeeded in obtaining, before noon on Sunday, the five contiguous buildings on the south side of the Pennsylvania avenue nearest the eastern gate of the president's square. Before two o'clock on the same day, all the papers and records that were exposed, were safely removed to those buildings, and the fire proof apartments of the treasury, which remained undestroyed. On Monday and Tuesday the attention of the officers was chiefly devoted to the arrangement of the papers and records; and, on Wednesday, the business of the department, which had been partially resumed on Tuesday, was in full activity and transacted as usual.

Owing to the great quantity of papers, books, and other records removed from the building, and the disorder into which they were thrown, some time must necessarily elapse before it can be exactly ascertained what has been lost and what saved. From the progress the fire had made before it was discovered, it was not possible to save any part of those in the room in which it originated, or in that of the chief clerk immediately adjoining it on the west. Those contained in the room on the south side, directly opposite to that in which it commenced, and to which it must have communicated early, were also destroyed. Those in the other rooms occupied by the clerks of the secretary on the same floor were chiefly saved. Of those contained in the room occupied by Mr. Reid and Mr. Nesbit, next east of that in which the fire originated, by the timely efforts of the former gentleman, and a few others who arrived early, a great portion were saved; and of those contained in the room occupied by Mr. F. Dickinson and Mr. Rodman, owing to the fearless exertions of the former gentleman, who, accompanied by a highly respectable citizen, entered the room by a ladder when the roof above was on fire, and continued till the doors of his own room were consumed, and the ceiling of that immediately adjoining on the east had fallen in, none were lost. The library and all the papers in the room occupied by the secretary were saved by the efforts of a few individuals, among whom were the chief clerk and Mr. T. Dickinson, who entered it, by a ladder, through the semicircular window at the west end. All the furniture in the rooms, occupied by the secretary's clerks was consumed, and of that in the secretary's room, the greater part was broken in being thrown from the windows.

The principal loss sustained in the secretary's office, was the correspondence; the whole of which, with the exception of that relating to revolutionary claims, and to applications under the insolvent laws, and with the exception also of two record books containing letters to banks, and two containing communications to congress, was lost. Measures, however, are already in progress to replace them as far as may be found practicable. In the mean time, it is hoped that no serious detriment will be experienced in the transaction of the public business for want of them.

The reports from the first comptroller, first auditor, treasurer and register, which are herewith transmitted, exhibit the state of the papers and records of their respective offices as far as can now be ascertained. In those offices were contained all the papers and records which relate to accounts, settled and unsettled; and of these it is highly gratifying to find that the whole of the latter, and all the important portions of the former have been preserved.

The secretary has reason to be satisfied with the conduct of all the persons belonging to his office who were present on the occasion. It is represented to him, that Mr. Anthony, Mr. Maginnis, Mr. Potter, Mr. Wolf, Mr. A. Laub, and Mr. Nesbit, and Mr. Mountz, were not aware of the fire at the treasury until it was consumed, owing to the distance of their residences. The chief clerk, and Messrs. McKean, Dungan, T. Dickins, Rodman, Reid, and F. Dickins were actively and usefully engaged in rescuing and preserving the books, records, and effects; as were also Mr. Lovejoy the messenger, and Mr. William J. Goddard, the laborer attached to the building, and Mr. Pettet the assistant messenger, who, owing to the distance of his residence, was late in arriving.

The secretary observed other clerks active and diligent on the occasion, as well as many of his fellow citizens. But as he cannot recollect all, and to name some only would seem invidious, he confines his notice in this place to those attached to his own office.

As the situation of the buildings now occupied by the department does not admit of being otherwise effectually protected, the secretary of war, has, at the request of the secretary of the treasury, directed a military guard to be stationed, and sentinels to walk round them from sunset to sunrise. Means will also be taken for removing some wooden fences which adjoin the building, to prevent fire from being communicated by them, and to prevent the shelter they afford to evil disposed persons.

Our own experience has demonstrated, what indeed could not otherwise be doubted, that there is no proper security for the public archives, consisting of so many and such important records, documents, and papers, except in fire-proof buildings. The present offices are not of this description. The buildings appropriated to the state and war departments are partially fire-proof, though in a very slight degree. The navy building is altogether insecure, even more so than the treasury building was,—inasmuch as the latter contained some fire-proof repositories in which a portion of the records were preserved. The secretary, therefore, does not deem it proper to recommend the repair of the building, if the president should be of opinion that he has authority to repair it. The secretary, however, takes the liberty to suggest, that, at the meeting of congress it be recommended that a fire-proof building be erected, of sufficient extent to accommodate all the public offices under the same roof, having regard as well to those already organized as those which the growth of the country will probably render necessary for some years to come. Such a plan would have the additional advantage of removing the great inconvenience which is now constantly experienced in the transaction of business, from the separation of the public offices.

All which is respectfully submitted.

LOUIS McLANE, secretary of the treasury.

The president of the United States.

The reports of the comptroller, first auditor, treasurer and register of the treasury are added. They throw no light on the subject under inquiry, and the following summary notice of their several statements will subserve all general purposes.

The first comptroller, Judge Anderson, reports that all the correspondence on revenue questions, from the commencement of the government up to February 28th, 1833, and most other papers and books of value have been found, and that "it has not yet been discovered that any books or documents of importance belonging to that office, or any accounts received in it from the auditor's office, are missing."

The first auditor, R. Harrison, reports that every thing in his office was removed,—and that none but papers of little value are missing and they are daily coming in. The office is perfectly re-organized.

The treasurer, John Campbell, reports, that all the articles, records, papers, furniture, &c. in the lower rooms were removed some time before the fire reached them. Those in the garret rooms were entirely destroyed. The lower rooms contained all the papers that relate to the transactions of the treasurer's office since 1st June, 1829, and the records of the treasurer's quarterly accounts for several years prior to that time, and the records of payments into the treasury by collectors and receipts of public money since 1816. The room in the garret contained all the books and papers relating to the transactions of the office prior to 1st June, 1829, with these exceptions. The papers are now all in order and arranged for use.

The register of the treasury, T. L. Smith, esq. reports, that there is satisfactory reason for believing that the contents of all the rooms that were occupied for the transaction of the business of this office, have been saved. The loss will be confined to the garret, and the cellar, which were merely places of deposit for the papers of the least value.

The losses are chiefly the vouchers of the internal revenue accounts, and those of the war and navy departments prior to 1817, and the "abstracts" of post office accounts prior to 1828. The records, daybooks &c. being preserved, little inconvenience is anticipated from the losses.

All these reports concur in the necessity of erecting fire-proof buildings, and the register adds a suggestion for the organization of fire engine companies.

A belief is freely expressed, that the destruction of the treasury building was not accidental; which belief seems strengthened by the facts stated in the preceding papers, though no opinion is expressed on the subject.

The Globe says—We published yesterday the report of the secretary of the treasury to the president, accompanied by the reports of the heads of the respective bureaux. It will doubtless give great satisfaction to the public, to find the intelligence spread abroad by letter writers and others, tending to produce the belief that many of the papers and documents in relation to the accounts of the treasury—vouchers in relation to demands, such as pensions, &c. had been lost, has proved, upon examination, to be utterly unfounded.

It is a remarkable and fortunate circumstance, that all the material papers in relation to accounts settled and unsettled, have been preserved with the exception of those in relation to the contingent fund—and, therefore, that no pecuniary loss of considerable amount can be sustained by the government beyond that consequent on the destruction of the building and furniture.

The papers in relation to the expenditure of the contingent fund were, according to the testimony of Mr. Laub, the superintendent, consumed in the room in which, from the report of the secretaries to the president, it seems the fire originated.

PUBLIC DINNER TO MR. TYLER.

A public entertainment was given to Mr. Tyler, one of the senators of the United States from Virginia, in Gloucester county, Virginia, on the 20th ult. On being toasted, he pronounced an ardent, "state rights" and anti-proclamation speech—as follows:

The toast. Our guest John Tyler: The renewed confidence of his country is the best commentary on his course.

Mr. Tyler expressed his sense of the honor implied in the sentiment just offered. He said that so strong a manifestation of respect and confidence proceeding from any portion of his fellow-citizens, could not fail to be highly appreciated—but, the gratification is greatly increased by the fact that it proceeds from the citizens of my adopted county, among whom I expect to finish my course on earth. No man could devise either a fairer land for his abode or more generous inhabitants for his associates and friends. From the moment that I arrived among you, you extended to me the hand of hospitality and kindness. You soon caused me to forget that I was a stranger, and your conduct upon this occasion furnishes me the assurance that I am not only surrounded by political, but personal friends. I shall use every effort so to acquit myself of my public duties as to merit a continuance of your confidence, and so to live among you as to deserve your respect and friendship.

I cannot resume my seat, gentlemen, without tendering to you my congratulations at the measure of peace and conciliation adopted by congress at almost the last hour of its recent session. No patriot could have regarded the events of the last four months without pain and apprehension. A deep gloom had settled upon our affairs. I frankly confess that I, who am not given to despair, was at times almost led to do so. A state had met the legislation of congress by counter-legislation on her part. She had pronounced the laws laid for the advantage of the northern capitalists unconstitutional and grievously oppressive. She had renounced against them year after year; and her solemn protest was filed amongst the archives of government. If she had stopped with protests and renunciations, she would not have done what had been done by our own state and every southern state. But she went farther. She declared those laws null and void by an ordinance adopted by her people assembled in convention, and absolved all within her limits from their observance, and threw over her citizens the protection of her judiciary. This excited into action the agents of the general government. The legislature of a state had opposed the legislature of the United States, and the resolution seemed to be formed to bring her to the feet of the federal government, by military force. The president had deemed it necessary to issue his proclamation, in effect, denouncing her leaders as traitors, and her people as dupes. He had caused the regular army to be assembled on her soil, and numerous public vessels to swarm upon her coast, and at a later day made a requisition on congress for all the naval and military force of the country. South Carolina, on the contrary, seemed to be resolved to maintain her position. If a proclamation was issued at Washington, she repudiated it from Columbia; and if the trumpet sounded there, her bugle-blast was heard in return breathing a note of bold defiance. I considered the course pursued towards her highly impolitic. I thought I knew the southern man—that he was to be won more by gentleness and conciliation than by threats of violence—that he might be led; but could not be driven. I felt, too, that he was demanding but his rights, and that however impolitic or censurable South Carolina might have been in her course, yet that she demanded nothing but justice—sheer justice. The line of my conduct as the representative of a state that had twice pronounced, in solemn form, the tariff laws to be unconstitutional, was, according to my conception, clearly marked out. To the demand for swords and bayonets and cannon and muskets and aimed men—to collect an unjust and unconstitutional tax, I had but one reply—do justice—repeal or modify your obnoxious laws—yield to the wishes of the whole south—that for South Carolina and the other southern states, which England has refused to do for Ireland—repeal your tithe system, imposed not for the benefit of the parson, but the manufacturer. By a great and noble act of retribution, set a proud example to the governments of the earth, and demonstrate that temperance, forbearance and justice, are the ministers of free government. But those considerations seemed to have no effect, and the gloom grew more and more dense. Our friends had hoped much from the action of the house of representatives.

To one gentleman of that house, Mr. Verplanck of New York, the country owes much for the zeal and ability with which he pressed the bill from the committee of ways and means. He is no longer in congress and I regret it—left out probably because he has dared upon some occasion to differ from his party. He had an able coadjutor in my friend Mr. Wilde from Georgia, but zeal, however great, industry however untiring, could do nothing, and hope seemed almost to have fled. The raven cry of force—force alone was heard—force against our brethren, the descendants of those gallant men who had stood by our fathers in many a well fought field—force against those very men who had assisted in bearing aloft the flag of the country on the ocean and on the land—force to wrest a state and thereby to obliterate one of the stars of the confederacy, these things would have been accomplished. The war cry was in the breeze, and an unjust, and unconstitutional, and oppressive system was to be cemented and strengthened by the blood of freemen and the destruction of a state. But, gentlemen, the darkest hour of the night is said to be that which precedes the dawn of day. The day did come, and we may flatter ourselves that its light has scattered the clouds which so angrily threatened us. Of the principal agent in the accomplishment of this work of peace, I shall say nothing. Those who are disposed to interrupt the general rejoicing by discordant notes of censure and condemnation for the past, remind me of old Hook whose cattle had been impressed to supply the American army during the siege of York, and who, amid the universal joy attendant upon the surrender of Cornwallis, was represented by Mr. Henry as crying out through the camp and along the highways—beef!—beef!

While, however, we have escaped, as we may fondly hope, the danger of civil war, I should but deceive you if I did not express my deliberate conviction, that doctrines have been advanced and maintained, destined to bring our institutions into extreme danger. The moment was doubtless esteemed to be propitious for their advancement. Nullification it was seen stood in bad odour with the public, and consolidation, profiting by the panic, erected boldly its sceptre, trusting to rivet itself upon the affections of the people, through the unpopularity of nullification. Time is not allowed me to do more than invite your attention to one of these doctrines, advanced from a high quarter and openly maintained in debate—that doctrine which claims for the federal government the exclusive allegiance of the citizen—a doctrine which embraces every question heretofore held in dispute between the parties of this country, and if successfully maintained overthrowing all that has ever been contended for by the great republican party. We are brought to the feet of our opponents, and nothing worth contending for remains. If this doctrine is to prevail, as the settled political doctrine, I ask any man to tell me where is to be found any state right remaining. A state without citizens but as mere quasi citizens, and they owing it no allegiance! Why, gentlemen, can we be blind to the bold and reckless character of this assertion? Can we be ignorant of its necessary results? Can any sovereignty exist in a state whose inhabitants owe it no allegiance? Where is to be found its moral or physical power? When liberty is invaded, upon whom shall it call to defend it? Take any case, however oppressive. Suppose that a majority of congress decrees emancipation of your slaves—a majority of the people through their legislature resist this infraction of their rights by legislation, or with swords in their hands, while the minority takes sides with congress, that majority would be held to be traitors, while that minority would be applauded for holding fast to their allegiance. You who should rally to the banner of Virginia would be hunted as rebels, and the hangman would be your executioner. You are claimed as the citizens of a certain undefined and undefinable community, called the United States, which are construed into words of cabalistical influence under the present constitution, although when found in the old articles of confederation, possessed of the same import and applicable to the same subject, they are admitted to have no meaning at all. No escape from tyranny is left us, for the act of resistance is treason, and the effort to secede or withdraw from a political association, which threatens to rivet upon us and our posterity the chains of despotism, is rebellion to be put down by force of arms. What then remains to the states of this union of all their sovereignty? I will tell you—the right to petition, to supplicate, and on bended knees to ask for mercy. The privilege of the slave under the lash of his task master—this is all that remains. No logical mind will deny but that those are the consequences of this pernicious doctrine. The equal to this was never advanced in the highest and most palmy days of federalism.

The alien and sedition laws are universally held as odious, and yet what were they in comparison with this? Some four or five citizens were imprisoned, lawlessly and unconstitutionally imprisoned, under a perversion of a single clause in the constitution—but this fell doctrine changes the whole instrument—alters its entire character, and turns to scorn the resolutions of this state, adopted in 1798-'99—threatens absolute consolidation and employs the whole naval and military force of the country to accomplish it. Instead of a federal government formed out of 24 states and resting on compact, you have a single nation—a central government, exercising unlimited sway, and mere provincial departments holding their rights and exercising their powers but at the pleasure of that central government. The name of our beloved and honored state, if not stricken from the map, is permitted to remain to tell what Virginia once was, and in perfect mockery of her former high pretensions.

This doctrine of exclusive allegiance is but the result of that other doctrine which has been contended for so strenuously by a certain party in this country from the day that the federal government was put in motion, viz: That the constitution was not the result of compact among the states as separate communities and independent sovereignties, but was the work of the people. If it was the work of the people acting as one whole, then it was obvious that that whole, that entire mass was the sole sovereign, and of course had exclusive title to the allegiance of each and every individual within the broad limits of the union. This theory of the constitution was met and overthrown—all history gave it a flat contradiction. Its errors were too obvious to be imposed upon a thinking community. It rested principally on three or four words in the constitution "we the people of the United States" as if these could mean aught else, than "we the people of the states united;" the great struggle and true intent from the first was to re-establish this claim of exclusive allegiance; for it was obvious that the moment that concession was made, the context was at an end, and this glorious federal union created by the states for their mutual defence and protection, would annihilate its very creators, and hold them but as mere dependencies. The argument is now somewhat varied, but is still intrinsically the same—allegiance is now made to refer itself to protection without regard to the head spring, the state, from which that protection has flowed; and we are asked if the general government does not furnish us protection. The answer is plain and obvious. It does furnish us a guarantee of protection against foreign nations—it accomplishes certain great objects necessary for the peace and happiness of all—it provides for the common defence and general welfare of all the states, and while fulfilling the trusts confided to it, addresses itself to our affections and prepares one and all of us, if needs be, to pour out our last drop of blood for the union. But what then? Does it follow that because an agency is created for wise and beneficent purposes, that the agent must be converted into the master? If the government was created by the states, is it not their creature? and would any man be so reckless of his reputation for ordinary sagacity, to say that allegiance was due to any other than the sovereign creator. Each state has its agents to execute its will, but who ever dreamed, but the man whose idol was the diadem and the sceptre, that those agents were sovereign, and that allegiance was due them. Take the case of your judges—they afford protection and security to your persons and property. They spread over you the mild and benign influence of the law—if you are unlawfully imprisoned they set you at liberty by the writ of habeas corpus. But does this make the judge your sovereign and is your allegiance due to him. This reasoning applies from the president down to the humblest officer in public employment, embraces the army and the navy, all nothing more than the creatures of the United States—created by them, and existing but at their will and pleasure. A sovereign may direct the means of accomplishing its own wise designs. If it is so feeble as to run the hazard of being crushed by foreign enemies, it may unite with its neighbors for purposes of general defence. If it apprehends collision with its neighbors and bloody war, it may after its own manner unite with them. By compact with them, appoint one agent or more—employ any machine it may deem proper, whether such machine be an organized government, such as the federal government, or any other. It may confer greater or less power on the agency so created at its pleasure—but still its sovereignty remains unimpaired, and the allegiance of its citizens continues as before.

Are you prepared then to oppose those destructive theories—to contend for the rights of the states no matter by whom assailed? Are you attached to our federal system, or will you quietly permit doctrines to attain the mastery which will and must terminate in a mere majority and consolidated government? Will you still have the 24 stars, and 13 stripes to wave over you, and under its broad folds, brave the battle and the breeze, or will you agree for an instant that that glorious emblem of liberty shall be lowered in the dust, and a new flag wave forth having those stars obliterated and those stripes effaced.

To resist oppression is the natural right of man. Oppression comes from government—it forges shackles and fastens them on the limbs. I am more jealous of a government possessing the purse and the sword, than I am of the governed. When I am told of the dangers of nullification by a state, with a view to recommend consolidation to my adoption, my answer is, "let government be just, and nullification has no food on which to exist." Injustice alone begets resistance—and that is not all—in order to arouse a whole community to resistance, the sense of oppression must be great under which they labor. Virginia thrice declared the tariff for protection unconstitutional, unequal and unjust, and yet she preferred peace to resistance. She saw or thought she saw the substance of her people daily taken to enrich a favored class and yet she did not resist. Injustice on the part of government drove South Carolina to resistance, and who can answer for its consequences even upon Virginia, if another year had passed without an adjustment of the tariff question? I am not the apologist of South Carolina—my opinion of her course has been expressed elsewhere, and remains unchanged; but there is to me no terms in a state veto, when compared to the gloomy despotism of a government without check or limitation on its powers, spread over such a country as this.

The veto when exerted by the simple man (the president) has met with our loudest applause. When by his sic volo, he arrested the Maysville road bill—when by a similar veto he prostrated the bank of the United States, many found in these proceedings new reasons for continued support; but the veto by the people of a state, because it may chance, in our judgment, to have been rash, precipitate and ill-judged, is to drive us into consolidation and ultimately into monarchy, for unless these pernicious doctrines are arrested, such is to be the end of that system which has made us a happy and united people for the last fifty years, and has excited the wonder and admiration of the world. My resolution is taken—others may go after new gods, and fall down and worship them, but for myself I will worship the God of my fathers and live and die in their faith.

Mr. Tyler concluded by offering the following sentiment:
 "Virginia, the blessed mother of us all." He who denies her his allegiance, and shall refuse to come to her rescue, in the hour of her peril and her danger, is unworthy to be called her son."

The following were among the regular toasts.

The union of the states: Voluntary, the palladium of our liberty—Forcible, the rod of despotism.

George Washington the first: The second has not yet appeared.

Gov. Floyd, and Mr. Tazewell had been invited, but could not attend. They were each toasted, and each sent a toast—as follows:

By gov. Floyd—State sovereignty—Indivisible in itself, and indestructible in the hands of brave men.

By Mr. Tazewell—The independent legislator, who pursues the course dictated by his own judgment, although he pursues it alone.

We add some of the volunteers—

By the president—The voter in the minority in the senate of the United States on the bill to enforce the collection of customs: To such men we owe the foundation of our liberties—to such alone must we look for their perpetuity.

By the vice president—The revolution of 1801. Heaven send us another such, and that speedily.

By A. W. Robbins—Henry Clay and the tariff of 1833.

By C. S. Morris—Andrew Jackson: "And he shall stir up his power and his courage against the south, with a great army; and the south shall be stirred up to battle with a very great and mighty army. But he shall not stand, for they will forecast devices against him."—Daniel xi. 25.

By A. B. Davis—The president's unprecedented and unprovoked proclamation: "Quene ad finem sese effrenata jactabit audacia."

By Thomas Smith—Nullification: Whenever it shall die, let this be its epitaph: "Here lies the murderer of the American System."

By M. W. Kemp—South Carolina: Right in principle, though possibly wrong in policy.

By J. L. Deans—The Richmond Enquirer: It has proved "a curse upon the country."

By A. L. Byrd—South Carolina: But for the bold and fearless course which she has by her late ordinance pursued, the odious tariff of 1832 would have been fixed on our posterity.

By T. M. Seavell—Nullification: The rightful, and, as it has proved to be, the efficient remedy.

By W. H. Roy—Before offering another toast, permit me to remark, that while we rejoice around this festive board, in the sunshine of peace and restored harmony, and offer our heartfelt acknowledgments to those firm and patriotic spirits who gallantly breasted the storm, and proved themselves friends to liberty and defenders of the constitution, there still remains an individual, whose late course deserves the notice of this company—and that my object may be distinctly understood, and my motives fully appreciated, I will remark, that however political differences may have heretofore separated us; however deep and broad the lines may in future be drawn, or whatever course it may be our several pleasures to pursue, I feel confident that there is not one present at this board who will not cordially unite with me, in a tribute of respect, an offering of gratitude, to the man whose powerful genius, and mighty influence, have been twice successfully exerted, to save us from the horrors of disunion and civil war. I will propose—the health of the son of Virginia, the adopted son of Kentucky—Henry Clay.

CASE OF GEORGE GRANSTEIN.

JUDGE BAY'S REPORT.

Court of sessions and common pleas, October term, 1832.

Ex parte

Geo. Granstein. } Upon a petition for citizenship.

On the 7th October last, the petitioner presented his petition, during the sitting of the court, to be admitted to the right of citizenship; and the same being taken into consideration, he appeared to be entitled to that privilege, and was ordered to be admitted, on his taking the usual oath of allegiance to the state of South Carolina, and of fidelity to the United States.

Upon the clerk's tendering the oath to the petitioner, his counsel, Mr. King, objected to his taking that part of the oath which related to his allegiance to the state of South Carolina, but was willing to take that part which related to the United States. Whereupon I refused to admit him as a citizen, unless he took the usual and customary oath of allegiance to the state of South Carolina, as well as that of fidelity to the United States.

The grounds upon which I refused to admit him, were briefly the following:

First—That South Carolina was a sovereign and independent state, and had an unquestionable right to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which she would admit aliens to the rights and privileges of citizenship, from the day she assumed her sovereignty to the present time, by the law of nations, and the rights of all civilized states.

Secondly—That she had uniformly exercised this right and power, from the earliest period of her independence, [even before the independence of the United States was declared]; for in the constitution of 1776, the form of the oath is prescribed and directed.

And in the constitution of 19th March, 1778, the same form was laid down and directed, after the independence of the United States was declared.

Also, in the act of March, 1786, to confer the right of citizenship, the oath is prescribed to be administered to aliens on being admitted.

Thirdly—Because it was one of the highest prerogatives of the state, and the longest in use. I could not therefore permit it to be called in question; and dismissed the petition

His honor judge Bay will please take notice, that the petitioner appeals from the decision in the case. Because having tendered to comply with all the conditions required by the act of congress, he was entitled to be admitted a citizen of the United States of America.

OPINION.

Ex parte

Geo. Granstein, } O'Neale, J.

The 4th paragraph of the 8th section, art. 1. of the constitution of the United States provides that congress shall have the power "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States." In 1802, congress passed "an act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject," which, amongst other conditions to the admission of an alien to the rights of citizenship, prescribes "that he shall at the time of his application to be admitted, declare on oath, before some of the courts aforesaid, that he will support the constitution of the United States, and that he doth absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign prince, potentate, state or sovereignty whatever, and particularly by name, the prince, state or sovereignty whereof he was before a citizen or subject."—2nd laws of the United States, by Story, 830.

The petitioner who had complied with all the other requisites of the act of congress, offered at the time of his application to be admitted, to make the declaration on oath, required by it; but the presiding judge thought he must also take an oath of allegiance to the state. This he declined to do, and his application was on that account dismissed. The question now is, whether the presiding judge had a right to administer an additional oath to the petitioner.

In passing upon this question, it may be useful to premise that we have nothing to do with the consequences of the oath required by the act of congress. We are only to declare what the law is, not the obligation which the oath imposes. It is perhaps, due however to the occasion to say, that I entertain no doubt, that an alien when admitted to be a citizen, acquires all the rights, (except that of being elected president), and incurs all the obligations of a native citizen.

He owes precisely the same allegiance, and must in the same manner discharge the duties consequent upon nativity and residence, to the state or the United States.

The power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization is in the express words of the constitution of the United States, granted to congress: and the act of congress of 1802, was passed in pursuance of that power. The oath prescribed by it was the only one which could be required to be taken as a prerequisite to the admission of the petitioner, so far as the legislation of congress affects this question.

Is there any law of the state which required any other additional oath to be administered? It is perfectly clear on examining our statute book, that there is none.

The orders referred to by the judge below, were the oaths of office prescribed by the old constitutions, and not of citizenship. These were superseded by the oath of office of our new constitution. The act of 1784 (P. L. 339, 340), was repealed by the act of 1786 (P. L. 412), which is an act not to naturalize, but to confer on aliens some of the rights of citizens; its provisions are substantially enactments granting the rights and privileges of citizenship to aliens. The act of 1788 (P. L. 443) merely provides means whereby it might be ascertained, and a record preserved of such aliens as had been naturalized before the adoption of the federal constitution.

The act of 1799, (2nd Faust 273) grants the rights and privileges of citizenship to aliens, upon taking and subscribing an oath or affirmation of "allegiance." The act of 1807 (acts 59, 60) is in direct affirmation of the act of congress, as having established the only rule of naturalization recognized or required by this state. For the provision of the act provides "that every alien previously to his or her being entitled to avail him or herself of any of the benefits of this act, shall declare his or her intention to become a citizen of the United States, agreeably to the act of congress in such case made and provided."

From this review of the legislation of the state, it is most manifest that there is no law of the state, which requires that an alien upon being admitted a citizen, should take an oath of allegiance to the state.

From the adoption of the federal constitution, South Carolina true to her principles of fidelity to it, has never attempted to interfere with the naturalization of aliens.

The oath prescribed by the act of congress, is the only one which any law requires to be taken by an alien on becoming a citizen. The motion to reverse the decision of the judge below is therefore granted.

MR. CALHOUN'S LETTER.

The citizens of Edgefield village having invited Mr. Calhoun to a public dinner, the following is his reply declining the invitation.

From the Edgefield Carolinian.

Fort Hill, March 27th, 1833.

GENTLEMEN—I have been honored by your note of the 18th inst., inviting me, in the behalf of my friends in the vicinity of Edgefield, to partake of a public dinner to be given at such time as would suit my convenience.

In declining to accept this testimony of the approval of my public conduct, in the trying scenes through which I have so lately passed, I am governed by the course, to which I have adhered throughout the arduous and noble struggle, which this state has maintained in the cause of liberty and the constitution for so many years, and not from any indifference to the honor intended, nor want of respect for those, who have tendered it, in a manner so kind, and with an approbation so warm and flattering, as to command my most profound gratitude.

Foreseeing from the commencement of this controversy, that the part, which a sense of duty compelled me to take, would, from the position I occupied, expose the state, as well as myself, to the imputation of false and unworthy motives, and thereby tend to weaken the sacred cause, for which she contended, I deemed it my duty, in order to obviate, as far as practicable, such effect, to decline accepting all such testimonials of the public approval of my course, as has been offered me. This originating in a sense of duty, has been in strict accordance with my feelings. Having no personal object in view, I have looked singly to an honest and faithful discharge of what I believe to be my duty, regardless of the effects on my future prospects, or even on the standing I may have acquired by past services with a large portion of my fellow citizens, with whom it has and still continues to be my misfortune to differ, in reference to the public interest, at this important crisis. The reason, which has heretofore governed my conduct, must still continue to influence me. The struggle to preserve the liberty and constitution of the country, and to arrest the corrupt and dangerous tendency of the government, so far from being over, is not more than fairly commenced. In making this assertion, I do not intend to say, that we have not gained already an important advantage. Commencing the contest, as the state did alone and under so many disadvantages—against a system apparently so immovably established and sustained by so large a majority, and so powerful an interest; opposed and denounced both by the administration and the opposition—to come off not only without defeat, but with decided success, is indeed a triumph. In spite of all these difficulties, we have upheld and successfully asserted our doctrines, and proved by actual experience, that the rejected and reviled right of nullification is not, as its opponents asserted, revolution or disunion, but is that high, peaceable and efficient remedy; that great conservative principle of the system, which we claim it to be, and as it has proved, and that, too, after all the usual remedies had failed, and when without it none other remained, but secession, the last resort of an oppressed state, but which, like some powerful but dangerous medicine, cannot be prescribed, till the disease has become more dangerous, than the remedy, and when the life of the patient with or without it, is almost despaired of. Nor let any one suppose, that I have stated the facts too strongly, in saying, that we have successfully asserted our doctrines. To these assertions must be attributed, the recent adjustment of the tariff, which, whatever objections there may be to some of the details, there can be no division of opinion on the point, that the principle for which the state contended, that the duties ought to be imposed for revenue, and that no more ought to be raised, than the economical wants of the government may demand, is openly and explicitly acknowledged by the government. Time, it is true, has been liberally allowed for the gradual termination of the system, in order to avoid the shock and losses to individuals, which necessarily follow all sudden transitions, even from an erroneous to a correct principle of legislation; but, I feel, I hazard little in asserting, that the system will expire, at the appointed time, never more to be revived. For this great result, you owe little to me, or any other individual. It is the work of the state,—the truth of the doctrines for which she contended, and the firm and heroic zeal, with which she has been sustained by her sons, in asserting them; and by none more so, than those of Edgefield, a district, which has distinguished itself among the foremost for its union and promptitude in this great contest. It is, I repeat, to the noble resolve of her sons, to prefer the constitution and liberty to life itself, to which, under Providence, we are to attribute this success of our righteous cause.

But, let us not deceive ourselves, by supposing that the danger is past. We have but checked the disease. If one evil has been remedied, another has succeeded—the force act in the place of the protective system—a measure, striking directly at the fundamental principle of the constitution and deliberately passed to place on the statute book, and thereby to give legal sanction to a theory of the constitution, utterly hostile to that entertained by us, and, I may add, almost the entire south. I rest not this assertion on inference. What I state, was openly avowed in debate, and among others by his leading advocate, the distinguished senator from Massachusetts, who conceded that if the theory be true, that the constitution is a compact, formed by the people of the several states, as distinct sovereign communities, and is binding between them as such, then would the bill be, as we have asserted it to be, directly opposed to the fundamental principles of the constitution, and utterly subversive of that instrument; and that the bill could be vindicated only on the opposite view, which he maintained, and on which he advocated its passage—the view, which regarded the people of these states, as forming one nation, and the government as possessing the exclusive right of interpreting, in the last resort, its own powers; and thus practically substituting for the constitution the will of the majority, with the right of assuming at discretion, whatever powers it might think proper, and to enforce their exercise, however oppressive and unconstitutional, at the point of the bayonet, or even with the noose of a halter. Such now is our constitution as attempted to be established by an existing law of the land; and such will be the constitution in fact, should this odious act not be resisted, till it be erased from the statute book. If it be not resisted—if by our acquiescence, the principles, on which it rests, be practically established, then will there be an end to our constitutional and limited government, and, with it, to liberty and the constitution, for to expect to preserve either, under such a government, would be one of the vainest thoughts, that ever entered into the imagination of man.

The theory of our constitution, which is thus attempted to be established by law—a theory, which denies, that the constitution is a compact, between the states, and which traces all its powers to a majority of the American people, or, in other words, which denies the federal character of the government, and asserts that it is a consolidated system, is of recent origin, avowed for the first time, but three years since, and first officially proclaimed and asserted, within the last few months. There was a party, it is said, in the convention, which framed the constitution, in favor of consolidation; but it is a fact perfectly established by the journals of its proceedings, that they were defeated in that design; and from the dissolution of that body, till the time stated, all parties, the federal, as well as the republican, professed, at least, to believe, that ours was a federal system of government, to use the language of Fisher Ames, one of the most zealous and distinguished of the former party, "a republic of states, arrayed in a federal union." The dangerous heresy, of which the odious force bill is the first fruit, after having been thus suppressed in the convention, was revived, under the belief that it was the certain and effectual means of fixing on the country forever the unequal, unjust and unconstitutional system which so long oppressed the staple states, and is now placed among the acts of the government for future use; like fetters forged and fitted to the limbs of the states, and hung up to be used, as occasion may hereafter require. If it be permitted to remain there quietly, the time will come, when it will be certainly employed for the use intended; and we may rest assured that an army of fifty thousand bayonets, encamped in the midst of the staple states, would not half so certainly subject them to the will of a lawless, unchecked and unrestrained majority, who would not fail to wage a war under the color of legislation on their property and prosperity, more oppressive and more degrading, than would be a tribute exacted by actual force.

But as formidable, as would be this measure, if acquiesced in, it may be easily overthrown, if promptly and spiritedly opposed, which I may add, would do more to restore the constitution and reform the government, than any other conceivable event. I found my belief, as to the facility, with which it may be overthrown, if properly opposed, on the character of the measure itself, its palpable unconstitutionality, in many particulars; its dangerous tendency; its novelty; the daring assumptions on one side and denial of facts on the other as necessary to sustain it; the absence of any direct and powerful pecuniary interest, (as in the protective system), to support it; but above all, on the deep conviction, which the weaker portion of the union must shortly feel, if it does not already, of a concert of sentiment and action, not only to arrest the measures in question, but to guard against a recurrence of similar danger.

Another, and an important advantage, in this contest, will also result from the character of the measure. It will effectually separate the real, from the pretended friends of state rights—a class that has done the cause of constitutional liberty more injury, than the most open and bitter opponents. To advocate, or support the measure, is to be a consolidationist in the strongest and most odious sense, by whatever profession accompanied, and of course all who advocate and support it, will forfeit all claims to be ranked among the friends of state rights.

Looking to the effects, which must follow its overthrow, we shall find much to animate us in the contest. The point at issue is not, whether this or that particular policy of the general government be right or wrong, but whether the general government be a consolidated government, of unrestricted powers, or a federal republic of states, with limited powers—an issue for the first time presented, and on the decision of which depends the liberty and the constitution of the country; and, I may add, the very existence of the southern states. Let us not forget in this great contest, that we are acting, in maintaining the rights of the states, in our appropriate sphere of political duties, and that the due performance is not only essential to our security, but to the preservation of our system of government.

On maintaining the balance between the delegated and reserved powers, as established in the constitution, the success and duration of our novel and complex, but beautiful and perfect system of government, obviously depends. Experience has now shown, where the pressure and benefit of that unequal monied action, which necessarily results from the fiscal operations of all governments, in a greater or less degree, falls. We now know, that the pressure must be ours, as the weaker party, at least in the present condition of the country. To those who profit by this unequal monied action, may be safely confided the defence of the delegated powers: and the passage of the force bill, as well as the history of the last sixteen years, clearly demonstrates that there will be no lack of zeal, on their part, in the discharge of that duty. To us belongs the defence of the reserved powers; and if we but perform that high duty with the same zeal, on our part, the balance will be preserved, and the system be safe. In this conflict, between the two powers, the patronage of the general government will necessarily be on the side of the stronger party, who will be in authority; and let us constantly bear in mind, that this great advantage cannot be counterbalanced, but by maintaining, in full force and authority the reserved powers and the sovereignty of the states. Nor let us forget, that if the general government and the delegated authority represent our power and majesty, that the sovereignty of the states and the reserved powers constitute the citadel of our liberty.

In this action and re-action of our system, between the two, let us not repine at the part allotted us. If it has its disadvantages, it has also its advantages. What we lose, in a monied point of view, will be more than compensated in a moral and political point of view, if we but properly discharge our duty to our country and ourselves. To restrict the general government to its proper sphere; to guard against the approaches of corruption; and to correct that tendency to despotic rule, so natural to governments of every description; these are the high duties assigned to us, to perform which, the highest qualities, intellectual and moral, are required; but which, if faithfully performed, will certainly be followed by their acquisition—an acquisition in whatever light regarded worth more than the wealth of the world. With great respect, I am, &c. J. C. CALHOUN.

MILITARY CELEBRATION IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

From the Charleston Mercury, April 3.

Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, on Monday, the volunteers turned out in force and with great spirit, and made a splendid appearance. The troops consisting of colonel Yeadow's regiment of artillery, and captain Wilson's corps of heavy artillery, the Charleston riflemen, the cadet riflemen, Irish volunteers, Sumter guards, French volunteers, Scotch volunteers, Washington volunteers and Independent greens, were formed under the command of brigadier general Hamilton, in Meeting street, the right resting on Queen street, and the left on St. Michael's alley. They were reviewed by the governor at 12 o'clock, and after also passing in review on the line of march, moved in column up to the citadel, the extensive galleries of which were thronged with a glorious array of ladies, who regardless of the rain which continued with little intermission throughout the day, had early assembled to greet with their smiles those who had manifested such honorable promptness to defend them.

The troops were received at the citadel gate by captain Parker's citadel guard, and salutes being exchanged, they filed into the area and formed in solid column. The governor and suite then presented themselves on the balcony fronting the troops, and the governor addressed the volunteers in a short and feeling address, and after thanking them warily in the name of South Carolina, concluded by presenting in her behalf a splendid standard which he delivered to general Hamilton. General Hamilton expressed the thanks of the troops, paid a warm and richly merited tribute to the conduct of governor Hayne throughout the recent crisis, and after a brief address to his fellow soldiers, committed the flag to the hands of lieutenant Frost of the riflemen, who received it at the head of a color guard. Lieutenant Frost in a few eloquent remarks, pledged the volunteers to maintain the honor of the flag in every event. The speakers were frequently responded to by the hearty cheers of the assembly.

The flag, painted by Mr. Oliphant, is beautifully executed, on a ground of rich green silk, bordered with a deep fringe of white, and the staff surmounted by a golden crescent. On one side are represented the arms of the state (with the mottoes) supported by an armed volunteer, with the word "VOLUNTEERS" in gilt letters above. On the reverse is a beautiful palmetto tree, at the foot of which is a rattle-snake in its warning coil, with the significant motto, "Noli me tangere." Sheltered by the branches of the palmetto are the inscriptions "THE CONSTITUTION" and "THE UNION," and over all, as a crest to the palmetto, and supported by it, inscribed in letters of gold, "LIBERTY—IT MUST BE PRESERVED." Though remarkable for the utmost simplicity of design, the tout ensemble of the flag is singularly rich and beautiful, and when the governor unfurled it, at the conclusion of his address, and displayed its glorious folds to the gaze of the assembled multitude, the shout of enthusiasm which rent the air to give it welcome, testified to the admiration with which it was beheld, and gave hearty assurance that its honor will ever be untarnished in the hands of the volunteers of Charleston.

After the ceremony of the presentation, the troops were dismissed to partake of the refreshments which had been amply provided for them by their officers, in the spacious hall beneath the arsenal. The line was afterwards formed, and a salute of 124 guns being fired by the artillery, the column marched down to Broad street, and the troops were dismissed at about four o'clock in the afternoon.

On the whole, notwithstanding "the melting mood" of the atmosphere, the effect of this most gratifying exhibition, was highly imposing and splendid. All the uniform volunteer corps turned out in their strength, and displayed the most praiseworthy discipline.

We observed that a morning paper, greatly underrating the actual number of men under arms, has indulged in some pointless sneers because they did not amount to "thousands." It is important whether the writer of that senseless article knew the fact or not, that the order for the review embraced only that portion of the city volunteers, who had been formed into uniform companies, amounting in all to about 500 men. All that portion of the volunteers in the beat companies, who have not uniformed themselves, were not ordered out. We will state, however, for the information of our union friends, that the number of volunteers in the city, reported to the brigadier general after a careful estimate, amounts to upwards of thirteen hundred, a very good number when we consider that the union party of Charleston, unlike their patriotic political associates in several of the country districts, had almost without an exception held back in the trying hour, and refused to proffer their services to South Carolina. Taking these things into consideration, nothing but blind prejudice or wilful falsehood, can deny that the parade of Monday, was such as to gratify the pride of every Carolinian, as well for the numbers, as for the military bearing and admirable performance of the soldiers. The "paternal" state of the elements was not without its good effect, for though it was sufficient, as the union papers tell us, to cool the ardour of less patriotic men, it had no other influence upon the Charleston boys, than to indicate their fine spirit. Perfect satisfaction and undiminished cheerfulness, pervaded all ranks—and the inconveniences of the day were either altogether forgotten in its pleasures, or only served for matter of good humored amusement. The union press is mistaken in supposing as they do, that the spirit of the nullifiers would be damped by a repetition of such duty. We believe that without exception, they would like to go through many similar campaigns. We believe they can stand water, as we are sure they can stand fire. The whole affair went off admirably, and will long be remembered with pride and pleasure by the volunteers.

From the Charleston Mercury, April 4.

Presentation of the standard.—We have the pleasure of laying before our readers the addresses of gov. Hayne and gen. Hamilton, on the presenting of the flag to the volunteers, on Monday. We regret that we cannot accompany them by the speech of lieutenant Frost, for which we applied, but that gentleman declined publishing it.

ADDRESS OF GOVERNOR HAYNE.

On presenting the standard to the volunteers.

Fellow citizens.—It is impossible for me to express the satisfaction I have derived, from seeing this day the volunteers of Charleston—all well armed—well disciplined—and in the language of our glorious motto, "prepared with strength and courage." Who is there that can survey this proud scene, and not feel that the sure defence of free states is to be found in the courage and patriotism of their people? Where are the myrmidons of power, who could hope to prevail against the strong arms and stout hearts of freemen,—animated by a noble enthusiasm in the cause of liberty,—and inspired by a holy zeal in defence of their altars and their firesides.

Arrived fellow-citizens at a most interesting crisis in our political affairs, it may be well for us to take a brief retrospect.—But a few months have passed away, since South Carolina was environed by difficulties, and beset by dangers. Having taken a noble stand in defence of the rights and liberties of us all, instead of receiving sympathy and support from those whose interests are identified with her own, she was (with a few honorable exceptions) coldly abandoned to the tender mercies of the federal government,—backed by our army and navy heretofore sustained by the voice and supported by the treasury of the south, and now for the first time in our history used as an instrument of despotism, and directed to wield their arms not against the enemies of their country abroad, but against the bosoms of their own brethren.

Threats of military and civil vengeance, were loud and deep, and to add still darker shades to the picture—the impression had been created,—I would fain hope without sufficient foundation, that the first blow struck by the federal arm, was to be signal of a desolating civil war. In this condition of things—infinity more appalling to the heart of the patriot, than the bloodiest foreign war; and as well calculated, I must think, to try the souls of men, as the darkest scenes of the revolution, did South Carolina quit? Did she "humble herself in dust and ashes," as it was predicted that she would, before the proud oppressor? Did she yield obedience to the haughty mandate which commanded her to "tear from her archives?" her solemn decrees? on no! Thanks be to God! the spirit of liberty was not yet extinct in the bosoms of the sons or daughters of Carolina. They had not forgotten the lessons taught by a glorious ancestry, that liberty and life, are inseparable in the bosoms of the brave and the free. A few of the venerable relics of the revolution still lingered amongst us, in whom the spirit of '76 not merely survived, but was seen burning brighter and brighter to the last. Unsubdued by difficulties, unappalled by dangers,—the people of South Carolina taking counsel to their own brave hearts, and consulting the interests, and the honor of the state met the crisis like freemen; and Carolina, instead of crouching at the footstool of the oppressor, rose in her native majesty, and like our own eagle, "towering in his pride of flight," bid defiance to the tyrant's power. With a promptitude, unanimity and zeal, which if ever equalled, has surely never been surpassed, the people of South Carolina, at the first trumpet call, flew to her standard and voluntarily devoted their lives and fortunes to her defence. There is something in an honest, manly and unflinching adherence to principle, and a fearless performance of duty, which commands the respect of mankind, and all experience has proved that the best way to avoid danger is to be prepared to meet it. Fellow soldiers—you and your brave compatriots in arms, the volunteers of Carolina, and I make this declaration from a deep conviction of its truth, have saved the state, and are entitled to the honors of a civic triumph.

If we have not been involved in all the horrors of civil war—if our streets have not been deluged with blood—our dwellings wrapt in flames, and our fields devastated, if instead of mourning over the desolation and ruin which follow in the train of invading armies, and are the bitter fruit of civil strife, you are now permitted to rejoice with honest exultation at the new and improved condition of our affairs, and the cheering prospect before us—we are indebted under heaven for all this to the undaunted spirit of our people, to our twenty thousand patriotic volunteers, who have held themselves in constant readiness to repel invasion, and were known to be prepared to lay down their lives in defence of the sacred soil of Carolina.

Whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the precise character of the new tariff, great indeed has been the gain—inestimable the advantages purchased, as we believe chiefly by your virtue, firmness and patriotism. Is it nothing fellow citizens, for a single state to have stood up unaided and alone in defence of her rights against the colossal power and patronage of the federal government? Nothing to have roused the attention of the whole union, before it was too late, to those great fundamental truths, on the final establishment of which must depend the preservation of the constitution and the union? Is it nothing to have arrested the progress of the misnamed American System, that vile scheme of robbery and plunder, by which, under the color of law, the proceeds of your labor and capital are transferred to others, and to prevent it from becoming the settled policy of the country? Is it nothing to have obtained a distinct recognition of the principle—aye, and to have it recorded in the statute book—that the duties shall be eventually reduced to the revenue standard, and that no more money shall be raised than may be necessary to the economical administration of the government—thereby destroying at one blow the prohibition, minimums, specific duties, and other fraudulent devices, constituting the very life blood of the protective system? And finally is it nothing that by the promised reduction of the duties, a fatal blow will be given to those extravagant and unauthorised appropriations of the public money by which one portion of the people are robbed that others may be corrupted? It is impossible for any one not to see, that these are great and valuable achievements, and if there be any by whom they will be more highly esteemed from denying to Carolina any agency in producing them, BE IT SO. We feel conscious that we have done our duty honestly and fearlessly—we have stood by our country in the hour of her trial; we have adhered to Carolina through good report and evil report—and for the rest, we know that posterity will do us justice. We have fought the good fight—God has given us the victory—we will not quarrel about the distribution of the honors, and if our country is permitted to enjoy its fruits, let who will take the spoils.

I am now fellow citizens about to perform a most grateful office. I am about to confer upon you as the chief magistrate of this state the most distinguished token of public approbation, which it is in my power to bestow. The state has through the convention declared her sovereign will, that in the present aspect of our political affairs, the existing organization of the volunteers shall be maintained, and I have this day issued orders to that effect, which will be read at the head of your respective companies. Congress has committed another bold, and daring usurpation on the rights of the states, by the passage of an act commonly called the force bill. While that act shall remain unrepelled upon the statute book, and the principles it embodies and sanctioned by those who are entrusted with the administration of our national affairs, there can be no safety for the rights of the states, but in being constantly prepared to defend them "at any and every hazard." We trust that public opinion will, ere long seal the fate of that bill, and that it will perish amidst the universal execrations of the people. But while the principles are abroad against which we are struggling let me tell you, that we hold all our rights by no other tenure than that "eternal vigilance" without which we are told liberty cannot be saved.

Influenced by these views, as an honorable reward for past services—and incentive to future exertion, I now present to the volunteers of Charleston, through your commander, brigadier general Hamilton, this standard bearing the arms of the state, with this solemn injunction, that as citizens and soldiers you will always cherish in your hearts, and exemplify in your lives, the noble sentiment which is emblazoned upon its folds, "LIBERTY, IT MUST BE PRESERVED."

GENERAL HAMILTON'S REPLY.

Gen. Hamilton on receiving the standard replied as follows:—"On the part of the volunteers of Charleston, I accept with sentiments of profound gratitude, and with feelings of the most lively satisfaction, the proud and gorgeous standard which your excellency has been pleased to present to us in the name and behalf of the state of South Carolina. To have received at your hands, this soul stirring banner, infinitely enhances its value.

"Who so fit sir, as yourself to present to us this donation? You, who in the dark hour of a starless night, when South Carolina seemed deserted by the whole world, rent in twain by dissensions among her very children whose only rivalry ought to have been who could have loved and served her best, stood at your post of duty, cool, collected and undismayed—yes, at that very moment when our city was beleaguered by a standing force, whose valor and prowess we had vainly supposed, could only be turned against the common enemies of the country—when the national legislature, who with equal delusion we had supposed were the guardians of the public liberties of the country, were seen catering for the malice of an infuriated despot, and from the fragments of a broken and violated constitution, were arming his hands that he might wreak his vengeance, not only on the bosom of those who had largely contributed to place him in power, but that he might even strike the spot of his birth, the land where he first saw the light of heaven.

It was at a period like this, I surrendered the executive of the state, comparatively defenceless, into your hands; with scarcely a cannon mounted or a musket equipped for the field, our arsenals empty and hardly powder in our magazines to fire an ordinary salute. You, however, met and vanquished the crisis. Applying the resources of your sound judgment and enterprising spirit to this exigency in the short space of one month, we had ammunition enough to have blown up every public building and every private dwelling in the capital of this confederacy, the materials for all arms of service were collected with unexampled dispatch, for equipping five thousand men for the field to begin with—and preparations we knew were in progress for arming our whole volunteer force. Your heroic call was responded to from the mountains to the ocean, and thrilled and reverberated throughout our land. It must have indeed been to you one of the most cheering of all possible circumstances, that the force in arms was equal to the whole number of the suffrages which our party rendered at the ballot box, when by a victorious and overwhelming majority they recorded their heroic determination no longer to submit to oppression.

It does not become me, still less my brave men whom I have the honor to command, in a spirit of vain boasting, to predict what would have been the issue of the struggle into which we would have been hurried, but for the recent adjustment of our controversy with the general government. A long and uninterrupted peace had rendered our hands unused to the implements of war—without pretending to much science in this art, we should at least have tried to do our duty to our country. One thing, sir, is quite certain, when the tug did come, if we had allowed the enemy to have occupied more of our territory than was necessary for us to bury their dead, the very spirit of our fathers would have spoken from their graves and rebuked our degeneracy.

We are cheered by the determination your excellency has announced, not to disband the volunteers of South Carolina whilst the force bill is suspended over our heads, however idle its brute thunder. We respond cordially to your patriotic sentiments on this subject, and one and all declare, let us remain in full organization with arms in our hands, until, in the language of our own highly gifted and highly cherished statesman, this law, "gashed with dishonorable wounds, is torn with disgrace from the statute book." Allow me to renew to you again, sir, my profound acknowledgments for this inestimable donation, and to assure you that under theegis of our own palmetto, it shall never be tarnished.

General Hamilton then turned to the troops and addressed them as follows:—"Fellow soldiers! This banner is committed to our guardianship. Although a civic triumph has followed our recent struggle for the preservation of our rights, and a comparative calm now settles on the surface of a community lately so deeply convulsed; yet it is impossible from causes so fearfully at work in our federative system of government, to tell how soon this tranquillity may again be disturbed. Every man who loves his country must wish the bright stars which form the constellation of this union, may long shine in its firmament in blended justice, harmony and peace. But this blessing is not under our control. If in the inscrutable dispensations of Providence, it should be willed otherwise, look out for this banner. "You will see it waving in the pathway of honor and duty," bearing on its ample folds the effigy of that glorious tree, whose invincible shaft lifts high its verdant top to kiss and greet the earliest light of heaven. Consecrated here in the thronged presence of that better part of God's fair creation, whom the vow of manhood compels us to defend, and the very sacrament of our nature leads us to love, honor and adore, let us swear that it shall never be dishonored.

Ensign Frost! To your hands this standard is committed. In placing it in your possession, I know that it is confided to one whose patriotism enables him to appreciate the proud and cheering associations with which it is connected, and whose valor will defend it, bright and stainless from reproach. Long may it wave, the emblem of our past triumph, and the incentive to renewed glorious and untiring efforts for our country.

THE VOLUNTEER BALL.

This magnificent pageant was given by subscription amongst the volunteers of Charleston, in honor of the principles of state sovereignty, for the support of which they had enlisted themselves on the muster rolls of their beloved and oppressed state, whose sacred soil they had armed themselves to defend against the threatened violence of a partricial tyrant. A late entertainment having been given by the party who oppose their state, to the officers of the federal government sent to enforce the tyrant's will against the authorities and citizens of Carolina; and the elegance of that entertainment being the subject of much eulogy amongst these patriotic gentlemen, it was determined by those who were true to their state, that such a festival should be given as to prove them no less superior in the fidelity of their allegiance, than in the taste and splendor of their festivities. The time fixed upon was the evening of the 27th of March, and the place selected was the extensive area and spacious rooms of the citadel. As the ball was a military one in its character the locale and the martial decorations with which it was adorned, were in tasteful and appropriate keeping with the occasion. This immense edifice being constructed in a quadrangular form, encloses an open space of about 160 feet by about 65 feet, including its extensive piazzas. This enclosure was covered over at the top, with a canopy of canvas, and the ground floored over for the dance and promenade. Around the interior of the area were erected colossal pillars of the Doric order, supporting at the centre their floor of extensive corridors and at their summit the eaves of the roof. The broad projection in front of the building, formed on each side, and above the gate way, was brilliantly illuminated, as was each of the pillars around the interior, with variegated lamps arranged in fanciful and picturesque forms. A large transparency of the arms of the state was placed immediately over the entrance, and presented a beautiful and dazzling appearance to those who approached the building. Upon this transparency was inscribed in broad and conspicuous characters, the motto of "NUL-LIFICATION THE RIGHTFUL REMEDY." At the base of each column surrounding the interior, to the number of twenty, a pyramid of cannon balls was constructed; on the capitals of each the name of a state rights and volunteer district was inscribed; and at the centre of each column supporting the corridors, was fixed a semi-circular frieze of muskets enclosing, and sustaining on each side of the respective pillars a large standard whose ample drapery was tastefully gathered and bound at the staff, and projected above in graceful folds. In corners of the space enclosed, were placed eight beautiful pieces of brass ordnance, medallions bearing patriotic devices and inscriptions, in honor of state rights principles and distinguished statesmen, were suspended between the columns, and at intervals throughout the entire building. These medallions were bound with wreaths of evergreen and flowers, which were also hung in beautiful festoons from the cornice of the roof and galleries, under which benches were arranged for the accommodation of the ladies. In addition to the numerous variegated lamps which were hung around the pillars and the balustrades, chandeliers were suspended at equal distances above and below the floor of the galleries, and lofty pyramids of lamps erected in each corner of the enclosure, so that a flood of light was cast over the whole of this festive scene. Directly opposite to the entrance was erected a spacious orchestra, with Gothic arches, adorned at the base with piles of cannon balls and rows of muskets, and at the summit with festoons of drapery and evergreens. On each side of this orchestra was planted a lofty palmetto tree, whose graceful foliage concealed from view the musicians of two excellent bands, and gave to the swell of their harmonious strains the semblance of music issuing from the cherished boughs of our honored palmetto.

Behind the orchestra, in the spacious artillery room, extending almost the entire length of the edifice, were laid four tables of similar length, for the abundant supper provided for the company. On the second floor of the building, the extensive armory was brilliantly illuminated with chandeliers and innumerable candles inserted in the muzzles of the musketry, and adorned with wreaths and festoons of evergreen, intertwined with the arms, which were arranged in various forms along the sides of this immense saloon, producing a most brilliant and dazzling effect upon the eye of the spectator. The numerous apartments opening into the corridors were lighted up and thrown open for the accommodation of the company as card rooms and wine rooms for the gentlemen, and occasional sitting rooms for the ladies.

The company were received on entering by the managers, and the ladies conducted to the seats prepared for them until the dancing and promenading commenced. The floors were decorated with various figures, dividing off the spaces allotted to each cotillon and quadrille. At the appointed hour (half past 7) the company began to assemble, and in less than an hour the vast hall of the area was crowded to excess. At half past eight, the governor entered with his suite, announced by a flourish of trumpets and a flight of rockets and shells from the open grounds on the exterior of the citadel. The promenading and dancing were then commenced, and continued in succession during the whole evening, with the occasional hauding of refreshments, until half past three in the morning, when the company retired, much delighted with the amusement of the evening.

The coup d'œil presented by this brilliant scene was such as can scarcely be surpassed. The effect from the galleries was peculiarly beautiful, and appeared to call forth the special admiration of the ladies, who in walking round the corridors looked down upon the gay scene beneath, as one of fairy enchantment rather than of bright reality.

The vast concourse of splendidly dressed ladies and of gay cavaliers in their military costumes, winding through the mazes of the dance, presented the appearance of an eastern gala, in the halls of some gorgeous palace, during the days of chivalry and romance.

The combined effect of the various and magnificent decorations, of the dazzling lustre of the lights, and the vast space over which the eye of the spectator wandered, his gazing from one end to the other of this splendid and capacious saloon afforded a spectacle, such as we venture to affirm, has never been seen in America.

The number of persons present amounted to nearly 3,000, and no entertainment was ever conducted with greater propriety and order.

The following is a list of such of the mottoes as we could procure from the various medallions and transparencies.

"NULLIFICATION THE RIGHTFUL REMEDY."
"PARAMOUNT ALLEGIANCE TO THE STATE."

"ROBERT Y. HAYNE,

GOVERNOR OF THE STATE OF SO. CA.

"Let others desert her if they can—Let them revile her if they will—I shall stand or fall with Carolina.

In 'weal and in woe—through evil report and through good report,
I go for my country."

JOHN C. CALHOUN,

THE GREAT LUMINARY OF THE SOUTH:

"He'll leave his lofty name,

A light and landmark on the cliffs of fame."

LIBERTY.

"Tis sweeter to bleed for an age at her shrine,

Than to sleep for a moment in chains."

"Freedom's battle once begun,

Though baffled oft is ever won."

"Breathes there a man with soul so dead,

Who never to himself hath said,

"This is my own, my native land."

"Whether we stand or fall, survive or perish, it shall be

With Freedom's soil beneath our feet,

And Freedom's Banner streaming over us."

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 9—VOL. VIII. BALTIMORE, APRIL 27, 1833. [VOL. XLIV. WHOLE No. 1,127.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

¶ The speech of the venerable Lafayette, in the French chamber of deputies, concerning the violation of the rites of hospitality, at his house, at La Grange—has all the “fire of the flint” of the American revolution. He is, indeed, a wonderful man—and seemingly preserved, as if by miracles, for a guide and pattern, a beacon or a light, “in these our days.”

¶ Having, in the last number of the REGISTER, given the full and formal account of the grand military celebration and ball, in honor of nullification, at Charleston, South Carolina, including all the flourishes of trumpets, and other wind instruments used on that august occasion—we now insert another account of the affair, from the graphic pen of the editor of the “Portland Advertiser”—whose correspondence from Washington was so much sought after, and extensively published, during the late session of congress. We think that most of his “hits” are perfectly fair—and may be properly presented by way of offset to the pompous and awful statement which we have preserved concerning the things that had happened because of the gathering of five hundred volunteers, under brigadier general Hamilton, “commanding the state troops at Charleston.”

¶ It will be seen by a brief notice of the decision of the circuit court of the United States, for the district of Columbia, that Dr. Watkins has been discharged from his long, and cruel, confinement. Of the measure of punishment awarded, because of offences committed by this unfortunate individual, few persons complained—even though many believed that such punishment was inflicted with a severity beyond the law; but the proceedings had against him, subsequent to the expiration of the imprisonment to which he was sentenced because of the criminal part of his conduct, have excited a generous sympathy; for these proceedings were founded only upon a simple matter of debt—which, though it might have been incurred in crime, had been legally relieved of that part of its character in the punishment imposed. We are of those who never believed that Dr. Watkins intended to make a permanent appropriation of public money, illegally, to his own private use—but his acts in this case cannot be further palliated or excused, nor has the penalty inflicted been found fault with. For years past, however, he has been closely and austere imprisoned, because of a mere plea of debt—which it was perfectly known that he could not pay; and we rejoice in his release, that he may again mix in that society which he was so well fitted to adorn—and, in a rigid performance of all the duties of husband, father and citizen, lead all men to forgive, if all cannot forget, his momentary aberration from an honorable course.

We shall, probably, insert the opinion of the court at full length. It may become highly important to gentlemen of the bar, because of proceedings yet to be had—for that Dr. Watkins will claim damages, because of an imprisonment pronounced illegal, must needs be expected.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS AND PUBLIC DEBTS. We give place to a long and highly interesting report made to the house of representatives of Pennsylvania, on the state of the finances—less because of the information which it will afford to the people of that commonwealth, than on account of the instruction which it conveys to every thinking citizen of the United States. We are not prepared to say, for we do not believe, that every public work undertaken by Pennsylvania—road, canal and bridge, was wisely commenced and at the most proper time. Some, perhaps, have been authorised that votes might be obtained in favor of others,—and certain, of questionable utility, may have received the legislative sanction, that particular improvements, of undoubted importance, should be vigorously pursued; and we are also inclined to think that a sound economy would have directed the power of the state to the doing of fewer things at a time—by which it is probable that large sums expended for labor, or paid on account of interests, might have been avoided; still the general policy adopted and pursued will cause prosperity to abound; and millions disbursed, though not returning one per cent. to the treasury, may have been very profitably invested. The fears of some as to accumulations of a public debt, and the “glory” of others because that such debt has been reduced in their day, may be equally discreet or equally absurd—equally becoming the statesman, or equally suited to the prattle of an infant. When a debt incurred fairly represents a value obtained, it cannot be regarded as an incumbrance, even on an individual; but it is often wise in a state to incur a debt which shall yield no return to the treasury of the state, for its own liquidation—because of advantages conferred on the citizens of the state, whose aggregate of private wealth is the best possible evidence of public prosperity, and presents the surest means to satisfy demands on the treasury, as they shall occur—all kinds of private property being liable to public requisitions. “Financial prosperity,” as it is called, may just as well shew national adversity as national success. The sage says, that “an armed people, and unarméd magistracy, is one of the best guaranties of liberty;” and so a low treasury and a wealthy population, may offer to the philanthropist the perfection of political wisdom. It is no matter what may be the amount of the debt of a state, or how low the state of its finances, provided that the money obtained has been expended in rendering solid benefits to the people of the state, because they can return it—and it is their duty, as well as their interest, to return it cheerfully, when needed. By certain of the improvements mentioned in the report before us, a “barren mountain,” which had been as valueless to Pennsylvania as though its location were on Terra del Fuego, has been made to produce a business worth six hundred thousand dollars a year; which, in one way or another, is not only substantially added to the general wealth of the people of the state, but spreads itself, and circulates, and gives new spirit and life to other branches of business equally important—the profits on all which, interlocked together, constitute the resources of the state; and debts incurred, because of such creations of value, may be redeemed, whenever it is thought that the principal, scattered among the people, is less beneficial to them than the payment of interest is burdensome on the state: but until then, we regard it as both improvident and unwise to pay off such debt, unless in conformity with engagements that have been entered into. The richest lands, covered with the most valuable timber, or most luxurious harvests, may be comparatively worthless, because of charges for transportation to market. Some years ago a gentleman of Illinois informed us, that he had been compelled to grow and thresh twenty bushels of wheat, and expend the labor of one man and two horses, two days, in sending it to market, to obtain the five dollar bill which he remitted on account of his subscription to the REGISTER. And so it is that millions on millions of cubic feet of valuable timber have been destroyed by fire, as incumbering the ground—and millions of bushels of corn been suffered to waste on the fields where it grew—because that timber and grain would not bear the costs of transportation to market. If wheat, for example, being the staple product of a farmer—(that on which he relies to obtain money, certain sums of which he must have, in the present state of society), because that some road or canal has been made, [or on account of a manufacturing village which has been built and peopled], can be sent to market for 12½ cents less per bushel, [after paying the tolls, &c.] than theretofore—the farmer as much gains 12½ cents on every surplus bushel of wheat grown by him, as though its price were permanently advanced in that sum; and yet, such is the perversity of the human mind, or the gross amount of stupidity which prevails, that thousands would complain (in the case stated) if a tax of 6½ cents were assessed on a bushel of wheat so carried to market, though the complainants were certainly benefitted in the same sum—for avarice will not acknowledge, nor folly see, that money price has relation to real value, only in the means afforded for paying that price. A large part of the people who inhabit the "crust" of this earth, seem to be as ignorant of this principle as they are of persons and things in the interior—no one having entered into and returned from capt. Symmes' "hole" to inform us of the state of affairs within. Foreigners often speak of high prices in our market, and they are excusable until they have had time to measure them by wages received or profits otherwise earned. Irishmen, when just landed, are oftentimes frightened when the equivalent of three or four shillings sterling is demanded for a bushel of potatoes, such as they might have obtained, at home, for less than one shilling. But because that potatoes have often sold for one dollar a bushel in our cities, equal to 5s Irish, we have not heard of any general want of food—yet in Ireland, when their price did not exceed 20 cents, or 10d. Irish, the bushel, hundreds of thousands of persons were in a state of actual starvation, and tens of thousands really died because of the mere want of potatoes. If the principle here stated had been understood by the people generally—there would never have been much opposition to internal improvements or domestic manufactures—because of their intimate connexion with agriculture and commerce. As examples,—the consumption of wheat (produced in the middle, southern and western states), by the working people of the eastern states, has been increased ten fold since the establishment of manufactories in the latter; and their whole demand for bread stuffs, so produced, is now probably about equal to twice the average amount of the whole foreign exportation, so that the eastern consumption fixes the price of the entire quantity of wheat or flour made for sale—and, it may be reasonably supposed, adds at least one dollar a barrel, thereby causing an INCREASED money price, or profit, to grain growers, in the large sum of ten or twelve millions of dollars a year—for it is manifest that, were those manufactories destroyed, New England would be driven back to the former state of things—when only the wealthy, as it were, consumed southern and western flour, because they only could pay for it; and the working classes, instead of being consumers of the bread stuffs of the south, would be driven into the necessity of producing them—and thus the wholesome interchanges of commodities which at present exist, and so powerfully add to the general wealth and happiness of the people of the United States, would cease; and, among other things, 150,000 tons of coasting vessels be thrown out of employment, their crews being compelled to make their own bread. New England now receives from other states, not less than the equivalent of two millions of barrels of flour a year. Her consumption, before the war, was hardly two hundred thousand. And so as to cotton; the states north of the Potomac, now using about 300,000 bales of cotton, of 300lbs each, create a larger demand for that staple than is that of all the rest of the world, England excepted; and it is well known that this home demand, for several years past, has fixed the price of cotton considerably higher than the first orders of English merchants allowed to be paid for the crops. With such facts before us, the advantages of the home market cannot be misunderstood; and if it is so that the farmer receives a dollar extra on every barrel of flour which he sells, because of the manufacture of cloth in New England—he can afford to pay three times more for eastern-made cloth than for that manufactured in Old England—because that he cannot pay for the latter with his flour, if put down to the lowest possible rate at which it can be made, instead of finding a safe and steady market for it at the high price.

Public debts are often compared with those of individuals, and are thought by some to have exactly the same character. This is a great mistake—and may be a fatal error. Individuals die—states do not. The profits of individuals are in selfish accumulations of wealth; but the profits of states have no sort of relation to the amount of money which remains in the treasury. If an individual expends 1,000 dollars on account of any thing which yields him no interest—the money is lost to him; but if a state makes some improvement which costs 1,000 dollars, yet not expected to return one dollar for interest into the treasury, the investment may be highly productive, because of an increased value given to the property of individuals, subject to taxation. The expenditure of ten millions on the canals of New York has added one hundred millions to the value of property of that state; and if those individuals who have been benefitted were called upon to pay the whole expense of the canals, they would still be gainers in the sum of ninety millions of dollars. The canals, if the property of individuals, must produce an interest on the money invested, to render them profitable; but the state may do away with the tolls altogether, and pay out of its treasury even the cost of superintendence and repairs, and still make these canals profitable, in causing the existence of a greater amount of assessable property—the wealth of the people constituting the wealth of the state.

A public debt may be either a national blessing or a national curse. Prejudice or passion—grave expositions in legislative assemblies, or senseless bawlings at electioneering meetings, cannot change the principle of things. A public debt may be wisely incurred, or unwisely paid off: but never unwisely incurred, if producing corresponding benefits to the people—or wisely paid off, if its amount, retained in the hands of the people or returned to them, is worth more than the sum of the interest which is payable on such debt. The rule, in this instance, will as well apply to individuals as to states. If a person is making six per cent. on a capital which he had borrowed at three per cent. his thriftiness would not be much admired should he pay off that capital—undesired by the lender of it, and without any moral or legal obligation to do so; but if his gains were less than three per cent. he would return the capital, of course, if he could. And yet, out of a sheer vain glory to pay off the national debt, we have seen a proposition seriously entertained of selling the stock of the bank of the United States, which yields six per cent. for the purpose of paying off an undemandable debt on which only three per cent. was chargeable. AND MANY THERE WERE WHO HUZZAED THEREAT!

What is called the "national road" has cost the U. States, let us say, three millions of dollars. This is lost to the treasury, at Washington; but the people of the United States gain not less than a million a year, on account of the reduced cost of transportations because of this road. The money then, expended in making the road, though it does not return one dollar into the treasury, is worth thirty-three per cent. per annum to the people; and the saving thus made to them is so much added to the amount of taxable property, or, at least, contributes, in its whole sum, to the general happiness.

There is another matter of no small consideration, when money is borrowed by the public for wholesome purposes: those who lend make a convenient and safe and profitable investment; and those who borrow cast it into the circulation. An extra million thus thrown among the business-people of a state, is turned and turned and turned, and perhaps does the work of twenty millions, if remaining in first hands. The working people pass it round rapidly, and it does good to somebody at every turn—the capitalist gives it only a slow motion, and the range of its benefits is confined to a few. In demonstration of this it may be mentioned, that, during a part of the time when the New York canals were being made, the rich state of Pennsylvania was in an atrophy, for want of a circulating medium—but the western parts of New York were full of bustle and business—and money. The difference between a slow and rapid movement of money, should be well understood by every one. There is an old and true saying, that "a nimble six pence is better than a slow shilling." As then, the borrowing of capital has a general tendency to make money "plenty"—the refusal to borrow, or hasty returns of capital borrowed, may make money "scarce." It may be as much a sound economy to borrow, as to repay. Had the United States made the Erie canal before the late war, and rendered it toll free for ever, double its cost would have been saved in charges for transportations only—to say nothing about the loss of life and amount of suffering endured by our gallant army on the northern frontier, and the procrastination of hostilities in that quarter.

But now and then a mania prevails to pay off a public debt—and great credit is given to persons who have just the same merit in the matter as the errand boy in the office of the REGISTER, who often takes up a note at the bank; but the boy has not yet said, we believe, that he paid 500 or 1,000 dollars for the editor! If we had caught him in such an act of childishness, we might have taken him on our knees, and said—

"Little Jackey Horner,
"Sitting in a corner,
"Eating a piece of Christmas pyc;
"Who poked in his thumb
"And pulled out a plumb,
"And said, what a great man am I."

Telling him, that if we had not provided the money, he could not have paid the note, any more than "Jackey Horner" have pulled out a "plumb," if somebody had not put it into the pie! We have not heard of a president of the United States, or secretary of the treasury, who has given his own money, or abated one cent of his own salary, to pay off the national debt, and guess that we shall not. Until that happens, the president and secretary deserve no more credit for paying the debt than is due to the errand boy for the safe carriage of our money to bank, and because of an application of it, as ordered—instead of losing it on the way, or expending a part of it for gingerbread and molasses beer—to satisfy his own appetite for sweet things, or quiet the cries of some filthy urchin bawling for pap—pap—pap.

THE CHOLERA. The amount of deaths reported at Matanzas has been exceedingly exaggerated. Instead of two hundred a day, they have hardly amounted to twenty; and the latter would seem pretty severe in a place containing only about 10,000 inhabitants.

Deaths at Havana, April 2—about 80. Another account of the 5th, puts the number down at five hundred!

Many cases of cholera have appeared at Key West. The garrison and many of the inhabitants had left the island for the main land.

This fearful disease has broken out afresh in Ireland. On this subject the New York Commercial Advertiser says—Agitated by deniaques—assailed, plundered and kept in constant terror by the Whitefeet marauders—impoverished by absentee landlords—borne down by poverty in all its forms of destitution—and threatened by the government with military law in place of the ordinary tribunals of civil justice, the miserable people of Ireland are now suffering under the awful scourge of the pestilence. The details are appalling. "Never," says a letter from Limerick of the 15th of March, "was there any thing like the state of the surrounding country. The cholera has spread all around. The reverend Mr. Noonan, curate of Knockany, was here to-day to purchase coffins, there not being hands enough in that place to make them. At hospital to day, the parish priest and twelve of his flock are dead of cholera. Forty persons were attacked last night with the pestilence, out of which the above number fell in a very few hours to its malignant fury. Poor Dr. O'Connell said mass yesterday, and appeared to enjoy excellent health. The manner of his death (being taken off in three or four hours), has created a general feeling of regret and consternation through the surrounding country. Kilmallock, too, is nearly as bad. Bruce is totally deserted; Fedamore attacked at all points; the rev. Mr. McCarthy, the parish priest, and his coadjutor, have been called out of bed to attend the sick and dying, eleven nights in succession. In short, the panic through the country far exceeds any thing within the memory of man."

Kilnurr, Ibraickane, and Seafeld, in the county of Clare, have been likewise visited with the disease; and as if to provoke its rage, the deluded inhabitants refuse to go to the hospitals where every necessary is provided, but perish in their own miserable dwellings. Upwards of sixty deaths out of seventy-three attacked, have occurred in Kilmallock. Of those who were affected, seven remained under treatment, and only six have recovered. In several other places in that part of the kingdom, the disease was extending.

GOOD OUT OF EVIL. The following is extracted from an ordinary business letter to the editor, from one of the most industrious and thriving citizens of [West] South Carolina.

"Although I am sorry to see you, among other friends of 'American industry,' despairing—yet I am more than gratified to find the rapid advancement of the principles of the system in this section of country. Six years ago, I stood alone and unaided on the subject; but now, wherever I turn my eyes I find minds of congenial feelings and principles; and I still hope to see the day when all the upper country of this state, or at least majorities in each district, advocating the principles you have so long contended for. The man who now advocates a 'protective tariff' here is in no danger of a coat of tar and feathers, as a few years ago was the case. The late great political excitement has aided much to enlighten the people, by causing them to examine for themselves."

STEAM ENGINES. The "Pennsylvania Advocate," published at Pittsburg, says—We learn that F. A. BEMIS & Co. of this city, steam engine makers, manufactured, and a few days ago forwarded to Greensboro', North Carolina, via Baltimore, a steam engine for a cotton manufactory, to be erected in the town of Greensboro', in North Carolina! This incident, is worthy of notice, for two reasons—first, for the reason that our engine makers must be greatly superior to those in the Atlantic cities, else the expense of transportation would be saved—second, it shows that the manufacturing system is attracting attention even in a slave holding state.

[C] This brings to recollection an admirable "free trade" fact—which is thus referred to in the very interesting and able report of the committee of the New York Convention concerning manufactures of iron and steel:

"To the report of the select committee of the senate of the United States, on the subject of iron, is appended, among other papers, one in which it is stated, that 'it is now ascertained that the superiority of England over France is entirely due to the cheapness of iron: a six horse steam engine, for instance, in France, costs on the average, at least 500 dollars more than in England, owing to the cheapness of iron in Great Britain—it is still dearer in the United States than in France.'

"Here it is asserted that a six horse power steam engine costs 500 dollars more in France than it does in England, and that it is still dearer in the United States than in France. Now it so happens, that in the United States, at Pittsburg, a steam engine of that power, can be put up, ready for action, for the identical sum of 500 dollars."

U. S. BANK STOCK. Sales of 170 shares at the New York stock exchange on Monday, at 113, on time and interest.

The outcry against the bank still continues. Column after column of matter is cast against it—like straws against the north west wind! And we observe that, at a little meeting held in Frederick, Maryland, it has been gravely resolved that "the secretary of the treasury would be fully justified in withdrawing the public deposits from it!" Half a dozen resolution-makers know a great deal more about the interests of the United States, than three-fourths of the members of both houses of congress.

The Merchants and Planters bank, at Augusta, Geo. has failed—and we have ugly reports about another bank in the interior of New York. If the public confidence is shaken because of such occurrences, one bank will fall after another, like a row of bricks placed "on end," by boys in their play. There are too many of them.

EMIGRANTS. A ship arrived at Baltimore on Wednesday last, with 150 emigrants from Bremen. It is expected that an unprecedented number of persons will reach the United States, from Germany, in the present year. In general, they are most heartily welcome—exactly the kind of people that we need, "provided" the industry of the country is excited and prosperous—for they are of sober and industrious habits; but we have been occasionally annoyed with cargoes of apparently former paupers, or common beggars—and have had to dismiss from 12 to 20 of them in a day. The late law of the state, may, perhaps, abate this nuisance.

RHODE ISLAND. A governor of this state has, at last, been elected—John Brown Francis has beaten gov. Arnold by about 700 votes—at the fifth trial to elect! Mr. A. was the "national republican" candidate—Mr. F. is also said to be a "national republican," but was supported by the Jackson and anti-masonic parties united, and by some national republicans.

CONNECTICUT. Result of the late election.

For governor—J. S. Peters, (nat. rep.)	9,212
H. W. Edwards, (Jackson),	9,030
Z. Storrs, (anti-mason),	3,250

Representatives in congress.

National republican.	Jackson and anti mason.
Mr. Barber 10,121	Mr. Judson 7,469
Young 10,045	Hollabird 7,229
Ellsworth 10,064	Porter 7,376
Huntington 9,449	Simons 6,894
Foot 8,029	Wells 6,842
Tweedy 7,845	Clark 6,567

So Messrs. Barber, Young, Ellsworth and Huntington, are re-elected, and Messrs. Foot and Tweedy take the places of Messrs. Ingersoll and Storrs.

Mr. Huntington lost 564 votes, because of the omission of W.—designating his middle name; and Mr. Edwards lost a few on the same account.

The vote was a short one. In November election for electors of president it stood thus—

Clay	17,518
Jackson	11,041
Anti mason	3,335
	31,894

Now the votes for governor amount only to 21,492, and the two highest on the list of (opposing) congressional candidates obtained only 17,550 votes—or only 62 more than was given to the "Clay ticket," alone, in November last.

It is stated that there is a Jackson majority in both branches of the legislature, and, as there was no choice made of a governor, it is supposed that Mr. Edwards will be elected.

MARYLAND. We regret to observe that our much valued friend, Dr. B. I. Semmes will not be again a candidate for congress. He has long been in feeble health—and great care and much regularity in living, seem absolutely necessary to his being amongst those who love him. He has retired from public life, and bidden an "affectionate farewell" to his late constituents, of Prince George and Anne Arundel counties. In his farewell he says—

"The frequent exercise of the 'veto-power,' to which the present administration has been addicted, certainly to an extent never contemplated by the framers of our constitution, must have awakened your serious apprehensions for the safety and success of our republican institutions. This delicate prerogative, which should be a novelty in the operations of our government, has, by the use of the present chief magistrate of the nation, being reduced into ordinary practice, and threatens to change the entire character of the government. For, if the executive department is to be paramount to and control every other department of the government, it is perfectly immaterial by what name our institutions are called—the government is essentially a despotism; and this seems to be the consummation to which we are now hastening. Nothing but the virtue and intelligence of the people, can save us from so deplorable a catastrophe."

VIRGINIA. The Richmond Enquirer, speaking of the elections which are now going on in Virginia, says, "there will be a decided and overwhelming majority in the next legislature against nullification. Virginia is true to the back-bone. She goes against the mad politics of South Carolina. She is devoted to the Rights and to the Union of the states."

In the strongly contested congressional districts the results are yet chiefly unknown, except that Mr. Mercer and Mr. Craig have been re-elected; and Mr. Chinn has beaten Mr. Talliferro, by 40 votes. It is believed that Mr. Stevenson will be re-elected, and that Mr. Loyall will beat Mr. King, in the Norfolk district. Particulars hereafter.

The following are the representatives in congress ascertained to be chosen—Charles F. Mercer, Joseph W. Chinn, Edward Lucas, William S. Archer, John Y. Mason, Nath. H. Claiborne, William F. Gordon, John M. Patton, and John Randolph.

INDIAN HOSTAGES. From the Washington Globe of April 24. The distinguished Indian warriors, Muk-ka-na-mish-a-ka-kaik, (Black Hawk); Waw-ba-kee-shik, (Prophet); Na-pope; Panahio; Na-sin-ew-is-kuck, (Black Hawk's eldest son); Pa-wa-sheet, (adopted son of the Prophet), have arrived at the seat of government from Jefferson barracks. They were conducted thither by Lieut. Alexander, of the army, in conformity with the instructions of the government.

We understand that these celebrated chiefs of the Sac and Fox tribes are held as "hostages for the future good conduct of the late hostile bands," in conformity with the 7th article of the treaty of Fort Armstrong, made by these confederated tribes, on the 21st of September, 1832, and by major general Scott and governor Reynolds, on the part of the United States.

These Indians are now on their way to Fort Monroe, with the view to their greater personal convenience and accommodation. The facilities for escape at their recent place of confinement, near St. Louis, being near their native forests, required such restraints over their persons and liberties, as would not, perhaps, comport exactly with our institutions, or be agreeable to the president; hence, their removal to the Atlantic border, which must greatly ameliorate the present situation of these misguided and unfortunate men of the woods, as now, at Fort Monroe, they comparatively may be at large, or restricted only to the limits of that great work. Here, too, they may see the "blue face of ocean smile," and if the scene be less congenial to their nature than their own green prairies of the west, yet, perhaps they may be reminded of the boundless tract on which, in days that have gone, they had been accustomed to roam.

We understand that this disposition of Black Hawk, and the hostages named in the treaty, is specially provided for by an act of congress, from which, as it is at hand, we will give the extract:

"For the expenses of twelve prisoners of war of the Sac and Fox tribes, now in confinement, and to be held as hostages, under the seventh article of the treaty with the Sacs and Foxes, on twenty-first of September, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, embracing the cost of provisions and clothing, compensation to an interpreter, and cost of removing them to a place where they may be kept in safety, without being closely confined, the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars."

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL. The Richmond Compiler says—We understand that the president of this company has called upon the treasurer of Virginia, for an advance on the instalment of $250,000, authorised by the last legislature to be contributed on the part of the state. Much the greater part of the appropriation on the part of Maryland, to the same company, will be made by the next month.

The work is said to be in rapid progress. More than 4,500 hands and 800 horses are employed upon its different branches—and at least 9,000 lbs. of powder a week are consumed in blasting rocks. It is expected that the line from the mouth of the Tiber, up to Harper's Ferry, a distance of 64 miles, will be completed in the month of May—and the whole line, more than 100 miles, within three and a half years short of the time allowed by the charter.

AN AWFUL AFFAIR. The brig Sultana, Willis, arrived at Baltimore on Tuesday last, in fifty-five days from Rio de Janeiro, which place she left on the 24th of February. Captain Willis informs us that prior to his sailing, two English ships had arrived at Rio de Janeiro, having on board about seventy persons whom they had picked up at sea. From their statement, it appeared that the British ship Britannia, bound from England to Van Deiman's land, with upwards of two hundred convicts on board, accidentally took fire at sea, while the mate was drawing liquor from a cask in the run and burned to the water's edge. More than a hundred persons, men and women, perished in the flames. After the vessel took fire, the crew and some of the passengers constructed rafts, on which about seventy embarked and were fortunately saved from a watery grave by the timely approach of the two vessels above alluded to. On their arrival at Rio de Janeiro, a subscription was opened for the relief of the sufferers, and about $4,000 had been raised when the Sultana sailed.

It will be recollected that the wreck of a burned vessel was fallen in with some time since, by the ship Martha at New York, with a number of dead bodies floating near it. Among the surmises then made as to the identity of the ship, was one, that the wreck was that of a convict ship from England. It is probable that this is the same vessel. [American.

WEST POINT. We learn that major [lieutenant colonel] De Russay, of the United States engineer corps, one of the earliest and most distinguished chiefs of the military school at West Point, has been appointed superintendent of that institution in the place of colonel Thayer, resigned. Colonel Thayer, notwithstanding his resignation, does not retire from the service, but is to be employed at some other station. [Evening Post.

NEW YORK POST OFFICE. From the N. Y. Gazette of the 16th inst. The recent discussions in the newspapers relative to a contemplated change in the internal arrangements of the post office in this city, have induced us to make some inquiries as to the amount of labor performed in this important department, and the facts which we are about to lay before the public, will satisfactorily show that the number of clerks ought to be increased, not by the introduction of inefficient persons, but by the selection of two or three active intelligent young men, who would, in time, acquire sufficient experience to enable them to be of essential service. We will here state the amount of letters received at the post office for the last six days, ending on Saturday evening, viz:

City delivery	21,929
One cent letters	3,000
Letters for distribution	7,670
Ship letters	23,021
Letters received through the box for distribution, averaging 9,000 per diem,	54,000

Making a total of 109,620

Of this large number, 35,219 were delivered in this city, and the remainder forwarded to every part of the country. When it is taken into consideration that each of these letters was handled six or seven times for the purpose of marking, assorting, delivering, mailing, &c. it will be equal to the handling of seven hundred thousand letters. Moreover the number of newspapers passing through the office amounts to a million per month. It is therefore evident that more aid is necessary, and we hope the postmaster general will order additional clerks, a measure which is emphatically demanded as an act of justice, not only to the gentlemen who now perform their duties at the expense of their health and constitutions, but to the mercantile community also, who contribute so largely to the support of this important department of government.

IMPORTANT LAW CASE. The following goes to the establishment of principles very important to the public. Extract of a letter to the editors of the Philadelphia Sentinel, dated Harrisburg, April 17, 1833.

A very important trial has just terminated in the circuit court here before Judge Rogers. It is said to have been a new case in Pennsylvania, and the decision settles probably, a very important principle. The cause was that of John Bolton vs. Colder & Wilson, stage proprietors. The facts appear to have been these. The stage from Reading to Harrisburg, belonging to Colder and Wilson, on its way to the latter place, stopped at Kuhn's tavern, on the 4th of Feb. 1832, the object of which was to give the horses drink. While standing there, John Bolton passed, in the same direction, in a dearborn wagon. The stage overlooked the wagon, about half a mile from the place—Bolton took the left of the road, and approached the bank, as near as was safe for him. The stage proceeded on in its usual speed, and without turning to the right or left—caught the hind wheel of the dearborn, upset it, and broke the thigh of Mr. Bolton, and left him entangled in such a way that he must have perished, had not the passengers, at some distance prevailed on the driver to stop, when they went back and relieved him, by righting the wagon, placing Bolton in it, and one of them driving it to town. Bolton lay some weeks, under the doctor's hand—endured great suffering—is yet a cripple, and in all probability will remain so all his days. Bolton brought suit, in the court of common pleas of Dauphin county, against Colder and Wilson for damages—the cause was arbitrated, and an award of 75 or 80 dollars rendered in favor of Bolton, from which he appealed, and removed the cause into the circuit court. On Tuesday it was taken up for trial—the testimony was closed yesterday.

day, before dinner—the cause was argued in the afternoon—the jury was charged between 6 and 7 o'clock, and this morning at 9 o'clock, a verdict was rendered, in favor of the plaintiff, for twelve hundred dollars damages, and six cents costs. The damages were laid at $5,000. The counsel for the defendants moved for a new trial, for six several reasons, which they assigned—all alleged to be errors in the decisions of the court—which being refused, an appeal was taken to the supreme court, upon the same ground.

If the decisions in this case be confirmed, (and little doubt exists but they will) they establish regulations, not generally known, but which it is important the public should know.—They are these; that a stage has no rights upon a public road, superior to any other vehicle. That in meeting each other, all carriages are bound to keep to the right—but that no carriage is bound to give any part of the road for another to pass it, at a swifter gait—that is, that a wagon, or cart, or dearborn, or gig, or sulkey, is not bound by law to turn aside, to let a swifter vehicle pass which may happen to overtake it. So that a swifter carriage, if it sees its way clear, may pass a slower one, on either side, but must be responsible for damages—nor can it, by right, force the one before it, to turn out. And a driver is identified in law, as the owner, and the proprietor of a stage is as much responsible for the acts of his driver, connected with the stage, as he would be if he were driving himself.

I understand, this case will be reported at large, for the papers.

Counsel for plaintiff—D. Krause and J. A. Fisher—for defendants—J. B. Weidman and John M. Foster.

AS IT SHOULD BE. The Montreal Gazette of the 11th inst. announces the arrival in that city of captain Back and his party. Captain Back, it is said, speaks in the most enthusiastic terms of the attentions he received from the citizens of New York during his stay there, and of the liberality of the custom house department in declining to receive any duties on articles belonging to the gentlemen attached to the expedition. The party are to leave Montreal for the interior, about the end of this month.

—Captain Back was certainly most kindly and respectfully received and entertained in New York, by all parties, and on every occasion; but as Englishmen, generally, are apt to suppose that all "out-landish" people are in duty bound to pay homage to their "nobility,"—it is pleasant to meet with a man who, being a gentleman himself, can appreciate gentlemanly actions in others—though beyond the reach of the sound of "Bow Bells"—though they never saw Gog and Magog, heard a cock neigh, or "bagged" an owl for "game."

BRIEF NOTICES.

The Roman Catholic cathedral church in Baltimore, was robbed in the night of the 18th inst., of sundry candlesticks and crucifixes, &c. in the belief, perhaps, that they were of gold. But the total loss of property did not exceed the value of 150 or 200 dollars—and the thieves will not find it easy to convert the articles stolen into money, undetected.

There have passed through the Chesapeake and Delaware canal during the week ending the 13th inst. one hundred and forty-eight vessels. Seventy-three from the Delaware, and seventy-five from the Chesapeake.

The Norfolk Herald states that the Methodist Protestant congregation have purchased the only theatre in that place, with the intention of converting it into a place of worship.

The Pennsylvania Advocate says—It is stated in the eastern newspapers, that judge Holmes, who recently died at Haddam, in Connecticut, was a member of the legislature of that state for sixty sessions. We heard of a member of the Massachusetts legislature, who held his seat for forty years in succession. He maintained his popularity by always voting in the negative. If a bad law was passed, his name was always found among the nays—if a good law, no inquiry was made as to who voted for or against it. More men acquire and retain popularity by negative than by positive qualities.

[The venerable Nathaniel Macon voted for the declaration of war against Great Britain, in 1812—but, we believe, voted against nearly all the bills (if not every one of them), which freely appropriated money to carry it out—or declined voting altogether.]

On Sunday morning last, at about 7 o'clock, the store of Messrs. Monteith, Market street, Baltimore, was entered by false keys, and robbed of watches and jewelry, to the value of about 6,000 dollars. This store is in one of the most public places in the city.

The secretary of the navy, accompanied by col. Henderson, of the marine corps, is now on a tour of inspection, and left Louisville, Ky. on the 14th inst., for New Orleans, Pensacola, &c.

The journey between Baltimore and Philadelphia, was lately made in the Citizens Union Line, in eight hours fourteen minutes. One would suppose that this is going "fast enough." We have been more than two days and nights making this journey.

It is given out that the president will commence his eastern tour about the 1st of June. The vice president has proceeded to the north, stopping some time both in Baltimore and Philadelphia. He will probably join the president at New York.

Major Heard, who made the outrageous assault on Mr. Arnold, of Tennessee, as he was leaving the capitol in June last, has been recently discharged on his own recognizance of 500 dollars. The account says, he is considered insane, and was not put on his trial.

The steambot "William T. Barry," a mail boat which plies between Mobile and New Orleans, was run ashore at the Bayou la Batre, on the 5th inst., to avoid sinking, being riddled by worms. The Mobile Mercantile calls her the new boat.

The ice yet remained firm on lake Erie, at Buffalo, on the 17th inst. but was expected to give way in a few days. The upper part of the lake was navigable about the 10th of the month.

In six days, ending on the 18th inst. the tolls on the Pennsylvania canal, received at Harrisburg, amounted to $2,196 15½. Business is said to be equally brisk on other canals.

A want of the usual floods in the Susquehanna, has prevented a vast amount of produce from descending—especially lumber.

Portsmouth, Ohio, and Batavia, New York, have recently suffered much damage by fire.

The navigation of the St. Lawrence, from Quebec to the sea, opened on the 13th inst.—though large quantities of ice was still floating in the river.

The Political Examiner says—"The facilities of the intercourse of our citizens with Baltimore, have been greatly increased, within a few days. By the new arrangement, a person may leave Frederick at 4 o'clock, A. M. arrive in Baltimore at 11, transact business until half after four and return to Frederick by 11 at night.

[That is—travel 120 miles without fatigue, and have 5½ hours for business, and 5½ in bed, (at home), in 24 hours.]

FOREIGN NEWS.

From Paris papers to the 23d March.

There was a report that Ibrahim had taken possession of Smyrna. The French and English are very desirous of making some arrangement between the Turks and Egyptians, which may enable the sultan to dispense with the Russian army and navy, so generously offered for the defence of his territories. A sketch of the terms that have been proposed to Ibrahim are published, which it is thought that Mehmet, his father, would accept, and recall his victorious army. According to this project, a part of Syria—the districts of St. Jean d'Acre, Jerusalem and Tripoli—are to be added to the pachalik of Egypt, which is, however, to acknowledge the sovereignty of the sultan. The Turks at Constantinople were flattering themselves with the hope of a speedy peace.

The prosecutions of certain editors at Paris, do not make it appear that the liberty of the press is on a much better footing than it was under the Carlists.

The naval force of France in the Mediterranean is to be increased.

Prussia is very anxious for a settlement of the disputes between Holland and Belgium. The budget of her war department is oppressive. In 1831 it amounted to 49,750,000 thalers, which is double that of ordinary times.

According to letters from Corfu, king Otho has already appointed six Greeks to be generals.

A royal Spanish decree has issued authorising Don Carlos to visit Portugal, together with his wife (sister of Miguel) and her son.

The war in Portugal is not active. Neither party seems able to render much injury to the other.

We have late accounts from Mexico. Gen. Santa Anna has been elected president, receiving all the votes but one. Fears are expressed, however, that the peace of the country will soon be again disturbed.

BRITISH COLONIAL SLAVERY.

In the house of commons, March 19.

On Mr. F. Buxton being called upon by the speaker.

Lord Althorp said he had to request his honorable friend not to bring forward the motion of which he had given notice, respecting colonial slavery, at the present moment. As ministers had intimated their intention of preparing some measure on this subject, he thought that the honorable member could not do any thing more advantageous to the question itself than to postpone his motion until he heard what were the plans his majesty's ministers had in contemplation.

Mr. F. Buxton said that no gentleman was more conscious than himself that it would be far better that this great question should be taken up by government than by any individual member of that house and he was ready on the present moment to postpone his motion upon two conditions—1st, that ministers would be prepared with a plan for the entire and immediate extinction of slavery; and 2d, that they would name the day that they would introduce the plan to the house. It was indispensable that the question should be settled in the present session, and by that house, or it would be settled in another place in a far more disastrous way. Therefore; however obstinate he might appear, and however painful it might be for him to resist the requests, both public and private, which had been made to postpone the question, he felt compelled to proceed at once with the motion, unless government fixed a day on which they would be prepared to explain their plans with respect to colonial slavery.

Lord Althorp said it was impossible for him to comply with one of the conditions mentioned by the honorable member; but with respect to the other—that government should fix a day in which they would bring forward their question—he certainly had no objection to state that government would be prepared on Tuesday, the 23d of April, to state the views they took on the subject. Of course he could not at the present time state what the plans were which his majesty's government had in contemplation.

Mr. F. Buxton said, that in reference to the words "entire and immediate extinction of slavery," as used by him, he perhaps had expressed himself rather unguardedly, because one of the great objects he had in view was the safe and satisfactory settlement of the question—(Hear, hear). With the promise given by the noble lord he was perfectly content, and should therefore withdraw his motion.

The following is copied from the New York Journal of Commerce. It is another beautiful commentary on JOHN BULL'S "honorable liberality and consistency," in the matter of negro slavery. But John is infallible! Every thing is right or is wrong, as the "maggot bites him." He preaches "free trade" for American use, and will not give tapes and bobbins for American flour!

The acting committee of West India planters and merchants in London have drawn up a documentary history of the origin and progress of slavery in the West Indies, and submitted a copy of the same to each member of the British parliament. The sum of the whole matter is, that the slave trade was urged upon the colonies by the British government; that various attempts were made by the colonies to check the importation of slaves, by legislation, remonstrances, &c. but that such attempts were uniformly resisted by the government of the mother country, until at length, in 1775, an order was issued by the king to the following effect:

"To our trusty and well beloved sir Basil Keith, governor of Jamaica, and the territories depending thereon in Jamaica—Whereas, notwithstanding the instructions which have been repeatedly given by us and our royal predecessors to the governors for the time being, for our island of Jamaica, forbidding them to assent to or pass acts for imposing duties upon negroes imported into that island, payable by the importer, such acts have nevertheless been from time to time enacted and passed into laws, in open violation of said instructions. And whereas, it has been represented unto us, that the duties imposed by the said acts upon negro slaves imported, have of late been considerably augmented, to the injury and oppression of the MERCHANTS of this kingdom, and the obstruction of its commerce: it is therefore our express will and pleasure that you do not, upon any pretence whatever, and upon pain of being removed from your government, give your assent to any act or acts by which the duties and impositions upon slaves imported into the island of Jamaica, as the said duties stood before the 13th day of February, 1774, shall be in any respect augmented or increased, or any alteration made in the proportion of such duties, which by the provisions of such laws was made payable by the importers of such slaves."

G. R.
"Given at our court at St. James's, the 28th February, 1775, in the 15th year of our reign."

The colonies, by the agent of Jamaica, remonstrated against the resolution of the government; but the earl of Dartmouth replied, "we cannot allow the colonies to check or discourage in any degree a traffic so beneficial to the nation."

The same course precisely was pursued by the British government towards the colonies which have since been erected into independent states. It was a course full of injustice, and pregnant with the most disastrous consequences. The committee of West India planters and merchants, however, only deduce from it a single inference, viz: that if the British government now contemplate the abolition of slavery in the West India colonies, the loss of property occasioned thereby, ought not to fall exclusively upon the colonists, but to be shared equally by them and the other population of the British empire. They say—

The West India colonists do not propose to vindicate the system of slavery, but they consider that, (to use the words of lord Stowell), "if it be a sin, it is a sin in which the country has had its full share of guilt and ought to bear its proportion of the redemption."

The colonists are themselves ready to bear their share of any national sacrifice which may be required for the purpose of cautiously substituting a better system, if such should be the national determination; but they mean to show, by the accompanying paper, that Great Britain is herself responsible for the establishment and actual existence of colonial slavery; that with the view of extending the market for her African trade she passed laws and made grants of land expressly enjoining cultivation in the colonies by slave labor, and that thus, through the instrumentality of her subjects, all eagerly contending for participation in the traffic, she gradually peopled the West India colonies with slaves and received the value of them in money; consequently, that any measure of legislative interference tending to impair or endanger the value of property so acquired, must either be accompanied by adequate compensation, or give a death blow to that confidence in the national faith and character which has hitherto been the sole support of private property in this country.

THE WHITEFOOT'S OATH.

KILKENNY ASSIZES.

Dublin, March 16. On Wednesday last, ten men were tried and convicted of a midnight attack on the house of Martin Kavanagh, of Johnstown, so far back as the 23d November, 1831, and with assaulting him and administering unlawful oaths. It appeared on the trial, that Kavanagh had since entered into the Whitefoot confederacy, been tried, convicted, and ordered for transportation at the last assizes. His wife and an apprentice, Henry Highland, one of the party who attacked Kavanagh, were produced as witnesses against the ten Whitefeet, who were on their evidence convicted of the minor offence within the house, and acquitted of the burglary, as Kavanagh had raised the latch to admit them.

On the cross examination of Highland, he admitted that he had often been present when Whitefeet were sworn in, and stated that the following was the oath administered—

1. I hereby swear to keep counsel of all this united business or ribandism.

2. I hereby swear to suffer the right arm to be cut from the left, and the left from the right, and the right to be nailed to the metropolis of Armagh gaol door, before ever I'll waylay or betray a brother, or go on a green cloth to swear against him.

3. I hereby swear never to have carnal pleasure with a brother's wife, sister, aunt, or first cousin, only by lawful permission.

4. I hereby swear never to rob a man or keep company with a robber, unless in gaol or work, where it cannot be helped.

5. I hereby swear to give money to the repair of arms or of ammunition, when called upon by a brother, if I have it.

6. I hereby swear never to have a shilling, and a brother to want sixpence, without giving it to him.

7. I hereby swear never to pity the moans or groans of dying children, but always wade knee-deep in Orange blood, and to keep down land-jobbers and tithe-jobbers.

8. I hereby swear never to see a brother in danger of transportation or the gallows, if I am able to make up money for him.

9. I hereby swear never to have two coats, two shirts, two pair of stockings, or any thing belonging to the body, but will give a brother one if he requires it.

10. I hereby swear never to sit in company and hear a brother spoken ill of. If I am not able to fight or resist, I will walk out and tell the next brother I meet what was said, who said it, and in what company.

11. I hereby swear to go 15 miles on foot, and 21 on horseback, when called upon by a brother upon a lawful occasion, or unlawful, for fear it might be unlawful before we could come back.

12. I hereby swear to never give the secret to bishop, priest, or minister, or to any other body, only to a friar, and to never tell the man that made me a Whitefoot, and to keep up to the knight of St. Patrick.

The declaration of the above caused an extraordinary sensation in court; parts of the oath have heretofore been exhibited to the public indignation, but this is the first time that it has been exposed in a court of justice in the county of Kilkenny, as a characteristic of the Whitefoot system. Several of its clauses are well remembered as having been used as forms of swearing in the older Ribandmen or Rockites, in the north of Ireland, where the former Orange system provoked such a reaction. The fact of its having been grafted on Whitefootism, only proves how extensive are the causes which operate in Ireland to expose the peasantry to the temptation of joining any system or any enterprise, however rash and lawless and dangerous, that holds out a hope of redress.

BRITISH EAST INDIES.

The countries subject to the dominion of the East India company extend over upwards of 1,000,000 of square miles, and contain about 124,000,000 of inhabitants. With the exception of Nepal, Lahu, the territories of Aimers and Scindia, and the Cabul sovereignty east of the Indus, the whole of India within the Ganges, containing about 123,000,000 of souls, is under their sway. In the peninsula beyond the Ganges, they have several provinces south of Rangoon; viz. half the provinces of the Marbati, the provinces of Tavoy, Ye, Zencaserim, and the Mergui isles; also the province of Arracan, Assam, and a few petty adjacent states. The population of these last countries is about 300,000. Pulo Penang, or prince of Wales Island, and Singapore, at the southern extremity of Malacca, are the company's most flourishing settlements in that quarter. Penang was once a free port; Singapore still is so; and the rapidity of its progress, the promiscuous character of its inhabitants, and the great commercial activity which pervades it, are an emphatic reply to the allegation, that the inhabitants of the east require the compelling power of an overgrown monopoly to induce them to trade! In the five years previous to 1828, its population increased forty per cent. and amounted in that year to 14,885; only a very inconsiderable number being Europeans, the rest Chinese, Malays, and other natives of Indian coasts and surrounding islands. The jurisdiction of the company also includes St. Helena, in the Atlantic, where a fortress and garrison are retained; and in the south of China, at Canton, is the factory which conducts the tea trade.

We can spare only a short space for observations on points of most pressing interest connected with the management of this mighty empire; but a very few remarks may give our readers an idea of them. It is plain, in the first place, that the part of the East India company's charter which refers to trade must be thoroughly re-modelled. The notion of a monopoly trade, such as that with China still is, cannot, in these days, meet with many defenders. The monopolist is never an economical trader. He is lazy, difficult to be moved; and when he does move, it is very exorbitantly. The large ships of the merchant-kings are no more to be compared with a clean and smart Liverpool trader, than the lumbering fabric of Leadenhall street, with the well arranged, economical counting-house of the enterprising capitalist. A good free trader is navigated at nearly half their charge; and upon a single voyage to Calcutta, gains about 70 days. Add to all this the expenses of a Canton factory, together with the needlessly extravagant salaries paid by the company to its servants, and we shall have no difficulty in accounting for the high price of tea in Great Britain compared with any other part in the known world. This single article of consumption has been said to cost upwards of £2,000,000 annually, over and above its retail price, in consequence of the trade being so conducted, or rather bungled; and we are certainly fished at least £1,500,000. But we suffer far more than this actual deficit. Had our prices not been so extravagant, we might have conducted the tea trade of the whole western world; and assuredly our ship-owners would find it better to assist us in an endeavor to destroy this monopoly, than to clamor in support of a pitiful timber trade with Canada! Reform is deeply necessary in the trade with Hindostan. Although nominally free, it is not so; nor will it even be so whilst the company is allowed to trade. What we mean by free trade is this: it is a trade whose conditions are regulated by free competition amongst capitalists acting upon the common principles of profit and loss; and it is clear that no such trade can exist, when the market is ever likely to be pounced upon by one large capitalist who cares neither for profit nor loss; who often purchases for no other object than to make a remittance of surplus revenue; and whose acting servants are paid, not by a per centage on their profits, but in proportion to their purchases. We hold that the constant interference of these monopolists with the Indian markets is almost the sole reason of the continued inadequacy of the commercial intercourse of Britain with Hindostan; for inadequate, and miserably so, it still is, great though its progress under the free trade, since the last renewal of the charter, has unquestionably been;—and it is the surest proof of the accuracy of what we assert, that up to this hour, the company cannot show that it has been a gainer, in circumstances where private capitalists would have realized uncommon fortunes!—But we have yet another matter to settle with these sovereigns of India; one of higher importance than even the foregoing; a matter still more interesting to the human race—the question as to the nature of their government. The fact is not to be disguised,—India groans under a military despotism. Our hold over the natives appears to be, that their fierce masters were harder than we, and oppressed them still more relentlessly,—a strange security for civilized and Christian Britain to adopt as the sheet anchor of her Indian dominions! No check against bad government; no power to obtain justice upon the provincial oppression; no opportunity of advancement, either commercially or morally, have we yet granted to the prostrate Hindoos. The Moslems, indeed, planted a conqueror's foot upon their necks; but, like the Romans of old, and the Russians in modern times, they dispersed themselves amongst the conquered, took part in their concerns, and communicated their own superior civilization. Our merchant-kings tremble at the bare name of civilization. Their wise men have talked even of a prohibition of Christianity. They only vouchsafe to India collectors of a worse than her tithe tax, and quarter upon "spots of greenery?" hordes of avaricious adventurers, actuated but by two moving principles—the determination to extract money, and the desire to return home. The time for correction is long; and shall the destinies of south-eastern Asia tremble under this balance? shall we weigh ignoble fears, and corrupt desires, against the fates of those countless millions? Shall we refuse to India a population of industrious colonists, who would accept her as their home, and under whom liberty and civilization would assuredly grow? By such men would the Hindoo be taken up on the one hand, and accustomed to the securities of Europe; and on the other, an effective responsibility of some sort would be infallibly attached to every official within the broad peninsula. The seeds of freedom would thus be sown, and the tree of godly shadow would, in due course, arise. In that land, we can never look for a New England; its character and the proportions of its population forbid; but it may be a new country of peace, a new refuge for humanity, a new field for the unfettered exercise of human ingenuity, the spread of human happiness, and the exercise of the mind's best powers. MONUMENT TO ALEXANDER.

The grand monument to the memory of the late emperor of Russia, ordered by Nicholas, his brother, was raised on St. Alexander Nefsky's day, August 30, O. S. 1832, in presence of the imperial family, nobility, citizens and strangers, including an immense multitude, in the large square in front of the hermitage, or winter palace of the emperor. The shaft is of red granite, the same substance of which Pompey's pillar is composed, and is represented to be larger than that celebrated shaft. The raising is thus described in the Boston Transcript, by a gentleman recently returned from Russia:

The pedestal, which is square, is forty feet high; the shaft is round, and in one piece; it is eighty-five feet high and twelve feet diameter at the top; it weighs six hundred tons. The column supports a colossal bronze statue, representing an angel, holding a cross. The statue, with its pedestal, including the capital of the column, is thirty-five feet high, and the height of the monument from the ground to the top of the statue is one hundred and sixty five feet. The stone was brought from Finland, (from the same quarry where the celebrated pillars of the Cassand Church, published like marble, were procured), and transported to St. Petersburg in a ship built for the purpose, towed by a steamboat. The inclined plane on which the shaft was rolled from the river Neva to its present site, contained a forest of wood, and cost in that country, where it is so cheap, a million of rubles, or 200,000 dollars. The column was raised and safely placed on its pedestal, by means of sixty captans, manned by 2,500 veterans, who had served with Alexander in his most glorious campaigns. Each of them wore badges of honor. The preparations for the stupendous undertaking were so complete that not the slightest accident occurred, and during the operation of raising the shaft, not a whisper or a word was heard throughout the vast multitude who witnessed it.

PERIODICAL PRESS OF FRANCE.

From the New York American.

We received from the last Havre packet from the "newspaper correspondence office" of Messrs. I. Bresson and Bourgois at Paris, a large sheet, containing the names and places of publication of every newspaper and periodical publication in Paris and the departments—and our surprise at their number, closely as we thought we had watched the spread of these vehicles of intelligence in France, was truly great. There are published in the departments two hundred and forty-three papers—some daily, some tri-weekly, some semi-weekly, some weekly, and some monthly. Bourdeaux has five daily newspapers and one weekly. Contrast Liverpool in England with this, which has not a single daily paper. Lyons has four daily papers, two tri-weekly, and one weekly. Rouen has four daily papers, one semi-weekly and one monthly. Havre has two daily, one weekly, and one monthly.

In Paris, thirty-one daily papers are published—of which two are evening, three midday, and the remainder morning publications—leaving 186 periodicals more, recurring at less than two months interval, and mostly weekly or monthly to fill up the sum of 217.

According to a circular dated the 15th February, from the directors of the office of correspondence, whence we received the statement of the French press, "more than one hundred journals or periodicals have been established within the past year, chiefly in provincial towns." With such activity and impetus given to the public press in France, what hope can there be of maintaining any doctrines which imply right or superiority in any one portion of mankind—whether kings, priests or nobles, to rule the rest?

We cheerfully comply with the request of Messrs. Bresson and Bourgois, to insert the following notice:

Messrs. Bresson and Bourgois, directors of "the newspaper correspondence office," established in Paris three years ago, have just published a new statistical table presenting for the year 1833, the authentic list of all the papers and periodicals which are published in France. The utility of such a publication cannot be overrated.

FRENCH CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES.

From the New York American.

On 11th March, the report of the committee respecting M. Cabet, a deputy, who, in the interim of the session had been accused and convicted by default of having made a seditious publication, and who now claimed that this sentence of conviction should be annulled—being under discussion, general Lafayette took occasion to speak as follows, amidst profound silence: "Several of my colleagues, professional men, having asked to be heard, I will not go into the discussion of the matter before us. I will only say that what induces me specially to second the motion of M. Cabet, is, that he is one of the deputies marked out for the courts martial in the days following the 6th June last. Not that I consider it a positive aggravation of that crime, of that violation of the charter, that a deputy, more than any other citizen, was to be made one of its victims; but perhaps this consideration may add something to the view of his case. Moreover, gentlemen, it would seem that we are treated with very little ceremony. You perceive with what facility such of our colleagues as hold place are dismissed from office when they transcend the limits of a silent vote. (Laughter and approbation.) I might quote another example if it were not personal to myself; and this furnishes me the occasion of complaining of what happened three days ago at my residence of La Grange. (Hear, hear.) The complaint I make refers to the treatment recently resorted to in the case of an illustrious Pole, M. Levecl. I accuse no ministerial personage; for I believe the measure was decided on in the king's council. If it were otherwise, it would be of the minister of the interior that my complaint would be made. Gentlemen, you will remember that unfortunate determination—unfortunate certainly in my view—which caused the French government to descend to the level of other arbitrary governments, and of which the effect has been to place it on a footing of companionship with despotic governments, from which we hoped the revolution of July had forever released us. It would have been fine to be able to say to arbitrary governments, 'you can do such and such things; we have even the right to demand that you should, because you are despots; but you cannot make any such demands of us, because the constitution of our country would not permit a compliance with them.' (Expression of interest.) According to the English alien bill, the confronting of the foreigner with three ministers is I believe requisite; and when our late government called frankly for arbitrary powers, then too the signature of three ministers was required. Such however, is not our present law regarding aliens. Well, gentlemen, the foreigners have required that we should send out of France, or at least away from Paris, some Poles accused of having signed an address to some other countries. Among them was one who was neither a political agent nor refugee, for he had been for many years in France, and was even one of those who most distinguished themselves in the days of the barricades in Paris, (murmurs in the centre). But there was another Lelewel, who was a minister of the government of which prince Czartoryski was president—a man who has a great literary and scientific reputation in Poland, in Russia, in Germany, and indeed in all Europe. It had been arranged, and I was thankful to ministers for it, that instead of going 60 leagues away from the capital, he should remain at La Grange. The minister of the interior thinks he has come to Paris. I assure him he is mistaken. However that be, M. Lelewel received orders to retire to Tours. I supposed that order had not been yet sent, and upon that point refer to my son, now present, and one of our colleagues. But though he had received it, I must say M. Lelewel committed a great error in supposing that any influence remained to one of your colleagues, who declares that he is entitled to none, under the administration of a system which he pronounces counter-revolutionary, and from which he has entirely and openly withdrawn himself. By the term 'counter-revolutionary,' I mean counter-revolutionary to the revolution of July, 1830. This, then is what passed—a detachment of gens d'armes, followed by a sub-prefect of the district, and the mayor of the commune, appeared at La Grange, to arrest M. Lelewel. They placed him in one of my carriages with a gen d'armes, and conveyed him to Melun, and thence doubtless to Tours. This is a sufficiently savage manner of proceeding towards so distinguished a man as M. Lelewel. I admit that I could not help being surprised myself at such conduct, considering that for the fifteen years of the restoration, during which, in this place and elsewhere, I evinced my open hostility to it, never, though then there might have been more substantial grounds for it, had I cause to complain of such a step; whether because there was yet some recollection of ancient relations, or that there was a real repugnance to a certain vulgarity of such proceedings—never has such a thing happened before to the dwelling of La Grange. According, however, to the system of concession which has been adopted, the time was, it seems to me, well chosen, for it was a double tribute of condescension on the arrival in the capital of the Russian ambassador." (Very well, very well.)

M. d'Argout, minister of the interior, after stating that he would propose in a few days laws providing fresh subsidies for the relief of political refugees, and thus prove that the government did not neglect of abandon them, said—

As for M. Lelewel, I must say that the government, desiring that the Polish refugees should be removed from the capital, the honorable general, who appears to take some interest in M. Lelewel—

Gen. Lafayette. Great interest.

M. d'Argout. The honorable general asked that M. Lelewel should be permitted to reside at La Grange—but on the condition that he would not go from thence. Nevertheless, gentlemen, I know to a certainty that this man has been several times in Paris. I will not say that I know it to a positive certainty, but to a moral certainty. (Laughter at the extremities.) M. Lelewel has, I repeat, several times left La Grange.

M. Geo. Lafayette. Never. (Sensation.)

M. d'Argout. When a refugee thus abused the indulgence of the government, they thought it right to send him farther away. Consequently I stated to the honorable general himself that the government could no longer tolerate the presence of M. Lelewel at La Grange. I know not by what mistake the armed force made its way to La Grange, for I remember recommending to the prefect not to have recourse to it.

Gentlemen—there is nothing more honorable than the hospitality granted to the Polish refugees—but it must be remembered that there are among them turbulent and restless spirits, who injure their own cause, as well as the interference in their behalf which the French government has been always ready to urge—(approbation in the centre). We should be wanting to our duty, gentlemen, if we at this time should permit a law, passed by yourselves, to be violated. (From the centre, very well—very well.)

Gen. Lafayette, from his place. Since the minister disavows the mode in which the prefect executed his order, I beg him to write to "that man"—to use the vocabulary which the minister more than once thought proper to employ—for I do not think M. Lelewel a less illustrious person than the prefect—and give him a good dressing. (Laughter and approbation).

THE FALKLAND ISLANDS.

PROTEST OF THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC.

To the charge d'affaires of H. B. majesty, Philip Gore, esq.

Department of foreign relations, Buenos Ayres, Jan. 22, 1833. The undersigned, minister of grace and justice, charged provisionally with the department of foreign relations of the Argentine republic, is directed by his government to address the charge that on the 21 inst. H. B. M.'s sloop of war Clio anchored in the port of San Luis, in the island of La Soledad, one of the Malvinas, for the purpose of taking possession of them as belonging to H. B. M.; capt. Onslow, of the said vessel, stating that he had positive orders to hoist the British flag on shore within twenty-four hours. He had already done so in other parts of the islands, and finally, did the same in that of La Soledad, in defiance of the protests of the commander of the schooner of war Sarandi, who was there in fulfilment of orders from his government, which, through a fatality of unforeseen circumstances, he could not strictly perform, by forcibly resisting the occupation of the islands. The undersigned abstains, for the present, from expatiating on the inconsistency of such a violent and rude proceeding, in a time of profound peace, when the close and friendly relations between the two governments on the one hand, and on the other the moderation, cordiality and purity of intentions of which England has made ostentation, gave no reason to expect that the confidence in which the Argentine republic reposed would be so unceremoniously violated. Nevertheless, in fulfilment of the orders of his government and in its name, in consideration of what we owe to our own dignity, to posterity and to the deposit which the United Provinces has entrusted to the government of Buenos Ayres, and in short, to the whole world whose eyes are fixed upon us, the undersigned protests in the most formal manner against the pretensions of the government of Great Britain to the Malvinas Islands, and its occupation of them, as likewise against the insult offered to the flag of the republic, and against the damages which the latter has received and may receive in consequence of the aforesaid proceedings, and whatever may hereafter take place on the part of the British government in this respect. The charge d'affaires, whom the undersigned addresses, will please transmit this protest to his government, and manifest the decided resolution of this republic to sustain its rights, at the same time that it desires to maintain inviolate the friendly relations which it has hitherto cultivated with Great Britain, and that peace may prosper and be perpetual between both states.

THE REPRESENTATIVES CHAMBER.

A material alteration is now making in the hall of representatives. The floor is to be raised to a level with the loggia, behind the speaker's chair, and to descend towards the present principal entrance; the speaker's chair is to be placed near the main door, thus changing the position of the members, so as to front the galleries, the elevation of which will be reduced by adding to the height of the floor; two doors are to be cut out of the wall surrounding the chamber, one on each side of the speaker's chair, and a new gallery is to be formed behind the columns of the loggia. The entrance into this gallery, which, we suppose, will be light and airy, like that in the senate chamber, will be through the doors on the south side of the building. The hearing, it is thought, will be greatly assisted by these changes; but the magnificence of the room will, we apprehend, be somewhat marred. By the arrangement now in progress, the capacity of the hall will be considerably increased, and a much larger number of representatives can be accommodated. The room is to be heated by flues passing in various directions under the arched floor, from the furnaces in the first story. We suspect, however, that the speaker will not like his location, as he will be thrown too much in the shade, and subjected to great inconvenience from the want of sufficient light. [W. City Chron.]

MR. RANDOLPH—LATE LIEUT. U. S. NAVY.

Much having been said in the public papers concerning certain proceedings had against lieutenant Randolph—and deeming it probable that some papers will now speedily be published which it will be our duty to copy, we think it is proper to insert the following from the Alexandria Gazette:

Alexandria, April 21, 1833.

MR. SNOWDEN: Having, to-day, received a dismissal from the navy of this republic, signed by "Andrew Jackson," after twenty-three years arduous service, devoted to my country, as I have with ardent zeal been, both in war and peace, I think proper to give the public the first announcement of the fact.

It was about two months ago, immediately after a full and complete examination of my conduct by a court of enquiry convened in Washington under the testimony of many persons, when I was most honorably acquitted as an officer and a gentleman, that the government paper (the Globe) proclaimed me to be a large public defaulter. I then requested a suspension of opinion upon the charge, vouching that the whole of it was infamously malicious, and that I would in time expose the nefarious measures, whereby the base accountant officer, his favorites and coadjutors, were so wretchedly aiming to fix it upon me. This promise I have so far redeemed as to be able to declare, solemnly, that I have very recently completely cancelled, by proper vouchers and testimony, the iniquitous attempt to injure me, and by it brought the department indebted to me not much short of one thousand dollars. My accounts have been most disinterestedly, and with the most unprecedented hardihood, protested against, and even the decision of the examining court utterly disregarded.

My counsel will immediately prepare a thorough and very connected statement of the manner in which I have been for nearly four years persecuted; from which the community will clearly discover that I have not had the smallest prospect of any thing like ultimate justice from the department.

I again ask of the public a little further forbearance from making any unfavorable conclusion against me. I pawn my very existence upon the fidelity and faithfulness with which the whole of my duties to my country have been fulfilled.

Those editors who are accustomed to act independently, and with proper justice to individuals, [especially one who has been dismissed from the high service of his country to gratify the most black-hearted malevolence, fraught with views of the deepest iniquity], will be pleased to give publicity to what I now subscribe my name.

MR. CLAY AND HIS COMPROMISE.
From the Lynchburg Virginian.

Some weeks ago, we published the proceedings of a meeting held at New Glasgow, thanking Mr. Clay for his successful efforts to adjust the distracting questions which divided the country, and threatened to subvert our happy institutions. A committee having been appointed to forward these resolutions to Mr. Clay, have discharged that duty; and we have been furnished with the following correspondence:

New Glasgow, Amherst, Va. March 6, 1833.

SIR—Being aware that next to that soothing influence which the consciousness of having faithfully discharged our duty, the approbation of our fellow men, brings the most gratifying consolation to our bosom—a portion of the citizens of this county assembled for the purpose of expressing their approbation of your course, and of returning you their thanks for your labors in settling those questions which recently seemed about to shake our institutions to the centre. And, in giving expression to their feelings, they adopted the enclosed preamble and resolutions, and appointed us a committee to transmit them to you. In the performance of this pleasing duty, permit us to express our admiration of that patriotism, which could raise itself above the reproaches of friends, and the denunciations of enemies, and taking a general view of the relative interests of our country, could offer up long cherished opinions upon the altar of its country's good. The blindness of prejudice and the inveteracy of party spirit may refuse to award to such patriotism that need of praise which it may deserve—but when, in the course of time, these shall have passed away, posterity and the faithful chronicles of history will do justice to its purity. With the hope that our country will long have the benefit of your talents, and that, ere long, you will be placed in a situation where they will have a more extensive operation, and with the hope that the sunshine of happiness will ever glow around you, we are, sir, yours, very respectfully,

WM. H. GARLAND,
THOS. R. BROWN,
WM. H. KNIGHT,
ED. A. CABELL.

To hon. Henry Clay.

Washington, 15th March, 1833.

GENTLEMEN—I duly received your favor of the 6th inst. communicating resolutions which were adopted by a portion of the people of Amherst, assembled at New Glasgow, in which they have been pleased to express their approbation of a measure, for the adjustment of the tariff, which I lately submitted to the senate of the United States. Whilst I feel that your gratification, in common with, I believe, a large majority of the people of the United States, with the amicable settlement of a threatening question, and your partiality towards an humble instrument in the hands of Providence, that had some agency in bringing it about, have induced you to employ very strong and warm language, I request your acceptance, and that of my fellow citizens whom you represent, of my grateful acknowledgments for the testimony which has been thus rendered. You rightly state, that next to the consciousness of having faithfully discharged our public duty, is the approbation of our fellow men. And I shall always cherish, with great satisfaction, that which you have been pleased to communicate.

A crisis had arisen in our country which threatened the public safety and extensive interests of our domestic industry. I thought it possible to avert the impending danger, from both, by a fair compromise. The bill to modify the tariff is founded on the principle of mutual concession. It consults the interests, feeling and opinions of both parties, without affording to either just cause of exultation over the other. And I sincerely hope, that hereafter it may, by restoring a good understanding and friendly sentiments between all parts of the confederacy, lead to an adjustment of the tariff, for a period beyond which it has been particularly provided for in the bill, that will be satisfactory to all.

I offer you, gentlemen, cordial assurances of my sincere regard and esteem, and of my being your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

Messrs. Wm. H. Garland, Thos. R. Brown, Wm. H. Knight and Ed. A. Cabell.

A meeting was also, some weeks ago, held in Danville, at which resolutions warmly approving of Mr. Clay's compromise bill were adopted, and ordered to be transmitted to him. The last Danville Reporter contains the following correspondence on the subject:

Danville, February 25th, 1833.

To the hon. H. Clay.

SIR—At a large meeting of the citizens of Danville, Pittsylvania county, Virginia, in which men of every political party participated, the enclosed resolutions were adopted.

It was the pleasure of this meeting, to make me the organ of communicating them to you.

I feel honored in having been made the instrument of conveying to you, the sentiments of my fellow citizens upon this subject—and assure you, that it affords me pleasure to discharge the duty imposed upon me, in this particular.

He who has the magnanimity and patriotism to sacrifice long cherished political predilections, to preserve the harmony, union and integrity of these United States, shall ever have (a paltry offering, it is true) the humble tribute of my gratitude and admiration.

I am, therefore, with considerations of high respect, your obedient servant,

W. R. CHAPLAIN.

The following reply was made by Mr. Clay to a committee appointed by a recent meeting in Danville, Va. held for the purpose of expressing their sentiments in regard to his course upon the tariff question:

Washington, 14th March, 1833.

SIR—I duly received your favor of the 25th ult. transmitting certain resolutions adopted by the citizens of Danville, Pittsylvania county, Virginia, in which they have done me the honor to express their approbation of my conduct, in respect to a certain measure, brought forward by me in the senate of the United States, to reconcile and tranquilize the country. Fully appreciating the generous motives which have prompted this expression of their feelings and sentiments, I receive it with lively and grateful sensibility. It appeared to me that the worst possible relations were getting up between the various parts of the country; that men in all sections of it were accustoming themselves to think and speak freely of a terrible event; that ultimate if not immediate civil war was seriously to be apprehended; and there was great danger, if we escaped that calamity, of the sudden overthrow of a system of policy which would have spread ruin far and near. It was under these circumstances that I presented the measure to which you refer. Having been finally adopted by large majorities of both houses of congress, I sincerely hope it may every where be received in the amicable spirit in which it was offered and passed. Of all the misfortunes that could befall our confederacy, there is none equal to that of a separation of its parts; for in its train every other would follow. It is sometimes said that liberty is preferable to union, and so it is in the abstract; but what possible guaranty is there for liberty without union? I pray that all our fellow citizens may be sensible of this undeniable truth; and that, in social intercourse, and the public councils, its influence may be forever felt.

With my thanks for the obliging manner in which you have communicated the resolutions of the people of Danville, and with assurances of high respect and esteem, I am your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Adjutant general's office, Washington, March 23d, 1833.

The following general regulation concerning the term of service and the pay of enlisted men of the army, as established by acts of congress, approved, March 2d, 1833, to increase the pay, and improve the condition of non-commissioned officers and private soldiers, is published to the army, for general information, and the guidance of all whom it may concern:—

War department, March 23d, 1832.

I. The term of service of enlisted men, is fixed by law at three years, and the premium heretofore allowed to officers, and the bounty to recruits for enlisting, are abolished, from and after the date at which the act of March 2d, 1833, may be received at the several military posts and recruiting stations. Recruits enlisted subsequently to the 2d of March for the period of five years, will be allowed to cancel such engagement—provided they consent to subscribe to a new enlistment for the term of three years, and refund the bounty received in conformity with the former law.

II. All non-commissioned officers of the army will receive the increased rate of pay from and after the 2d day of March, 1833; and all privates in the army enlisted for five years, who have "served honestly and faithfully," two or more years of their term of service, are entitled to receive full pay, at the rate of six dollars per month, from the 2d day of March, 1833, to the end of their enlistment.

III. Every private soldier enlisted for the term of three years, who serves "honestly and faithfully" the two first years of his enlistment, shall receive the $24 00 retained pay, at the next ensuing regular payment of the company; and during the third year of his term of enlistment, he will be entitled to full pay, at the rate of six dollars per month.

IV. Every able bodied musician or private soldier who shall re-enlist into his former company or regiment, within two months before, or one month after the expiration of any term of service, will be entitled to $12 00 extra pay, as a bounty, to be paid at the time he may so re-enlist, and to full pay, from and after the date of his re-enlistment; he will also be entitled to receive the pay and other allowances which shall accrue on account of the unexpired portion of his old enlistment at the period of its termination.

V. In all cases of re-enlistment prior to an unexpired term of service, the date of the new enlistment shall be substituted for the date of the old enlistment, and accordingly, will be inserted in the muster rolls, at the first muster thereafter.

VI. To ensure justice to the soldier, and to enable paymasters to ascertain the proper time at which his full pay should commence, and be continued; or when entitled to receive the twenty-four dollars retained pay; and in case of re-enlistment, the private or musician, who may be entitled to twelve dollars extra pay, it is made the special duty of company commanders, to note on their muster rolls opposite the name of the soldier, the appropriate remarks, as the case may be, to wit:—"full pay, due, from ———;" §"24 00 retained pay; due;"—"Re-enlisted, $12 00 extra pay, due;"—"Entitled to full pay, from date of re-enlistment, and also, for ——— month and ——— days, on account of prior enlistment, which expired on the ——— day of 183 —."

VII. The following table exhibits the established rates of pay allowed to non-commissioned officers and other enlisted soldiers of the army, as authorised by the law to increase their pay, and by the act to raise the regiment of dragoons, respectively approved, the 2d day of March, 1833.

Table of established rates of pay—March, 1833.

GRADE.	Pay of artillery & infantry soldiers; & of dragoons, when serving on foot.			Pay of dragoon soldiers when mounted.
	Pay per month.	Pay per annum.	Pay for 3 years.	Pay per month.	Pay per annum.	Pay for 3 years.
To the sergeant major, quartermaster sergeant, chief musician, and chief bugler—each	$16	192	576	$16	192	576
To the first sergeant of a company	15	180	540	15	180	540
Ordnance sergeants	*17	204	612
All other sergeants—each	12	144	432	12	144	432
Corporals	8	96	288	10	120	360
Buglers	6	72	216	9	108	324
Musicians	6	72	216
Farriers and blacksmiths	10	120	360	10	120	360
Artificers	10	120	360
Privates	6	72	216	8	96	288

VIII. The public interest no longer justifies the practice of granting discharges to soldiers of the army, before the expiration of their enlistment. The term of service being now limited to three years, it is required that every citizen of the United States who voluntarily enlists, will enter the army with the view to honorable employment, and a fixed determination to serve out the full period of his engagement. Accordingly, the granting of discharges to soldiers prior to the expiration of service, by way of indulgence, and, application for such discharges, are hereafter prohibited. Recruiting officers are commanded to explain these points fully to the recruits, before he enlists, and they are charged to make him distinctly understand, that if he should join the army, he must serve the full term of his engagement.

BY ORDER OF MAJOR GENERAL MACOMB.

R. JONES, adjutant general.

An act to improve the condition of the non-commissioned officers and privates of the army and marine corps of the United States, and to prevent desertion.

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That, from and after the passage of this act, all enlistments in the army of the United States, shall be for three years; and that the monthly pay of the non-commissioned officers and soldiers shall be as follows, viz: to each sergeant major, quartermaster sergeant and chief musician, sixteen dollars; to the first sergeant of a company, fifteen dollars; to all other sergeants, twelve dollars each; to each artificer, ten dollars; to each corporal, eight dollars; and to each musician and private soldier, six dollars; and that all enlistments in the marine corps, shall be for four years; and that the monthly pay of the non-commissioned officers and soldiers in said corps, shall be as follows, viz: to each sergeant major and quartermaster sergeant, seventeen dollars; to the drum major, file major, the orderly sergeants of posts, and first sergeants of guards at sea, sixteen dollars each; to all other sergeants thirteen dollars; to each corporal, nine dollars; to each musician, eight dollars; and to each private, seven dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That one dollar of the monthly pay of every musician and private soldier, shall be retained until the expiration of the two first years of their enlistment, when each shall receive the twenty-four dollars retained pay, which shall have so accrued: provided, he shall have served honestly and faithfully that portion of the term of his first enlistment.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That every able bodied musician or private soldier, who may re-enlist into his company or regiment, within two months before, or one month after, the expiration of his term of service, shall receive two months' extra pay, besides the pay and other allowances which may be due to him on account of the unexpired period of enlistment.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every able bodied musician or soldier, who shall re-enlist into his company or regiment, as specified in the third section of this act, shall receive his full pay, at the rate of six dollars per month, without any temporary deduction therefrom.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no premium to officers, for enlisting recruits, nor bounties to recruits for enlisting, shall be allowed after the passage of this act.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That no person who has been convicted of any criminal offence, shall be enlisted into the army of the United States.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the seventh section of the act, entitled "an act making further provision for the army of the United States," passed on the sixteenth May, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, be, and the same is hereby repealed so far as it applies to any enlisted soldier, who shall be convicted by a general court martial of the crime of desertion.

APPROVED, March 2, 1833.

THE DANGER OF TEA DRINKING.

From the London New Monthly Magazine.

The South Carolinians are famous for their fervid eloquence; the tariff, combined with the heat of the climate, is the source of much inspiration. Gen. Hamilton, at a late meeting at Charleston, made a speech which was received with rapturous applause. Among other things he said, "he had himself made an importation, having made a shipment of rice to the Havana, and ordered a return cargo of sugar. He would allow his importation to go into the custom house stores and wait events. He would not produce unnecessary collision; but, if our hopes of a satisfactory adjustment of the question were disappointed, he knew that his fellow citizens would go even to the death with him for his sugar." [He was interrupted by an unanimous burst of accord: "Go to the death for sugar!"] In the beginning of the revolution, the quarrel with England was about tea. The Bostonians went even to the death for tea! It is now a tax on sugar that is to produce a further split in this great continent. It is curious to think, that that great country should always be going to loggerheads about a cup of tea. Tea must be a very combustible material. We have had some ill temper shown on the subject at home, and have put it under a board of control. In the shape of slavery, it has kept this country, and its tea, in hot water for thirty years. Pope speaks of a lady who never took a dish of tea without a stratagem; and it seems she was in the right, for it appears a very dangerous thing. America has fought and bled for its cup of tea first, and is now likely to do the same for sugar to put into it; while the ill blood that has been made here, and the black blood that has been split in the colonies, altogether proves a cup of tea to be a cup brimming with strife and disunion. Its effects may be observed on old maids: tea and scandal are always coupled together; but when nations get to their cups the consequences are more serious. The Bostonians threw some hundreds of chests into the sea, and after having made that enormous cup of tea in the bay with salt water, peace was unknown for many years. Now we shall have a series of combats among hogheads of sugar, more inflammatory than barrels of gunpowder.

MILITARY CELEBRATION IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

From the correspondence of the Portland Daily Advertiser.

Charleston, April 1, 1853.

It is April-fools day, and I have been to see the nullifiers play the fool, and have been exceedingly amused, though the rain has been pouring down in torrents, and the mud and slush are over our shoes. The nullifiers have had, and are yet having a grand parade. The volunteers of Charleston have turned out, in full uniform—and with all the show of war, war, horrid war. The truth is they are becoming crazier and crazier. Their late success has made them fully mad—and for aught I see, in a short time, Uncle Sam will have to handcuff the men and lock up the boys.

This morning, according to order from brigadier gen. Hamilton, the volunteers of Charleston, nullifying volunteers, who were to have fought like tigers in the event of war, and who are good looking fellows enough, but who probably love gun powder no better than Yankees—assembled to the number of—about five hundred! There was the republican artillery, with brass pieces—the cadet artillery—Jefferson artillery—(alas for Jefferson)—the Pinckney artillery, the Scotch infantry, riflemen, and I know not how many other companies of the 20,000, who were preparing to flog the whole United States of America, all arranged up and down Meeting street, with horses, ordnance and servants, by 12 A. M. Soon general Hamilton, emperor of the nation of South Carolina, the great god of war in this quarter—a Bonaparte kind of man by the way, with black whiskers, not tall, but compact and stout-bodied, rode up and down the ranks on a fine bay charger. He had on two epaulettes, yellow plumes, and blue cockade, and drove a horse as well as any Virginian horse racer. Anon there came along amid the sounding of fifes and drums, and trumpets, and the waving of colors, and swords, his excellency, governor Hayne, followed by five aids, all in buff kerseymere breeches, well sworded, well epauletted and well horsed. The line of march was soon formed, and they, the military, in the middle of the street, and the lords of Carolina on horse, and we the people, and they the slaves on foot, soon made our way to the citadel, there to talk of liberty and death and Carolina. During all this nothing happened except that some of the horses attached to the heavy ordnance threw off the negroes from their backs into a soft mud bed, and some of the gallant cavaliers in uniform had hard work to bridle up their snorting steeds, terrified as they were by the music of the black band, and the glittering parade of great guns and little guns.

*Being five dollars, in addition to his pay in the line, as authorized by the act, approved, April 5th, 1832.

Arrived at the citadel into which marched the military rank and file—and there we the people, oversetting and nullifying the state guard by the way, who in vain attempted to keep us out. The citadel had lost the awning which over-arched the area. The medallions were all there. The palm-trees were all there. The imitation flags were also there. The area below was pretty well occupied with the military. Uniforms of all colors handsomely variegated that part of the house. The ladies bordered the galleries, and we, the people, did as we could, among the multitudes in the portico. Soon governor Hayne came forth from a balcony about 20 feet high, overshadowed by two tall palm-trees. His five aids came forth with him, one bearing in his hand a flag.

Governor Hayne then addressed the audience for about fifteen minutes, or rather his "fellow soldiers" as he termed them. He told them that South Carolina had effected the late change in the tariff—that she had stood alone, and never quailed, when the south had deserted her—when a part of her citizens had betrayed her, and when the whole union seemed to be preparing war against her. She had done her duty. She had beaten off the myriads of power. She had destroyed the American System—had given it its death blow, and had achieved a glorious victory over tyranny and oppression, over the men who had been taken from her her property to pay their taxes, and who would have added murder to robbery, by sweeping her cities, desolating her fields, and destroying her citizens. Then taking the flag from the hands of the aid, he shook open the folds, and displayed the arms of the state, and Carolina's palmetto—and large gold letters engraved upon it—"liberty, it must be preserved" (though a hundred black slaves were gnawing about)—and after making some fine remarks on the value of the gift, as the highest honor he could bestow, handed it to a staging some feet below him, to brigadier general Hamilton, as commander of the volunteers of South Carolina. During this speech, which was delivered with gov. Hayne's usual eloquence, the volunteers were constantly hurraing, clapping, vociferating and thumping their muskets on the floor.

General Hamilton received the standard from the executive, whom the state had made its organ, said that he valued it dearly, but valued it more presented by such hands—and after exclaiming the union, and exhibiting chivalry, Carolina attachment to liberty, Carolina activity, and calling his old friend gen. Jackson, whom he made president, "an infuriate despot," who would murder Carolina's sons and whose myriads were ready at his command to make the streets of Charleston run blood—avowed, that Carolina had not a gun, nor a magazine of gun powder, nor a piece of ordnance mounted when the tariff was nullified, yet in five weeks she had four thousand men, enough to take the capitol, and powder enough to blow it up! Hurrah for Jackson! Men, girls and boys clapped this sentiment. Hurrah for Carolina! Hurrah for Hamilton!

General Hamilton then handed over the flag to one ensign Frost, who received it and made a speech which I could not hear.

When general Hamilton waved the flag, the volunteers clapped beyond all calculation. He and Hayne were both received with great enthusiasm. They are commanders-in-chief of the hearts of the nullifiers, as well as of their forces. I could not but note, that when general Hamilton avowed he had men enough to take, and powder enough to blow up the capitol, a new torrent of rain immediately poured down on his bare head, for his cap was off, as he addressed the soldiers, but I did not see that it cooled the fire within, for not long after he said, "all the land our enemy could stand upon in Carolina, was land enough to make his grave."

This afternoon we are to have a salute of a hundred guns near the battery. The military with general Hamilton at their head, are retreating from the dinner at the citadel, and if the rain has not sufficiently cooled their courage, will finish off the day in as fiery mode as they have begun. Truly the nullifiers are odd men. I know not what to make of them. They have heads, ears and bodies like the rest of us—and are no monsters in form, but they talk so boldly and act so madly, that I can't but think it would be a good plan to induce the union men to go to Alabama and Mississippi, and settle on government lands, and then make this "the Bedlam" of the union, a house for mad politicians, and give gen. Hamilton the command. Though I have been here but a fortnight, I have seen so much of arms, and heard so much of war, that I sigh for a land of peace.—Charleston is too much of a camp for me. B.

MANDAMUS FROM THE SUPREME COURT.

From the N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

The following is a copy of the mandamus ex parte Martha Bradstreet, issued by the supreme court of the United States. It is presumed to be the first of its nature ever issued by that tribunal, and as such may be interesting to the gentlemen of the legal profession.

United States of America, ss.

The president of the United States of America to the L. S. honorable Alfred Conkling, judge of the district court of the United States for the northern district of New York, greeting.

Whereas, one Martha Bradstreet hath heretofore commenced and prosecuted, in your court, several certain real actions, or writs of right, in your court lately pending between the said Martha Bradstreet, demandant, and the following named tenants, severally and respectively, to wit: Apollos Cooper, and others. [Here follow the names of many other persons.]

And whereas heretofore to wit, at a session of the supreme court of the United States, held at Washington on the second Monday of January in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, it appeared upon the complaint of the said Martha Bradstreet, among other things, that at a session of your said court lately before held by you, according to law, all and singular the said writs of right then and there pending before your said court, were, by the orders of your said court, upon the several motions of the tenants aforesaid, dismissed, for the reason that there was no averment of the pecuniary value of the lands demanded by the said demandant, in the several counts filed and exhibited by the said demandant against the several tenants aforesaid; which orders of your said court, so dismissing the said actions, were against the will and consent of said demandant.

Whereupon the supreme court, at the instance of the said demandant, granted a rule requiring you to show cause if any you had, among other things, why a writ of mandamus from the said supreme court, should not be awarded and issued to you commanding you to reinstate and proceed to try and adjudge, according to the law and right of the case, the several writs of right aforesaid, and the mises therein joined: And whereas, at the late session of the said supreme court, held at Washington on the second Monday of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, you certified and returned to the said supreme court, together with the said rule, that after the mises had been joined in the several causes mentioned in the said rule, motions were made therein, on the part of the tenants, that the same should be dismissed, upon the ground that the counts respectively contained no allegation of the value of the matter in dispute, and that it did not therefore appear, by the pleadings that the causes were within the jurisdiction of the court; that in conformity with what appeared to be the uniform language of the national courts upon the question, and your own views of the law, and in accordance especially with the several decisions in the circuit court, for the third circuit, [see 4 Wash. c. c. rep. 482, and ib. 624] you granted their motions:—And assuming that the causes were rightly dismissed, it follows, of course, that you ought not to be required to reinstate them unless leave ought also to be granted to the demandant to amend her counts: And whereas, afterwards, to wit, at the same session of the said supreme court last aforesaid, upon consideration of your said return and of the cause shewn by you therein against the said rules being made absolute and against the awarding and issuing the said writ of mandamus, and upon consideration of the arguments of counsel, as well on your behalf, shewing cause as aforesaid, as on behalf of said demandant, in support of said rule, it was considered by the said supreme court, that you had certified and returned to the said court an insufficient cause for having dismissed the said actions, and against the awarding and issuing of the said writ of mandamus, pursuant to the rule aforesaid; the said supreme court, being of opinion, and having determined and adjudged upon the matter aforesaid, that in cases where the demand is not for money, and the nature of the action does not require the value of the thing demanded to be stated in the declaration, the practice of the said supreme court and the courts of the United States is to allow the value to be given in evidence: that in pursuance of this practice, the demandant in the suits dismissed by order of the judge of the district court, had a right to give the value of the property demanded in evidence, either at or before the trial of the cause, and would have a right to give it in evidence in the said supreme court, consequently that she cannot be legally prevented from bringing her cases before the said supreme court: and it was also then and there considered by the said supreme court, that the peremptory writ of the United States issue requiring and commanding you, the said judge of the said district court, to reinstate, and to proceed to try and adjudge according to the law and right of the case, the several writs of right, and the mises therein joined, lately pending in your said court, between the said Martha Bradstreet, demandant, and Apollos Cooper, and others, the tenants aforesaid: Therefore you are hereby commanded and enjoined, that immediately after the receipt of this writ, and without delay, you reinstate, and proceed to try and adjudge, according to the law and right of the case, the several writs of right, and the mises therein joined, lately pending in your said court, between the said Martha Bradstreet, demandant, and the said Apollos Cooper, and others, the tenants herein above-named, so that complaint be not again made to the said supreme court, and that you certify perfect obedience and due execution of this writ, to the said supreme court, to be held on the first Monday of August next. Hereof fail not at your peril, and have then this writ.

Witness the hon. JOHN MARSHALL, chief justice of said supreme court, the second Monday of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three.

WM. THOMAS CARROLL,
clerk of the supreme court of the United States.

CASE OF TOBIAS WATKINS.

We borrow the following neat, and, no doubt, faithful abstract from the Baltimore American of Wednesday last:

The National Intelligencer of yesterday contains the opinion of the United States circuit court for the circuit, in the case of the U. States vs. Tobias Watkins. It occupies nearly five of the spacious columns of that paper, but the particular points of the decision are few and easily abstracted for the use of the general reader. The reasonings and authorities cited are for the lawyers alone.

Watkins was sentenced, on his conviction in August, 1829, to three terms of imprisonment, of three months each, making nine months in all, and to pay fines to the amount of $3,050. The court did not order him to stand committed until the fines were paid, leaving the United States to the civil process of writ and execution to recover the amount. Writs of execution against the goods of the defendant (Ji. fa.) were issued and returned without success (nulla bona); and then in February, 1830, writs of execution against the body (ex. sc.), were issued, returnable at the May term. The writs were never returned, and the defendant remained in prison. Nothing appeared on the records until January 10th, ult. when the papers were filed by the late marshal, endorsed "Cepi, delivered over to any successor in office."

On the 14th of January last, the defendant sued out a writ of habeas corpus in the supreme court of the United States, as heretofore published. The court granted the rule, and on argument made it absolute, and granted the writ. The defendant was accordingly discharged, but was immediately arrested upon new writs (of ex. sc.), without purporting to be alias (writs reciting the issuing of the former writs unsuccessfully), and without having revised the judgment by scire facias, although several years have elapsed.

Upon the return of these new writs, the motion was made to commit, which was resisted by the counsel for Watkins, upon the following technical grounds.

1st. That the defendant could not lawfully be arrested and held in custody upon these writs, after having been taken and discharged upon the former writs.

2dly. That these writs ought not to have been issued without previous scire facias, more than a year and a day having elapsed between the issuing of them and of the next preceding writs.

3dly. That the fines were excessive, and amount to a sentence of perpetual imprisonment.

The court decided in favor of the defendant on the first point, which made the discussion of the other two unnecessary.

The opinion of the court placed the discharge of the defendant upon the general principle, that no man should be arrested twice for the same cause. Watkins having been arrested on a ca. sc. and discharged upon the return of the habeas corpus was legally out of arrest; the only exception to the general rule being a case of escape, in which, by legal construction, the prisoner is still under lawful arrest. The United States might have had the full benefit of their judgment and execution if the marshal had duly returned the first writ of ca. sc. and the counsel had appeared for the United States, and moved the commitment. But having neglected their rights on that occasion, they are estopped from pleading the negligence of their agents, and the retention of the prisoner beyond the return day of that writ was illegal.

An objection was made in behalf of the United States that this rule applies to civil cases, and that the present being a criminal case was not within the rule.

The court ruled, that the process which the United States sued out to recover the fine, is founded upon the law and practice of Maryland adopted in the district. That law, in granting such writs for the recovery of fines, requires that "such proceeding should be had thereon, as in cases when similar writs are issued on judgments obtained in personal suits." The United States, therefore, proceed civily in the recovery of fines, by the express grants. The supreme court decided on the application for the habeas corpus that the United States are bound, by the Maryland practice, to proceed civily.

For these technical reasons the motion to commit was overruled, the writs ordered to be quashed, and the defendant Watkins discharged.

In this abstract we have, as the reader will observe, noticed only the leading points, not precisely in the order of the opinion, but briefly condensed for the sake of perspicuity. The court were unanimous in the opinion.

COMMODORE TUCKER.

For the following interesting sketch of this veteran, lately deceased, we are indebted to a Boston paper.

Died—in Bremen, Me. Com. SAMUEL TUCKER. He was born 1st November, 1747, O. S. at Marblehead. At the age of 11, he was placed by his father, a respectable ship-master, on board of the Royal George, a British frigate. At 17, he performed one of the most heroic acts of his life, in rescuing a schooner and crew from a Saline and Algerine frigate. In rescuing this vessel a day's sail from Lisbon, he was compelled to force the cowardly master (who was intoxicated at the time) below; and as Tucker's brother was mate, the command devolved on him; but he fearing to take the helm, our young hero seized it himself, luffed up under the bow of the windward frigate, being between the two, and having previously arranged additional sail, and doused the signal lantern at the yard arm, he was for some time exposed to a shower of grape within almost pistol shot. But by a series of tacking and retacking, the cool courage and superior seamanship of Tucker, brought both crew and vessel safely within the harbor of Lisbon the next day. No sooner was he anchored, than he went below, and with an apology for the course he was compelled to pursue, gave up the vessel to her lawful commander. But this cowardly and ungrateful man, placed him under a false pretence, on board of a British frigate then in port. The captain of the frigate was not slow in learning the true particulars of the case, and the result was, that the commander of the frigate took the first opportunity to reward Tucker's merit by promotion, and from this he attained the rank of one of the most accomplished ship masters in this country.

In the British service he studied the naval tactics of the day with great success, and his knowledge of their system gave him great advantage over them afterward. Just before the revolutionary war, he sailed as master of the ship Phenix, from Boston for London, and not long after his arrival, learned the commencement of hostilities, and the news of the Bunker-hill fight. Sometime before his departure from London, as he was one day conversing with an American captain, (Folger) he saw a number of boxes of arms, &c. directed "Boston," and as the officer inspecting their shipment passed, Tucker observed in his hearing, that "he would go 100 miles barefoot if those arms could so far mistake their direction as to arrive at Cambridge instead of Boston." Not many days after this, he was offered the command of a British armed vessel, or a commission under Gage, which he indignantly refused.

Late in September, 1775, he took passage in a ship belonging to the celebrated Robert Morris; and to his great presence of mind and superior seamanship, (which saved both ship and lives in a tremendous gale home), was Tucker indebted for that introduction to Mr. Morris, which secured to him ever after, the active patronage of that distinguished statesman. He reported himself to the camp of Washington, at Cambridge, and there received a commission as lieutenant under his friend col. Glover, even before he visited his own family. While at Cambridge he had occasion to observe a singular coincidence. The very boxes of arms, &c. that he saw in London, marked "Boston," had been captured by captain Manley off cape Ann, and were then actually before his eyes.

He had been at home but a few weeks, awaiting the orders of his commander, when, as he was amusing himself by catching some small fish through holes in the ice, not far from his own house, an officer in full dress rode up in great haste, and inquired of him "if he knew where the hon. Samuel Tucker lived?" The hon. Samuel Tucker, (muttered he, with much emphasis on the word honorable), it must be one of the family in Salem. The officer replied, that could not be, as he heard col. Glover direct Gen. Washington to that part of Marblehead near where they now were. "My name is Sam Tucker," was the reply, "and I am the only Sam Tucker hereabout; so, sir, I think there must be some mistake in the name." The officer began to suspect that he had found his man, which Tucker as resolutely denied; and after a most amusing dialogue, on personal identity, Tucker sued for a truce, by inviting the officer into his house, and after a glass or two of old particular and a cold slice, the officer, whose orders would not admit of delay, left the package and took French leave, knowing from some circumstances concealed from Tucker, that he had found the rightful owner. Unwilling to break the seal of so important a package, Tucker in the evening invited his friends col. Orne and Mr. Gerry to meet him, to whom he communicated all the circumstances. Col. Orne without hesitation opened the package, and found Tucker's first commission in the navy signed by Geo. Washington, with his private seal attached, with two blank commissions for his lieutenants! These commissions was to the command of the FRANKLIN (with a y instead of an i) remarkable for its brevity and unostentatious appearance, and is now in possession of the family, with many other valuable papers from Jefferson, Adams, and the other distinguished men of that day. Not long after this, Manley being sick at Beverly, Tucker received a commission as commodore, signed by Sam'l Adams as chairman of the naval committee, and others. This is said to be the first written commission as commodore, in the gallant little navy of our revolution. No commander was more successful than Tucker in all the various situations in which he was placed, and although he was engaged frequently with vessels of superior force, he always conquered. Time will not now permit me to enumerate the battles he fought, some of which with a courage bordering on desperation.

The war left him in affluent circumstances, and it was then thought an honor to attend the levees of this gallant officer. Under such circumstances he was too generous and patriotic to press his claim on government; and although the justice of it has since been acknowledged by at least one secretary of war, it remains unpaid. With a liberality and carelessness characteristic of an old sailor, he loaned his name to his friends for large sums and soon found himself stripped of his property.

Although a former secretary of war had reported the sum of 1,200 dollars a year to be his due from government, he remained without a cent from government, until a few years since, when he received $30 per month; this last winter the strain of ingratitude was partially wiped away, by an annuity of $500 per year settled on him by government.

The Portland Advertiser, after noticing the death of the "tough old commodore," on the 10th March 1833, says—

Two anecdotes of captain Tucker, I have heard from good authority, and suppose them to be authentic, which I submit to your disposal. When Mr. Adams was sent to France, in 1777, to negotiate a treaty of alliance with that nation, capt. Tucker was employed to convey the ambassador in the public ship which he commanded. The captain had positive orders to make no delay for the purpose of taking any prizes from the enemy, and run no risk by any conflict on the passage that he could avoid, but to convey his passenger with as much expedition and safety as possible. British vessels were frequently seen on the passage, which would make fine prizes, and were suffered to pass unmolested. The officers began to importune the captain to improve his advantages; but he could not disobey his orders. At length a fine English ship appeared at a distance in good weather, and the officers desired the captain to go below, and they would take charge of the ship. Having got the command they love down for their expected prize. The enemy's vessel made no attempt to escape, but as the Americans approached, suddenly opened her port-holes and prepared for action. It was an armed ship, and of equal size with the American. An officer went below and informed the captain they had got into difficulty and must have his assistance. Tucker came on deck, saw their situation, and gave orders to prepare for action. He then went to the cabin and told Mr. Adams that they were under the necessity of an encounter, and that he must keep where he was. The envoy chose to go on deck. Tucker told him no, he must not expose himself to danger. He then ran to the deck and speedily prepared for action. As the ships drew near each other, the enemy fired a broadside which took off one of Tucker's upper spars, and it fell suddenly upon the deck. The captain looked at the spar, and very near where it fell, stood Mr. Adams; he had found a gun and with his knife was fixing the flint. The enemy, seeing they had not disabled the American, hauled down their colors, before captain Tucker had fired a shot. He immediately hailed them and directed an officer to come on board. The officer came, and looking round, says, "If we had known you had been no stronger we would not have submitted so." "Very well," says Tucker, "we take no advantage, go back and we will try it out." "If I have such men to deal with," said the officer, "I will let it go as it is." Captain Tucker took possession of his valuable prize, and arrived safely in France.

At the time of our difficulties with the government of France, in 1798 and '99, when our infant navy rose suddenly into existence, there were numerous applicants for navy appointments. The most of them persons who had been in the naval service during the revolution. Captain Tucker, with characteristic modesty kept at home. It was well known that he was a good officer, and that president Adams was his friend. "A short time before the principal naval appointments were made, it was published in the newspapers at Philadelphia that captain Tucker was dead. Announced in the usual manner, and no one questioned the fact. The principal officers of the navy very soon received their appointments. It was afterwards found that capt. Tucker was living, and an office was offered him. But it would place him below those who had been his inferiors in rank; and he refused to accept it.

FINANCES OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Report of the committee of ways and means to whom was referred so much of the governor's message as relates to the subject of finance. Mr. Read, chairman. Read in the house of representatives, March 23, 1833.

The committee of ways and means, to whom was referred so much of the executive message as relates to the subject of finance, report:

That they have had the subject under consideration, and have not failed to perceive, that under existing circumstances, it is a subject of all absorbing interest to the community. The committee has also noticed, that in reference to this subject, much misapprehension and error is pervading the minds of many citizens of the commonwealth; that being a subject too abstruse and complicated, to be fully investigated in the time that can be spared from the ordinary avocations of life, by the great majority of the people, the timid politician and the cursory observer have taken such an indistinct view of its outlines, as to alarm themselves and their neighbors; while the interested and designing politician has seized upon it as a political lever, to move the passions and raise a general panic. The subject of finances not having been generally understood, and often having been wilfully misrepresented, some despondency has been felt, and some fears have been and perhaps are entertained, of state insolvency, or at least of impaired credit and perplexing embarrassments.

The executive department informs us, that the treasury at the present time, "exhibits a state of prosperity highly propitious to the credit of the commonwealth," and "dispenses with the necessity, at present, of forming plans for the future increase of the state revenues." And your committee cannot but congratulate the house, upon the unexampled prosperity of our financial condition, as demonstrated by the fact, that the requisite loans are obtained, at a higher premium than has ever been received by the similar operations of any state or country; and upon the immeasurable benefits, which are reasonably and confidently anticipated to result to the community, from the expenditure of large sums of money in public improvement. To counteract the deleterious effects of misapprehension, misrepresentation and error, upon a subject, though not generally understood, yet universally and personally interesting to every citizen of the state—to show that there is no foundation in fact, for apprehension and despondency, and to correct the errors afloat in reference to this subject—to corroborate the sentiments expressed by the fiscal department—to compare the resources of the commonwealth with the liabilities incurred, and thereby exhibit the solid foundation on which the public credit is based —and to justify the congratulations tendered, by demonstrating the truth of the position, that the national wealth of Pennsylvania has not been diminished, but on the contrary, has been increased and permanently secured, (provided the original design be consummated) by the expenditure, or rather, by the investment of large sums of money; have been embraced in the purposes of your committee, on the present occasion. In what degree these purposes and intentions have been realized, is most respectfully submitted to the house, and to the country.

As the ordinary revenues of the state, independent of the additional supplies provided by the act of 1830, are more than sufficient to meet the ordinary expenses of the government, it is not deemed necessary by the committee to consider the subject of finance, in any other point of view than, 1st, with reference to those measures which have induced a resort to a system of loans, for the purpose of maintaining the character and dignity of the state in its national capacity, and of increasing the wealth and promoting the prosperity and happiness of its citizens in their individual capacities. And, secondly, in reference to those measures rendered necessary to secure the payment of the interest on those loans.

Much difficulty has occurred in the science of political economy for the want of technical terms, and undisputed definitions. The term wealth, for instance, has been applied to states or nations, and has been understood by the great mass of mankind in the same sense in which it is used when applied to an individual, when no two things can be more distinct than the wealth of a nation and the wealth of an individual. He therefore who talks about national wealth without making the proper distinction, will just as certainly come to an erroneous conclusion as he who leaves out one term in a mathematical calculation. It has been perhaps unfortunate that the term wealth was ever applied to a nation, or that some other term had not been invented and appropriated to the idea, which we attach to the term individual wealth. But as we have only one word for two distinct ideas, it becomes necessary to the correct understanding of a subject requiring its use, to give clear and distinct definitions of its meaning, when used for different purposes. Individual wealth is such an accumulation of property as will enable a man to procure the necessities and comforts of life without his own labor, mental or manual. Every man thus situated is termed wealthy, while no man, who is obliged to cultivate his farm, superintend mercantile operations, or exercise his trade or profession, whatever may be his ability to acquire property, can be so denominated. Individual wealth may consist of lands, money, or other property; but in order to constitute wealth, it must be convertible into the necessities and comforts of life at the pleasure of the possessor.

If a man has millions of acres of land, which he can neither sell nor rent; or if he is master of the mines of Mexico, and can neither loan his money nor exchange it for the necessities and comforts of life, he is absolutely destitute of wealth. So he may, by means of a profession or otherwise, possess the ability to acquire those necessities and comforts in the greatest profusion, yet if his income does not accumulate so as to enable him to receive them, by the use, sale or exchange of property, he is equally destitute of wealth. Thus we have a correct definition and perception of the term, as applied to an individual. In this sense of the term, a nation (considered as it should be, a unity, with a unity of rights, possessions and interests), cannot possess wealth. No nation ever has accumulated, or ever can accumulate so much property, as would furnish it with the necessities and comforts of life, for a month, or a week, without industry. A nation cannot sustain existence, as such, without labor; it cannot rent or sell its territory without committing political suicide; and if it had mountains of gold and silver, the shipping of the world constantly employed, could not import the necessities and comforts of life required, nor would the surplus productions of all other nations constitute the necessary supplies. It is evident, therefore, that a nation must sustain itself by its labor, its active industry, or it must cease to be. It cannot, for the shortest period of time, rely upon accumulated treasure; it cannot possess wealth, as that term is applied to an individual. What then is national wealth? It is a capacity to acquire, by its own exertions, the necessities and comforts of life. It is rather a faculty, than a possession. It does not depend on the greater or smaller amount of the precious metals, (the representatives of necessities), that may be deposited in a public treasury, nor does it depend on the accumulation of surplus productions, as that surplus can never bear any comparison with the wants of a nation or state. It may be affected in some degree by salubrity of climate and fertility of soil, but it cannot chiefly depend on these; or else why do we see Holland, (originally a cold and unproductive marsh), overflowing with national wealth and prosperity, while Spain, with the finest climate and most luxuriant soil, is poor and weak, and wretched in a national point of view? Why do we see New Hampshire with its long winters, its rugged climate and its sterile granite surface, enjoying a high degree of national wealth, while Georgia and the Carolinas are groaning under the pressure of national poverty and threatened bankruptcy, notwithstanding their advantages of climate and productiveness of soil? It is the difference in national industry, it is labor, the employment of the bone, the sinews, the faculties of man that has produced this difference of condition. What has multiplied the population, enhanced the value of land, increased the agricultural productions, doubled the necessities and comforts of life, and trebled national wealth and resources in the states of New York and Ohio, but the new impetus given? the active stimulant applied to national industry, by the loaning and expenditure of large sums of public money in the construction of valuable improvements? thereby aiding and fostering individual enterprise.

National industry may be more materially affected by measures of government, and before we determine what effect any measure may have, in respect to national wealth, we must institute the inquiry, what will be its influence on national industry? The same measure may promote both individual and national wealth, but not necessarily. The encouragement of lotteries, of the manufacture and distribution of ardent spirits, or of a slave trade, may, usually does produce great individual wealth; while the consequences to national prosperity are deleterious in the extreme. This results from the paralyzing influence of these and similar pursuits on honest industry, the cultivation of the earth, and the development of its exhaustless treasures. The sentence has been pronounced, that "man shall eat his bread in the sweat of his brow," and if some individuals have escaped the penalty, no nation can avoid the sentence. The earth is the only fountain, labor, mental or manual, the only cause of national wealth; it does not depend on local situation, luxuriance of soil, the possession of capital, or surplus productions, as has been stewn.

It follows then as a sequence, that whatever measures promote the industry, necessarily increase the national wealth of Pennsylvania. If she expends a million of dollars in public improvements, or otherwise, and thereby increases industry to the amount of a million and a half, she is the gainer by half a million, notwithstanding the removal of the specie from her vaults. That active industry has been promoted and increased in this state, by an amount which is represented by many millions of dollars, by the construction of our public works, no one will pretend to deny, as it must be admitted, that while the labor was being performed on those works, the creation of a home market perceptibly augmented the question of mechanical and agricultural industry in the commonwealth. Thus it would appear that our works, even now while in an unfinished state, have actually increased the wealth of the state, notwithstanding the amount of debt. Even war, with all its desolating and lamentable consequences, may, and often does augment the wealth of a nation, by administering a powerful stimulant to industry, although a money expended perishes in the rising, and leaves nothing behind but the monuments of folly or ambition. The English wars furnish striking examples of this truth. Industry is promoted by the additional demand for labor, by calling into action the dormant energies of the nation: for every nation possesses a vast amount of unexpended labor, or in other words, a vast number of people who are idle a part or the whole of their time. But your committee are not the advocates of war for this purpose, being well aware that the nameless evils of a belligerent attitude greatly overbalance the benefits of increased industry and national wealth. Not so with expenditures for public improvements; they possess all the advantages of a war expenditure, with none of its disadvantages; and hence there is not an instance on record of a public improvement without the augmentation of national wealth, that is, an increased capacity to acquire the necessities and comforts of life.

Nothing can be clearer, than that independently of the labor of construction, and the incalculable amount of active industry created in the development and distribution of our mineral treasures, agricultural and mechanical labor has been increased, an amount sufficient to produce the necessities of life, for so many laborers as have been actually employed on those works and in the coal trade. Because the necessities of life have not become scarce, and if they bear a higher price, this is not attributable to scarcity, but to the increased facilities of sending them away for foreign consumption. It therefore follows that there has been a greater production; consequently Pennsylvania has increased her national wealth. The better access to foreign markets will continue "in all time to come" to stimulate the farmer and mechanic, to extend cultivation and multiply productions, presenting new and strong motives to employ idle men and unexerted strength, in all places abundant. And the patriot luxuriates in the anticipation of the countless blessings to result from his philanthropic exertions. National wealth consists in the production, not in the accumulation of the necessities and comforts of life, as some writers have supposed—indeed the direct and palpable effect of accumulation is to encourage idleness, paralyse industry and decrease a nation's wealth, always, and under all circumstances, depending on the amount of labor, compared to the number of persons to be sustained. National wealth is not necessarily affected by the existence of a national debt, which may, indeed, cause the wealth to flow in a different channel, but cannot diminish its amount, unless it becomes so enormous, (as is the case with the English debt), that the expenses of collecting the interest from one portion, and distributing it to another portion of the citizens, becomes oppressive to the people. In any other case, national wealth and prosperity are no more affected by the existence of a national debt, than is the wealth of an individual, by withdrawing his funds from one bank and depositing them in another. Your committee does not adopt the maxim that "a national debt is a national blessing," the maxim is not true in the abstract. A national debt may be a great national curse, but it is not necessarily so. A government or nation, or state, is an artificial being, created for the benefit, and intended to concentrate the energies of the people. An agent or factor, the mere creature of an indefinite number of human beings, and bound to promote the interests of the principal, from whom it derives its existence. It might as well be contended that an individual can in no case promote his own interests, by a transaction necessarily incurring a debt, as that the agent of the people cannot, under any circumstances, advance the general interest of society, by measures resulting in a state debt. It is of no importance what amount of liability is incurred, by the corporate artificial agent, provided it promotes the prosperity and happiness of the people. Any debt contracted by a state, within the compass of its resources, and the proceeds judiciously expended in bettering the condition of the people, by creating domestic, and opening communications with foreign markets, and in stimulating national industry, is a national blessing; or more correctly speaking, the concomitants of the debt are national blessings. Such in the opinion of the committee, is the state debt of Pennsylvania.

Some have been alarmed at the idea of "bequeathing to posterity an onerous public debt." This idea, as it is commonly received, is a mere chimaera of the imagination. The thing is utterly, naturally impossible. The credit side, as well as the debt side of the account, must descend to a subsequent generation. The effect of a national debt may be, to require one portion of posterity to pay a sum of money, or the interest of it, to another portion of posterity. If the money is to be paid by our descendants, an equal sum is to be received by them. If the money be by us expended, in permanent improvements, those of our descendants who may be required to pay will have received a valuable consideration, and will therefore be indebted; and those who receive will be of the same generation, and will have inherited the boon from the same age which transmitted the liability to pay. Where, then is our injustice complained of? There is not the slightest. To require future generations to pay for us, to our use, is an impossibility. A nation is a unity, and the liability of one integral part to pay to another, cannot, in the slightest degree, affect the wealth of that unity.

Your committee are anxious further to remove the prejudices that may, and undoubtedly do exist on the subject, by considering it in a strictly pecuniary point of view, and by presenting the public expenditures merely as an investment, isolated from all the benefits anticipated in reference to the character of the state, the effect on national industry, the enhanced value of real and personal property, and increase of individual wealth. In doing so, however, your committee will take it for granted that the original design of the fathers of our improvement system, is to be carried into effect; that the waters of the Delaware and Lake Erie are to be united. The "splendid project," it has been said, was given to the "splendid project" by the annual convention of 1825. But what gave the first impetus to the spirit of improvement in Pennsylvania? What roused the people on the subject? What induced their primary movements—the election of delegates to assemble in convention? The notorious fact, palpably visible to the most superficial observer, that while public improvements were projected and being executed in New York, Ohio, Maryland, N. Jersey, and many other states, it would be utterly impossible for Pennsylvania, (possessing as she did, wealth and resources beyond any state in the union), to maintain her high character and "noble bearing," in the sisterhood of the states, if she longer neglected to join in the march of improvement. Penetrated with these views, and instructed by the people, with scarcely a dissenting voice, the delegates—the sages of the commonwealth—asssembled in convention at Harrisburg. In that convention, comprising, as is universally acknowledged, the collected wisdom of the commonwealth, was conceived the spirit of improvement which had agitated and moved the people—was digested and arranged, a system of improvement highly interesting to the state, and without which, she must have gradually sunk into obscurity and contempt; must have become, comparatively speaking, a dreary and a desolate waste, in the midst of rich, flourishing and happy republics. It was more a matter of necessity, than choice, that urged Pennsylvania into these measures. The convention of 1825 saw, with a prophetic vision, the proud monuments of a nation's glory—the splendid improvements—springing into being along our borders, to the north and the south, to the east and the west, the direct tendency of which must be, to paralyse our national industry, to cramp our energies, to reduce the value of our lands, to prevent the settlement of our forests, to entice away our citizens, and in a measure, to depopulate our country; unless these injurious, these appalling results could be counteracted by corresponding improvements in the physical and political condition of Pennsylvania. It was not a spirit of envy, but of honorable and glorious competition, and a necessity of self-preservation, that actuated the convention in its examination of the premonitory symptoms of disease and decay in the body politic, and induced the search, the discovery and the recommendation of the only antidote that could restore us to political health and vigor. That antidote to premature decay and national dotage, was nothing short of the construction of an entire, uninterrupted water communication between the river Delaware and Lake Erie, "by the best and most feasible route."

That such was, in truth and in fact, the object designed by the original projectors and friends of the internal improvement system of Pennsylvania, your committee need not stop to demonstrate; other, than by a reference to the proceedings of the convention, to the responses of the people, to numerous acts of assembly on your statute books, and to all the records and documentary evidence on the subject, in the legislative archives, and Pennsylvania library. This policy has been approved and sustained by successive legislatures, coming fresh from the people, down to the present time—temporarily suspended, it is admitted, by sectional feelings and local prejudices, but in the main adhered to and cherished by the sovereign people. And especially too, when we reflect and are satisfied, that the motive and the necessity which now urge us on to the final completion of the works originally designed, are stronger, and more imperative than those which first awakened our slumbering energies, and warned us of the dangerous consequences of continued inaction. When we reflect on the amount of treasure already expended, which must be accounted as measurably lost, if the improvements are to terminate with the present contracts, and the system to be abandoned; when it is recollected that such abandonment would perpetuate an onerous system of taxation on our citizens; without the hope of relief or mitigation; when we anticipate the deeper notification we should feel at the taunts and sneers of our neighbors, after having abandoned our boasted system of rival improvements, than we should have experienced if we had never been roused from our lethargy. When it is remembered, that a few of the public spirited citizens of Philadelphia, have within the last few years, expended more than eight millions in public works, and that the great state of Pennsylvania possessing, as she does, tenable property to the value of more than three hundred millions, cannot shrink from an expenditure treble the amount of that of one of her towns; that our improvements, when finished, are to extend to the remotest corners of the commonwealth, and to unlock the agricultural and mineral treasures of every portion of our territory; that the consumption and demand for mineral coal outrun the supply, and will continue to do so for half a century to come; that Pennsylvania must furnish that indispensable article of life to nearly all the states in the confederacy, and to the British dominions on the north; that the coal beds of Pennsylvania, without the means of sending them to market, are valueless from their inexhaustible abundance; but if unlocked, by a wise and fearless policy, those black masses are convertible into gold and silver, and what is still better, the necessities and comforts of life, becoming in fact, bottomless reservoirs of individual wealth, and never failing fountains of national resources. That the investment of capital in canals is no longer a matter of experiment, that the experiment heretofore made in the state of New York has been successful, even beyond the warmest hopes of its most sanguine friends, without the advantages, to any considerable extent, of mineral wealth, for freight, which Pennsylvania possesses in a pre-eminent degree. That the Erie canal, during the progress of its construction, encountered an opposition, more determined, than has ever appeared in Pennsylvania in reference to her works, and that within three years after its completion every note of censure was hushed, and every voice echoed the meed of applause accorded to the authors of that splendid monument of patriotic perseverance in well doing. That that improvement, the first year after it was finished, produced $805,732 34 in the item of tolls, and in the sixth year, $1,233,593, being an annual average increase of eleven and two-tenths per cent. furnishing the most incontestible evidence that a few years operations will not only but pour into the treasury millions of revenue, to be applied to future improvement, either physical or mental; a sum undoubtedly sufficient, if applied to the latter object, to educate every child in the state at the public expense. When, too, it is recollected that the infant state of Ohio, within the memory of the middle aged among us, a desolate and apparently an impenetrable wilderness, the silent and undisturbed abode of the wolf, the panther, and the red man of the forest, has since the adoption of the policy of New York, doubled her population, trebled the value of her lands and agricultural productions, and quadrupled her national importance and political influence, treading, as she does, upon the heels of the "key stone state."

When we recur to the Schuylkill navigation, an improvement located in a coal region (and therefore a better test of the anticipated fruits of the Pennsylvania canals than the improvements in our sister states), and contemplate the astonishing results of an investment there, of between two and three millions, the annual average increase of tolls being thirty-six per cent. and the stocks of the company steadily rising in the market to one hundred and four per cent. above the original par value; when we call to mind the unexampled receipts on the Delaware division, during the short period of its operations, in consequence of its connection with the mining business of the Lehigh coal company; when we examine the facts in relation to the Delaware and Hudson canal company, another improvement designed for the development of our mineral wealth, and find that it transmits daily six hundred tons of coal; annually distributing among our citizens six hundred thousand dollars, drawn from the bowels of a barren mountain; that the company is only prevented from distributing treble, nay, ten times that amount of the "necessaries and comforts of life" by a deficiency of water for its canal, and the limited capacity of a rail road section, in its improvements; the company's stocks eighteen or twenty per cent. above par, and still rising, with a fair prospect of rivaling the Schuylkill navigation company, in profits and prosperity. When your committee take into consideration the former exemption of the people from the burthens of direct taxation; that for thirty years previous to the late revenue acts not a farthing had been required by the government; that when the general government made a requisition of more than three hundred and ten thousand dollars, the amount was promptly supplied from the state treasury, and the people were not required to refund it; that most of the states of the union resort to direct taxation for the ordinary expenses of government; that Pennsylvania has on the contrary, from her ordinary revenue borne all the expenses of state government, met the requisitions of the United States, and appropriated more than half a million of dollars to roads, bridge and other local improvements; that the taxes imposed by the acts of 1830, are little more than nominal—much less than the taxes of Ohio, or New York, or any other state engaged in a general system, for the improvement of its condition; that the impositions are but temporary, and for the purpose of sustaining a work of incalculable importance to the community; that our debt is in fact an investment, and not an expenditure, like most national debts, incurred in unnecessary wars and bloody crusades against the rights of man; and therefore that the monies raised under our revenue laws should be viewed in the light of a trifling rent, or consideration, paid, for the use of a valuable improvement, and the expenses of collection only should be set down to the account of taxes or burthens imposed on the people by way of temporary loan, to be repaid "an hundred fold;" and finally, when we perceive that the cautious lynx eyed capitalist, wherever found, whether domiciled in Europe or America, has the most unshaken confidence in the responsibility of the state, and the sound policy of its investments, as is evinced by the avidity with which our loans are sought, knowing, as he must, that the resources of Pennsylvania are unexhausted and inexhaustible, your committee presumes it will be justified in assuming, that the original design is to be carried on to completion—that the nuptials of the waters are to be consummated.

If we are indeed mistaken in this conclusion, if our improvements are not to be pushed beyond the ground already broken, if we have toiled so long, and expended so much, to recede and excite the scorn and ridicule of the adjoining states, to construct a local improvement, to accommodate a neighborhood business, if in truth the Pennsylvanian system is to be abandoned, then have we been engaged in a most unprofitable project; then have we entailed perpetual taxation on ourselves for no adequate purposes, no corresponding benefit; then, have we sold our birth right, wasted our inheritance, with no redeeming security, against sore humiliation and deep repentance. Then have all the exertions of our patriots disappeared like the morning dew, and all the splendid prospects of Pennsylvania vanished, "like the baseless fabric of a vision." In that event, this report will be found decidedly erroneous in many of its bearings. It has been calculated to a different meridian. The subject has been viewed in a different aspect. Notwithstanding the opposition raised by the terrors of the weak, the apprehensions of the timid, and the machinations of the factions, your committee cannot adopt the opinion, that Pennsylvania, heretofore foremost in the march of improvement, will hesitate, falter, and finally retrograde, in a course of policy essential to the prosperity, the character, and the best interest of the commonwealth, and strongly engrained on the affections of the people.

In estimating the debts due the commonwealth for lands, it is difficult to find any certain data on which to found a calculation, and we have been obliged to adopt what is believed to be a medium of all the former estimates. The revenues derivable from that source are rapidly diminishing, and it is feared, will shortly disappear, if indulgence be much longer extended to the holders of unpatented lands. And it would seem partial and unjust, further to extend indulgence to the wealthy sections of the state, where the lands have been enjoyed from forty to eighty years without the payment of the purchase money, the lands in the mean time having greatly advanced in value. When by subsequent laws, the citizens of the newer and poorer counties have been required to pay in advance for their lands—especially as the citizens of the new counties are now taxed to supply that deficiency in the treasury, caused by withholding the purchase money of the lands in the old and rich counties.

The estimated value of the public improvements, in tabular statement A, may startle at first view, but the committee indulge the hope, that when the tabular statements B and C are examined, and the principles upon which they have been formed are subjected to the most rigid test, the estimate will appear to be a safe one, resulting from fair comparison and arithmetical deduction.

The completion of the state improvements, would, it is believed, give such an additional impetus to national industry and active business as to render your turnpike stocks, after that event, an available source of revenue, and increase rather than diminish the receipts from the roads. Such undoubtedly has been the effect of the construction of the Erie canal, parallel and near to the great leading turnpikes of the state of New York. Pennsylvania possesses abundance of mineral wealth, those crude and ponderous substances the best calculated to furnish employment for canals, while the state of New York possesses comparatively few, and the committee, for the purpose of satisfying the incredulous, and submitting a safe estimate, have discarded this advantage, together with the difference in extent of our canals over those of New York, as also the discouraging effects of the unusual ice flood of the last season, and have instituted a comparison in the tabular statements B and C, founded on the actual operations and tolls, of the improvements of the respective states.

It will be perceived, in those statements that the estimated tolls the first year after the completion of the Pennsylvania canals, are $305,732 00 which sum is found by the following mathematical process. The aggregate amount of tolls actually received on the New York canals for the three first years in which tolls were charged and while those canals were in an unfinished state, was $93,896 11. The aggregate amount of tolls actually received on the Pennsylvania canals for the three first years in which tolls were charged, and while those canals were in an unfinished state, was $120,503 30. The amount of tolls actually received on the New York canals, the first year after they were finished was $750,759, thus we have three given terms to find a proportional fourth term, by a familiar arithmetical process. As the aggregate receipts of the three first years are to the amount in the first year after the New York canals were finished, so are the aggregate receipts of the first three years on the Pennsylvania canals to the amount that will be received the first year after those canals shall have been finished; which is the aforesaid sum of $305,732; which sum is made the first term in the statements B and C; then adopting the average annual increase of the New York canals, and the eighth year's operations after the completion of the Pennsylvania canals will produce $1,608,386. A sum more than sufficient to meet the interest of thirty millions. The same legitimate comparison with the Schuylkill navigation, a coal region improvement, as exhibited in statement C, produces a result almost incredible, and yet we have not been able to detect any error in the principles which have led to the flattering conclusion.

By a reference to statement D, it will be perceived that the estimated balance in the treasury on the 31st day of October, 1833, amounts to $487,791 29; this is upon the supposition that all the loans of the present session shall have been called in before that day. Should this not be the case, the balance will be less by the difference between the interest and the premium on that portion of the loans not called in. And should further indulgence be extended to the holders of unpaid lands, as proposed by a bill now pending for that purpose, it is feared that the condition of the treasury will be injuriously affected by the measure.

It only remains, to explain the reasons of the delay till the present time, of this report. It has heretofore been desirable to have an early report from the committee of ways and means, that the legislature might act with a full knowledge of the state of the finances. But since the passage of the act of the 16th March, 1833, "requiring the state treasurer to make an annual report on the subject of finance," the reasons for an early report, from the committee, have ceased to operate. In pursuance of that act, the state treasurer made a full report, on the 6th day of December last, giving an account of the fiscal operations of the government, more in detail, than could have been done by the committee, at the commencement of the session. That report, however, did not anticipate the new liabilities, that might be incurred, during the present session. A report from the committee, not embracing the important acts of the legislature, subsequent to the treasurer's report, would have been an idle ceremony, as it would not have furnished any additional light on the subject. Since the passage of the act of March last, it is expedient to delay the report of the committee till near the close of the session, in order that the large appropriations of the current session may be taken into consideration. The committee have embraced in this report the liabilities incurred by the legislation of this session down to the 13th of March, instant, together with one important bill, which has not yet passed, to wit, bill No. 297, as it passed the house of representatives, authorising the loan and appropriation of $530,000. The probability is so strong of its passage in some shape not materially varying from the said sum, that it was thought advisable to include it in the estimates.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 10—VOL. VIII. BALTIMORE, MAY 4, 1833. [VOL. XLIV. WHOLE No. 1,128.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

¶ The large supplement to the last volume is finished—and will be forwarded immediately. A few copies yet remain, at the service of subscribers to the REGISTER, at one dollar each.

We expect to send out the title page and index for the last volume, with the next number. It has been delayed, that the contents of the supplement might be added in their proper places.

¶ We have been, and quite unexpectedly, led into the making of a long article on nullification, in its principle and practice, and particular application. On first taking up the article from the "Telegraph," we designed to dismiss it with a few brief observations; but our pen got "a running," and it did not seem easy to stop it. So we "let it go a-head"—thinking that, perhaps the present was as good a time as any other to say certain things which we had intended to say, at a future period, and on another occasion. The general direction of the argument, however, does not appear to have much practical utility, at present, and will not be pursued. We shall not now go into a regular discussion of the points stated, or made, much as we desired it with the senior editor of the "Richmond Enquirer" some few months ago, under special considerations and peculiar circumstances—from which Mr. Ritchie "backed out," and, as we thought, rather unhandsonely. But that was his own affair. The time may come, and the existing condition of circumstances be so changed—that we shall be willing to take up that gauntlet which Mr. Green offered—after Mr. Ritchie had both accepted and retired from that which we had thrown down: but of that time, and those circumstances, we must judge for ourselves. Without any interest at stake, personal or partisan, in this matter—without a subscription to the opinions of any man, or set of men—and in a conscious independence of all men, except in the fitness of things, as apparent to our own understanding, we have devoted ourselves to a promotion of the industry of the laboring people of the U. States. These have a greater interest in this subject than we; and if the working man "goes supperless to bed," the sin lies not with us—the wrong is not of our making. We have had "no part or lot in this matter"—either in private practice or public performances of what we thought duty. We have not yet said, however, that,—when there shall be a "moving of the waters," by the spirit of truth—when a love of "the light" shall supersede a devotion to idols, and privation reform the affections of men by operating on their bellies—we shall refrain from again giving up our heart and soul, with every rightful effort of body and mind, to the cause of our fellows—THE PRODUCTIVE LABORERS OF THE UNITED STATES.

¶ The treasury instructions establishing, (if not EXACTING), the tariff law of the United States, are inserted in a subsequent page. Among our most decided objections to the act of the last session, was the power which it placed in the hands of the secretary of the treasury—whoever he may be, and for eight years to come—if the act remains undisturbed; rendering that officer, under direction of the president, commander-in-chief over the tariff, whether regarded as a matter of protection, or a thing of dollars and cents only, receivable at the treasury—a power which, we think, congress ought not to have parted with: for if the secretary has, or hereafter shall, exert that power wrongfully—great injury may arise before a corrective can be applied. We have no personal allusion to the present secretary of the treasury, nor fault specially to find with his proceedings now before us—but would not have consented to the investment of so great an amount of public authority, and private influence, in any individual; and to relinquish, as it were, a holding of the nation's purse-strings.

Mr. McLane has put down all speculation as to the operation of the law, and his opinion is in conformity with the generally accepted meaning of the act. The sum of the reductions is to be calculated on the reported, or ascertained, real value, or foreign cost, of every article; and the minimum principle and specific duties are subject to those rules which every one saw was applicable to simple ad valorem articles. This will dissipate the fancied security of some engaged in particular branches of manufactures—and surprise others who seemed to entertain a "notion" that the specific duties were preserved. We could not see any reason for hoping or expecting either of these things. As a levelling system had been resolved on, we supposed that all the duties would be cut down on the same principle—though some articles will bear a reduction much better than others; some thrive the better for it, (at the cost of consumers, because of a reduced competition), for a while to come, and others more speedily be given up to "our workshops" in Europe.

It will take a goodly number of clerks, we suppose, to figure-out the amount of the duties according to the treasury instructions; yet always having been in favor of specific appropriations and specific duties, we wish that a specific manner of applying the law had been established by the makers of the law. But "what has been done cannot be undone." It is probable that the act, because of its own imperfections, will come up for consideration, explanation, &c. at the next session; and if so, we hope that time may be allowed to ascertain and prescribe the particular duties which shall be payable on particular articles. We apprehend that the public safety, as well as individual security, are considerably involved in this matter; and, when encountering an evil, as we believe that this law is, it is important that all its metes and boundaries should be clearly before us. Established by law, and not liable to construction, misconstruction, or reconstruction, as the case may be, at different times, under different views of things, and by different secretaries.

The modus operandi, under the instructions, we suppose, will be thus:

1st. As to articles subject to a minimum, such as cotton yarn and cloths, certain kinds of woollens, &c.

The minimum of white cotton goods is fixed at 30 cents the square yard—and the duty is 20 per cent. on this value—that is, 6 cents the square yard. The foreign actual cost, let us say, is also six cents. The duty then is at the rate of 100 per cent. on the foreign cost. As it is only the duty over 20 per cent. which is to be acted on, one-tenth of 80 per cent. or 4.8 mills of the duty on a square yard, will be the amount of the first reduction, and so on, until the duty shall sink to 20 per cent. equal to one cent and two mills on the square yard, if costing six cents—and in that proportion.

2d. As to specific duties—a numerous class of articles.

The duty on a ton of bar iron manufactured by rolling, is 30 dollars—and such iron, of an inferior quality, has been often sold in England for 30 dollars. The present duty is 100 per cent.—80 per cent. or 24 dollars the ton, is then subject to the reduction, and the first fall in the duty, (one-tenth), will be 240 cents per ton. At the end of the period, the duty will be six dollars per ton.

3rd. As to duties which are both specific and ad valorem.

Wool costing more than 8 cents per lb. pays a duty of 4 cents per lb. and of 40 per cent. ad. val. If its foreign value is 20 cents, the present duty is 12 cents per lb. or 60 per cent. ad. val. The excess duty for reduction is 40 per cent. equal to 8 cents per lb. and the tenth is 8 mills. The ultimate amount of the duty on such wool will be 20 per cent. or 4 cents per lb.

It is hardly necessary to speak of the simple ad valorem duties, for no doubt has existed as to the operation of the new law upon them.

Every particular package or parcel of goods,* will be subject to particular calculations on its cost. The duty on sugar, for example, which costs 5 cents per lb. and now paying 50 per cent. ad val. will have its first reduction in one-tenth of 30 per cent. which, at $\frac{2}{3}$ cents the present duty, will be $\frac{1}{3}$ mills per lb. and the final duty on such sugar be one cent per lb. If the sugar costs $\frac{2}{3}$ cents, the duty being the same, the rate is one hundred per cent. 80 per cent. is then the excess, and the first reduction will be 2 mills per lb.—and the ultimate duty only half a cent per lb.

*Aye, or piece, if subject to be entered for exportation, and repayment of duty, by debenture.

§3.—We publish a sensible report on currency, capital, interest, &c. recently made to the legislature of New York—and recommend it to the careful examination of those who desire to investigate elementary principles of important things. It would appear to us that, notwithstanding the "safety fund," &c. the state of the currency is not such as it should be in the state of New York. It might be considerably "reformed," perhaps by forbidding the issue of bank notes, or bills, or anything in lieu thereof, for a less sum than three dollars, as a preliminary step—to extend to five dollars, in a year or two thereafter; and then ceasing to manufacture new banks, the law should interfere and prevent excessive issues by the old ones. A sudden contraction of the currency always causes the ruin of many worthy men, and sometimes produces general distress; and, as contractions will occasionally happen, the safety of the people is best assured in restricting the currency—which restriction will increase capital, whenever there shall be profitable employments for it.

NULLIFICATION. The United States Telegraph of the 25th ult. had the following extract and remarks:

It will be seen by referring to Mr. Calhoun's letter, and the speeches of gov. Hayne and gen. Hamilton, that an exercise of the "right of nullification," by the state of South Carolina, having caused the recent adjustment of the tariff, is hereafter to be held as the "rightful remedy," in either of the twenty-four states, for the redress of any real or imaginary evil arising out of the laws of the United States, or the decisions of the supreme court.

And though nullification has not been formally acknowledged in congress, as the "rightful remedy," it certainly has been respected as an efficient one.—Niles' Register.

Is the editor of the Register really ignorant of the principles of nullification, or does he intentionally misrepresent them? We are loth to believe the latter; but he ought to know something about them before he utters the sweeping denunciations which have appeared in the Register. The advocates of nullification have never pretended to consider it as a means of obtaining redress, for "any real or imaginary evil arising out of the laws," &c. It is only in cases of violations of the constitution, usurpations of power, not granted, and perversions of granted powers, that we contend the nullifying powers of a state can be rightfully exercised.

If abuses which do not extend to perversion, exist in the exercise of granted powers, the remedy is in the ballot box. If redress cannot be obtained through that, it remains for the people of the state or states to decide whether they will submit to the oppression or will secede. They would have no right to nullify the law. They would be bound to submit to the requisitions of the law as long as they remained members of the union. If the oppression be too grievous to be borne, they have no redress but secession—unless the preparatory steps for secession should induce the majority to relax in their oppression.

It is true that there may be cases in which the abuses of even a granted power may be of such a nature, as to justify a state in nullifying an act of congress. Thus, when powers granted for the attainment of one object, are perverted to the attainment of another object, not contemplated by the framers of the constitution, nor deducible by fair construction from it.

If the editor of the Register has not accurately comprehended the doctrine of nullification—he seems fully convinced of its efficiency. This is by far the most important part of it.—And although congress may not have acknowledged it as the "rightful remedy," yet as they have "respected it as an efficient one," we are well satisfied of the state of the case—having full reliance upon the prudence, patriotism and good sense of the people, that they will not have recourse to it, but when it would be "rightful," as well as "efficient." If this be not a safe reliance, let us at once establish a race of kings, to save the people from themselves.

The clamors against nullification are useless. He is little acquainted with the nature of political institutions, who does not see that nullification has become a principle of our government. It is useless to attempt to disguise it. The people know it and feel it. It is a principle that necessarily lies dormant until there is a necessity for its action. It then rises with the strength of a giant, and with the energies of an oppressed people. It slumbers until oppression calls it forth. The Virginia and Kentucky resolutions gave it birth—the ordinance of South Carolina matured it. And the people, whether at the north, south, east, or west, will always recur to it, to resist unconstitutional oppression.

We give to the editor of the "Telegraph" the benefit of all his remarks on our brief paragraphs, and shall make some observations upon them—not intending, however, at present, to enter into a consideration of several subjects which are held ready for discussion, when the utility of an argument concerning them shall become more apparent than it is now.

Though we never kissed the "black stone" and swallowed the president's proclamation "whole," we gave a hearty consent to the general principles of that paper, because that they were really our own—having, for years, apprehended more danger from the factiousness of states than on account of an increased, or consolidating, power in the federal government; though free to confess, that several things happening in the last four years have induced us to apprehend the existence of a greater central dominion than we had supposed was admissible—or would be endured. Still, there are parts in the proclamation which go much beyond that political heresy which we ("genuine democrats of '98"), imputed to the old "federal school," and not at all necessary, in our humble opinion, to a broad and conclusive argument against nullification, as expounded by its advocates in South Carolina and elsewhere. But we have fallen upon strange times. A little while ago, and no persons in the United States proceeded so far in expanding the powers of the general government, as some who now are the most prominent in contracting these powers, and contending that each state is a "sovereign" interpreter of the rightfulness of every proceeding of that government—for to this extent the doctrine of nullification reaches, else the claims made in favor of state "sovereignty" are as well scandalous as they are peurile. And more recently, only two years since, others who have gulped down the "entire" proclamation—as young robins swallow all things which are offered—in authority, or "by authority," or on their "allegiance," abused Mr. Webster with "rank federalism," because of his speech on Mr. Foot's resolution, and extolled Mr. Hayne for his correct and "truly republican" constructions of the constitution; and yet it is found that almost every generally accepted principle laid down in the proclamation may be clearly traced in Mr. Webster's "federal," or "blue light" speech, as many of the "collar presses" bawled out that it was—concerning which we have many curious articles in "pickle," and shall produce some of them—when necessary.*

We neither understand the metaphysics nor the METEMPSTICHOSIS OF NULLIFICATION. We are "ignorant" of both. But beg leave to think, that we have looked as long at practical things, and, perhaps, may have as good a judgment concerning them, as the editor of the Telegraph. At any rate—we cannot elect him our school-master. He says—"The advocates of nullification have never pretended to consider it as a means of obtaining redress for 'any real or imaginary evil arising out of the laws,' &c. It is only in cases of violations of the constitution, usurpations of power, not granted, and perversions of granted powers, that we contend the nullifying powers of a state can be rightfully exercised." What more is needed to the argument? A "sovereign" state decides on the constitutionality of a law—and may call its passage either an "usurpation" or "perversion" of power, at its own discretion—for the "sovereign" admits of no superior. And whether the act of "the sovereign" be on account of "a real or imaginary evil," the right of action is the same, and unimpeachable! Even common sense has nothing to do with this matter—has no influence over it! To speak to the case in point—not more than four or five of the states consider the tariff laws to be unconstitutional, and twenty-three, out of the twenty-four, repudiate the doctrine of nullification—casting it off as a political leprosy; so it is also with a large majority in congress, and, perhaps, in the unanimous judgment of the supreme court: yet a protecting tariff is unconstitutional, and nullification the "rightful remedy," because—so South Carolina wills it! And the state being "sovereign," is under no legal obligation either to comply with the wishes of a majority of the states, or submit herself to the common sense of mankind! The "sovereign" is absolute. And if, as in the late war, the United States should again levy a tax upon coaches—South Carolina may pass an "ordinance" changing all her "coaches" into wagons, and thus nullify the act. What is it to her that every lexicographer makes a wide difference between "coaches" and "wagons"? It is in the power of the "sovereign" to render "fleas into lobsters,"—though Sir Joseph Banks, after "philosophically" boiling a pot-full of the latter, certainly ascertained that "fleas are not lobsters?"

* The proclamation was very troublesome to our old friend, the editor of the Richmond Enquirer,—but, at last, he seems to have "taken" it, and become very moderate about state-rights. When the proclamation had just issued, some Yankee editor thus happily described the state of the case:—"Mr. Ritchie handles the proclamation as a hungry man would a hot roll which he had stolen, and which he was anxious to swallow, but which, as he felt it burning in his hand, he was afraid to put it in his mouth, while he feared detection, if he did not hide it effectually."

Such is the power of the states—in nullification! We do not mean to speak lightly on the subject. If the third clause of the eighth article of the constitution, which gives congress power to "regulate commerce," does not authorise the enactment of protecting tariff laws—the power so long exercised, (and still in action), imposing discriminatory duties on tonnage, or prohibiting the coasting trade to foreign vessels, is surely unconstitutional, and ought to be "nullified!" The rule which applies to goods is applicable to the ships which carry them. We defy the whole host of metaphysicians to draw a line between them,—and the entire tribe of "philosophers" to present a clause in the constitution which either separates these branches of domestic industry, or prefers one over the other. There is no such clause. If the grant of a full power, to "regulate commerce," does not contain subordinate, or incidental powers, as some of the state-rights men seem to contend, a South Carolina planter may employ a Bermudian vessel to carry his cotton from Georgetown to Charleston, or New York, and bring back to him wines and negro cloths, race horses and cotton bagging; and as the power to prohibit such employment of foreign vessels is not stated in the constitution, such prohibition may either be called an "usurpation" or "perversion" of power. This, however, is not now affected. But the same clause that protects, or prefers, American navigation, protects or prefers American manufactures—and the power granted is natural and unalienable, in both cases. Without it—the United States has no sovereign authority. If the power of self-defence is denied—there is no other worth insisting upon; and the government of this great republic is placed in the condition of a negro's dog, which DARES not return even a snap for a bite, when assailed by a white man's cur. We say,—that the power to encourage and protect the navigation of the United States, which has been mightily exercised from the beginning of this government, and, in a very important part, to ABSOLUTE PROHIBITION—has the same, and no other, constitutional authority than that which is given to encourage and protect the manufacture of mouse traps. Both are derived from the full power just above stated. The right to tax foreign ships entering our ports, to any amount, for the encouragement of ship-building in the United States, is universally conceded—but the right to tax foreign products and manufactures, that other American products and manufactures may be substituted for them—is "nullified!" Neither ships nor mouse traps are mentioned in the constitution. They are both articles of "commerce," and the right to regulate the importation, or introduction of either, is precisely the same. For a long series of years, we taxed all foreign vessels one dollar per ton on their entry, our own being admitted on the payment of six cents. Ships are only the agents of "commerce," and so are camels and mules. Navigation has less to do with "commerce" than agriculture; and is, by far, the lesser interest: yet some years ago, when France imposed a duty of 18 dollars per ton on American vessels entering her ports, a law was passed, by the UNANIMOUS vote of both houses of congress, imposing a duty of 18 dollars per ton on French vessels entering our ports; and if France had also taxed-out our cotton, should we not have taxed-out French goods? But the case is "materially altered" when wheat, and not cotton—and English, not French, goods are concerned! We want no wire drawing about this matter—no attempts to shew the difference between the north and north-east side of every bristle on a "whole hog's" back, from the "snout to the tail!" We demand it, of our quondam friend, Mr. Obsta Principiis, and present cotemporary, Nous Verrons, "esquire"—and of gen. Green, who has stepped into the east-off slip-shods of Mr. Ritchie, since the days of his abjection, decreed in the proclamation—to put their "finger upon that part of the constitution," (as Mr. R. used to say), which prohibits the coasting trade to foreign vessels—allows the imposition of discriminatory duties upon them and their cargoes—or authorises the employment of the American navy for the protection of American commerce—even at the antipodes, or in the Mediterranean, and at a greater expense to the public, in that sea, than is the amount of all the private profits which accrue to us from its trade. These powers, however, are natural results of the acknowledged independence of the United States, and are not disputed—still the right to nullify them cannot be questioned—for a sovereign state cannot err! A power to protect the labor and property of persons, engaged in any particular pursuit, is not given in the constitution; yet every citizen believes in the existence, and sees the perpetual action of such a power. It is only concerning its application, or a sheer question of expediency, about which individuals differ. On what principle is it, that the importation of slaves is prohibited? Because, as we suppose, thought to promote the "general welfare." May not the "general welfare" be as well promoted in excluding the productions of white slaves, as the persons of black ones? The constitutional rule which is applicable to the last, must hold good with respect to the first. South Carolina, in her wisdom, continued the importation of negroes to the latest moment that she could—and, down to 1808, the Charleston newspapers were filled with advertisements of cargoes of them for sale. The law which now prohibits the importation of slaves, stands precisely upon the principle which prohibits the coasting trade to foreign vessels, imposes discriminatory duties on goods imported in such vessels, or if from beyond the cape of Good Hope, or assesses other duties for the further encouragement of American industry; but it pleases South Carolina, in the power of her own individual "sovereignty," alone in her own might, to pronounce the latter class of duties unconstitutional! It is more lawful to protect home-manufactured Yankee ships, than home-made Yankee "palmetto buttons!"

But if we had ever held an opinion that "nullification is a rightful remedy" for the redress of "real or imaginary evils," the carrying-out of the doctrine, in South Carolina, would have rendered it contemptible. We allude to the act of the convention nullifying the late law, "further to provide for the collection of duties on im-ships, as well as of cotton and woollen cloths, and hob-nails—no less than 375 millions, or three-fourths of the annual aggregate, belongs to the agricultural or land holding interest, in one way or another, chiefly for subsistence and materials, or means, supplied—minerals and earths, water power, timber, wool, and a thousand et ceteras.

*As many copies of this article will probably out-live a distinct recollection of the scurvy political terms and politics of the day, it may be proper to observe, that, when a man calls himself a "whole hog," he intends to compliment himself—and if he adds, "from the snout to the tail," it means that he feels qualified for a seat in congress, and, perchance, a mission to represent the dignity of the United States at a foreign court. We once heard a person say, in the presence of his wife, "I'm whole hog, and so is my wife." But the lady, and such she really was, objected—she was not willing to be called a "female hog." There is nothing new in this. We have been told that, in certain parts of Africa, after bumping the ground nine times, it is the perfection of politics to say, "your misjesty's dog is crawling before you." We do not much admire this modern hoggism or ancient dogism. But—de gustibus non disputandum; "rewards" must be obtained, and "punishments" avoided—if possible.

†Nothing like a correct estimate can be made of the internal commerce of the United States—but the first sales of the products of the land, rendered valuable by labor variously applied, including all sorts of commodities, with costs of transportation, &c. perhaps amount to not less than one thousand millions of dollars a year. This will not appear an unreasonable sum, we think, to those who shall reflect upon the subject, and will endeavor to grasp the multitudinous pursuits and products of land and labor.

If the manufactures of the United States have an aggregate value of 500 millions—we mean manufactures of houses and ports." The convention might as well have nullified the act of congress making compensation for "Amy Darden's stud horse"—for, having repealed her original ordinance, this law of the United States was rendered a dead letter to the people of that state—UNLESS A SOUTHERN KINGDOM OR CONFEDERACY WAS STILL CONTEMPLATED, or some other violent intent entertained, for further use, by persons that would "rather reign in hell than serve in heaven." It was an act of baby-spite—the pouting of a spoiled child, (except as above excepted), and reduced nullification into the meanness of a besotted faction, or cast it into the "keeping" of the Catalines of the day. Let us look a little more closely at this subject. Every "Jeffersonian democrat," in the time of the embargo, supported a law much more extensive in its powers, and furious in its character, than is the act which South Carolina has nullified. Aye, and the first was a much stronger constitutional case than the last, in many respects. We shall refer only to a single point, because it is that which directly bears upon the general subject to which the "sovereign right of nullification," was first applied: but must previously state—that every man who regarded the embargo laws as unconstitutional was put down, by the "democratic party," and marked as an "old tory," "apostate whig," "British refugee" or "hireling"—"monarchist," or the like.

First. There is no expressly delegated power in the constitution to lay an embargo. It is incidental, either to the power of "declaring war" or "regulating commerce"—for "the general welfare." Very few persons questioned the right of congress to lay an embargo, under the war-making power; and, while it held the character of a war-measure, not much was said about its unconstitutionality. But being unlimited in its duration, and uncovered by a declaration of war—and continued until the American flag had disappeared from the ocean, the phases of the law were altered, and then it was supported by its friends under the clause which authorises the "regulation of commerce." An ardent discussion of constitutional principles ensued. The "federalists" said that "regulation" and DESTRUCTION, were not synonymous terms!—that, as with a view to the encouragement of American industry, the constitution having forbidden the imposition of a "tax or duty on articles exported from any state," it was absurd to suppose that a power existed to prevent all exportations, at discretion, and without limit! They insisted, that the positive denial of a power to tax exportations, shewed that the people, in adopting the constitution, had reserved for themselves an uncontrollable liberty over all exportations. But we, "the democrats," put the "federalists" down, as well through "king numbers" as by argument! We said, that the right to "regulate commerce" as should, (in our opinion), best promote the "general welfare" was undoubted; and there were not wanting many "sturdy democrats," who held forth concerning "our restrictive energies," and descended upon the great benefits resulting from the improvement of our country, and its advances in prosperity, because that it was being rendered independent of foreign nations for manufactured goods, &c. and, if we are not much mistaken, some of the messages of president Jefferson thus encouraged us to perseverance in the embargo law—which, as a war measure, or a regulation of commerce, or as a means of promoting the "general welfare," we made it out clearly was both constitutional and expedient! We well remember writing a pamphlet on these subjects, which was so well approved by the "democratic republican committee," that 10,000 copies of it were published to enlighten the people of Maryland! Such an edition was not a common thing in those days. Aye, and out of that pamphlet was obtained the chief matter for two great "embargo speeches" made in congress—without the least credit being rendered to the humble and obscure author of it—or any admission, that certain original statistical statements were borrowed!

Secondly. On the other hand: an express power is given to congress "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises—to pay the public debt, and provide for the common defence and general welfare." There is no limit (now) to this power, either concerning the imposition of taxes, or the disposition of the funds produced by them; nor ought there to be—we speak on general principles. The power to raise a revenue necessarily involves a right to disburse it. Now in this power, or in that to regulate commerce, or in both united, Mr. Jefferson and the "democrats"—the Giles's, Macon's, and so forth—found authority for the seizure and condemnation of British goods imported, &c. though we were not at war with Great Britain! Britain had passed certain orders in council for the regulation of trade with the continent of Europe—and, like the poor worm, which, "if trodden upon may turn," there existed a natural right to meet regulation with regulation; to say nothing of our proud claims to sovereignty and independence! We prohibited commerce with Great Britain—we made a law to confiscate British goods when imported into the United States—because, mark the beance—Great Britain had embarrassed our trade with the continent of Europe, and restrained us from sending our flour, cotton, fish, &c. to the various nations with whom she was at war. This was the "democracy" of Jefferson's administration; but now the more lofty "democracy" of the "chivalric and generous south," having an open market for its cotton, deems it unconstitutional to impose protecting duties, that iron and cloth may be manufactured in America, though the British duties, as to our flour, meats, fish, lumber, and every great staple, cotton excepted, are prohibitory in their operation! The power in congress to "regulate commerce" has been stricken from the constitution—by construction; and an exercise of that power may be rightfully "nullified!"

But let us look a little more at the constitution. We have just above said that the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties," &c. is now without limit—that is, it is a complete power, and as strongly granted as any form of words can express. And that it was so understood by the framers of the constitution, who had a full sense of the meaning of the phrase, "TO REGULATE COMMERCE,"* is indubitably proved from the following exception, (and the only one) to that power, and for a limited time:

"The migration or importation of such persons, as any of the states now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by congress prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight; but a tax may be imposed upon such importation not exceeding ten dollars for each person."—Cons. U. S. Sec. 9, Art. 1.

This article alludes to slaves—though the convention was ashamed to put the word into the constitution; and it was a concession to the wishes of South Carolina, perhaps, at the time—for she was the only state which persevered in the importation of live "wool and ivory" up to the period prescribed.

The introduction of this clause into the constitution, as well as the manner of its matter, is very remarkable. The importation of slaves was not to be prohibited until 1808, nor a tax of more than ten dollars a head laid upon them: the power then to prohibit the importation of every other article of merchandise (!), or to tax it at discretion, was instant and full on the adoption of the constitution. If there had been any doubt concerning the power to "regulate trade," to "promote the general welfare," this exception should have quieted it. So it was in the beginning of man. The fruit of the "tree of knowledge" being only forbidden to Adam, left no doubt of his entire discretion over all the rest of the fruits of "the garden."

While thinking, then, that the original pretence† for nullification in South Carolina was lame, weak, and

*We shall, at some future day, fully shew the understanding of the people of the United States, when they adopted the constitution, on this subject. It was British regulations of trade which caused the revolution—and the idea of a federal government originated in the necessity of so "regulating trade," that the industry of the country might be protected—else why the splendid processions of mechanics and manufacturers, celebrating the ratification of the constitution? What had they, as classes, to do with this matter? Whence the presumption of Baltimore, from which was sent the first petition to the first congress under the constitution, and it was for the protection of American industry—whence the impudence of the mechanics of Charleston, who, almost simultaneously forwarded a similar memorial to the representatives of the new nation?

† And we solemnly believe only a pretence. It was a grasping at political power, or to arrest an apprehended change of the location of such power,—which, in our opinion, led to all the clamor in the south against the tariff. We do not believe that any "oppression" was really felt, because of the tariff. The gigantic advances made in the wealth of the cotton-growing states, stand opposed to this clamor. Lower Virginia and lower South Carolina are declining—but mightier causes than fifty tariffs are working out the poverty of those sections. On the impotent—we have concluded that the second nullifying ordinance was as well prodigate as contemptible: that if there had been any seeming dignity in the "rightful remedy" assumed, the practice under it was better suited for an assembly of "black spirits and white," at a cross roads tavern,—than the convention of South Carolina. We think freely—and, if we speak at all, are apt to say what we think, in all possible plainness. We believe that we understand both the principle and practice of nullification—and, while yielding nothing to the argument in favor of that heresy, would resist, to the uttermost, the presumption of those who have embraced it,—aye, who tell us that the contest has only just begun, who hold themselves up in a military attitude, and still threaten these United States!—though having obtained what they regard as a triumph; which they should not have obtained with our consent. If general Hamilton would have gone "to the death for his sugar"—he might!

The "play" of the editor of the "Telegraph" upon the admission made by us, that nullification, if not a rightful remedy, "has been respected as an efficient one," is not "worth the candle." We ought not, perhaps, to have used the word "respected"—for Mr. Clay, and others who supported him, had no sort of respect, in the ordinary meaning of the word, for nullification—such as regard, reverence, honor, awful kindness, or partial regard. We know that many who voted for Mr. Clay's bill, supremely despised nullification, in all its parts and parties. But "great effects from little causes flow." The soiling of a duchess of Marlborough's gown, once involved Europe in a general war! and simple matters of accident oftentimes make great men out of blockheads or knaves. Nullification has been "efficient"—but not because of its own power. A modification of the tariff, (which it was thought would prove acceptable to South Carolina), has been made. Had the new tariff act stood alone—it might well be said that nullification had been respected—"duly respected," as the Turk bows his head when the silken cord is presented in the name of the sultan, to strangle him; but the enforcement bill was also passed—and every body knows that no modification of the tariff would have been submitted to, at the last session of congress, had the enforcement bill failed. *And the latter might have stood alone—but for the fear of an undue or indiscreet exercise of the powers which it gives to the executive. We feel nearly authorized to say that we know it was the latter consideration which powerfully influenced enough of the members, perhaps, to have defeated Mr. Clay's bill. And to the consideration just mentioned was superadded other hand, look at Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, and even Georgia. The general amount of wealth, has, perhaps, been at least doubled in these states within the last eight tariff years. And see what is going on in Florida! A Savannah paper mentions it as an extraordinary crop, that col. Dunmott, of Timuoka, Florida, recently manufactured from one acre of sugar cane, four hog-heads of sugar, averaging more than a thousand pounds each, and worth nine and a half cents per pound. The crop of this single acre will therefore bring three hundred and eighty dollars. Pretty well for Florida. Col. D's entire crop will amount to near one hundred hog-heads.

And at this time too, it should be added, as a monument to the memory of the tariff law of 1828—though it lived not long enough to develop its blessings—that, in nearly every part of the United States, a general prosperity may be said to abound—which has no parallel. A greater shew and bustle of business, may have been seen at particular periods—but safe and solid acquisitions of wealth were never before so extensively made, and in spite of unwise proceedings, on the part of the government, in many respects. The whole secret is in this—that the excitements given to industry caused every person, as it were, to obtain constant employment, and at liberal wages; hence mighty circulations of values, and quick passages of money from hand to hand. Suppose there are two millions of persons to whom wages are paid for labor performed, and that the present average is only 50 cents per day—cast one half of these out of employment, or, because of excess of labor, reduce their compensation to 25 cents, and the difference of the values earned and circulated is in the enormous sum of seventy-five millions a year! We beseech reflecting men to examine into this matter. Here is the true cause of the general prosperity that prevails—and which ought to be sustained.

*The enforcement bill was necessary, as the majority thought, to vindicate the constitution, and prevent such excesses as had been contemplated, and provided for, by South Carolina—but with that vindication, many believed, it was prudent, and for the reason stated, to withdraw from South Carolina every pretext for perseverance in her measures—and so practically "nullify" a present use of the enforcement law.

the operation of a generous spirit, which has not been handsomely returned by some in whose behalf it was exerted. On the expediency of the new tariff law—we frankly expressed our opinion to its honored author, a considerable time before he offered his bill to the senate. That opinion has suffered no change. On the contrary, every day's observation goes to confirm it. The reasons which induced us to oppose that bill are being rapidly developed. Partial evil may be general good—or temporary success lay the foundation of permanent adversity. But we shall not now discuss the questions involved in that law. Things are not ripe for it; and the course to be pursued on the general subject has not yet been determined. The occasion, however, is fitted to say—that this difference in opinion has not alienated any of those affections which, for more than twenty years, we have warmly entertained and steadily cherished, for one of the most honorable and highly-gifted men of the age—and perhaps also, the most cruelly calumniated and wickedly abused. We have known him long and well; but, while feeling all confidence in the purity of his motives, and paying as much deference to his judgment as any human being may rightfully ask of his fellow man—we must adhere to our own opinions until convinced that they are invalid. "Collared" persons cannot understand this. It is their duty to have both hands disengaged, that they may take off their hats, and hurrah on the right side or the left—as directed in "general orders." Tens of thousands were in this dignified and beautiful posture, (holding both hands up!) while a doubt remained whether the president would approve or nullify the bill for rechartering the bank of the United States—and those who hurrahd most loudly because of the veto message concerning that bank, have also hurrahd most lustily for the proclamation, though the scope and bearing of these papers are about as much opposed as the "eternal" ice of Chimborazo, and the "eternal" fire of Vesuvius. Some "philosophers," we believe, contend, however, that the elements of heat and cold are the same. It may be so—for there are many strange harmonies in things that are apparently in opposition! And, as the instant sensation of ice and fire is pretty nearly the same, it is enough for politicians that a seeming affinity exists for the moment—the present purposes being accomplished, the "collared" gentlemen have served the turn required of them.

The last paragraph in the article quoted from the Telegraph needs no remark except to say, God forbid that nullification should ever become a "settled principle" in this republic! That it is not—we well know. Twenty-three out of the twenty-four states repudiate this heresy. Even Virginia, the parent and hot-bed of state-rights metaphysicians, has cast it off. It has an abiding place only in South Carolina—and, we think, will not long endure even there. It has, however, proved itself "efficient"—but not, (as above stated), in the operation of its own power. We like it no better for that. We reject it in all its phases, and under all circumstances, and regard it as an abomination.

"A BUDGET OF BLUNDERS." We meet with the following in the "Washington Globe, credited to the "Georgia Courier"—

Trick. It is asserted in Niles' Register, that into the bill substituted for Mr. Clay's, there was furtively inserted a section by which certain manufactures of iron imported pay less duty, than foreign iron itself. It was not read in the senate at all; Mr. Clay having answered Mr. Grundy that he had compared the two bills, and found them essentially the same! "It was read by its title three times and passed, all in less than five minutes." Then Mr. Dickerson discovered the fraudulent section, and complained of the violation of the compromise; but the senate refused to reconsider or strike out 17 to 8. [Georgia Courier.]

It is not easy to apprehend how so many mistakes could be committed. The bill of which we spoke was not substituted for Mr. Clay's bill—Mr. Clay did not answer Mr. Grundy, nor say that he had compared the two bills—and we know further that Mr. Clay was not in the senate at the time. The latter parts of the statement in the "Courier" is true—but the bill alluded to had not any connexion with Mr. Clay's bill, except that its provisions violated the principle of the "compromise" which had just been made, in the passage of Mr. Clay's bill. It is true that the bill, if it had been read in the senate, would not have passed that body—and that it became a law, if not by "fraudulent" intention, in what may be esteemed [almost] criminal carelessness, and four-o'clock-in-the-morning legislation.

AMERICAN HANKIN—a valuable article, manufactured from cotton raised on the estate of Mr. Forsyth, one of the senators of the United States from Georgia, is offered for sale, in considerable quantities, by Mr. Nathaniel F. Williams, Baltimore. The cloth being of the natural color of the cotton, is said to be only changed for the better by washing. It becomes a little more lively, but does not fade. It is a valuable acquisition—and, as a joint product of southern agriculture and Yankee manufacture, we hope will meet with the protection of the American people.

THE EXPENDITURE of the government of the United States in the current year, we are informed, will amount to twenty-one millions of dollars—and it is thought that no great "surplus" will remain. A gentleman says it is within the range of possibilities that a loan may be asked of the bank of the U. States.

"THE CABINET." It is strongly reported that Mr. Livingston will soon retire from the department of state, to represent the United States at Paris—that Mr. McLane will succeed Mr. Livingston, and William J. Duane, of Pennsylvania, take Mr. McLane's place, as secretary of the treasury. It is also said-and-said that Mr. Cass will leave the war department—and if so, several gentlemen are mentioned for his successor.

RELATIONS WITH FRANCE. It is stated in the Pennsylvanian, that the bills drawn by the government of the United States on France, in pursuance of the treaty of indemnity, have been dishonored. No why or wherefore is yet given. Perhaps the report is not well founded.

UNITED STATES BANK STOCK. The New York Daily Advertiser, of Monday, says—"The operations for deliveries of this stock have been so great recently, that those short are desirous of borrowing, and are willing to advance one hundred and ten per cent. without charging any interest, rather than purchase at the present rates, which is an evidence that the stock is scarce."

THE CHOLERA. This disease is said already to have disappeared at Key West. It was making terrible ravages in Guatemala—the greater part of one of the battalions had died.

Letters from Havana of the 7th April say that the cholera had nearly disappeared. The whole number of deaths since the 26th February, were put down at 14,935—or about one-tenth of the whole population! The disease was spreading in the country.

A letter from Matanzas dated April 19, says—"The cholera is raging here with such fury; it is impossible to form any correct opinion of its ravages, although I have endeavored to do so—I even question whether the government itself has the returns of the number of interments; of the number of cases I know it has not, for I heard one of the most eminent physicians say to-day, he had not had time to report for a week past. Business is almost paralyzed, and all who could leave the city have done so; there are some cases in the country, some plantations having suffered severely.

"Two cargoes of slaves, (over 1,000), arrived a few days since; one of them landed her cargo south of this, (Matanzas), on the other side, all of whom died, although landed in perfect health; and the other, a few leagues to the leeward of this, the most of whom are dead, and the residue dying.

Louisville, Ky. April 22—We have understood that there have been a number of cases of cholera on board steam boats on the Mississippi. We learn that there were seventeen cases on board the Tobacco Plant, the greater number of which proved fatal.

NEW YORK. A law has just been passed by the legislature of this state to tax the debts due to non-residents. We consider this a great mistake in political economy, but shall be glad to find that, like a king of England, we have "erroneous views of things." We have not seen the law—but must suppose that it is altogether prospective.

That great building, the City Hotel, in New York, was much damaged by fire on the morning of the 25th ult. It broke out about 10 o'clock, in the attic, and the height of the building, and other causes prevented immediate action against the flames—but their progress was arrested, and the three lower stories uninjured, except by water. There was a long and fearful anxiety for several persons who were on the roof. Their retreat was cut off by the fire—and, at great hazard, they were compelled to descend by a rope which was happily thrown to them.

This establishment is owned by J. J. Astor, esq. and occupied by Mr. Jennings, at an annual rent of $9,000. In two days after the fire, the business of the hotel was going on as usual.

Another great fire happened in New York on the 28th, on Gold street—and fifteen buildings were speedily destroyed, or much injured.

Eight acres of houses! In the night of Tuesday last, at 11 o'clock, a fire broke out in the extensive stables of Messrs.

Kipp & Brown, at the corner of Hudson and Bank streets, New York. It extended on Bank, Hammond, Greenwich and Perry streets—and the American says that all the houses which stood on eight acres of ground are destroyed with 41 horses, many stables and other carriages, and a great amount of household furniture, goods, &c. The buildings consumed, or materially damaged, are from 130 to 150—more than one-half of which were brick, and their loss is put down at 250,000 dollars. There was no want of water—but the vast quantity of hay and straw, and other combustibles, with which the fire started—put it out of the command of the firemen. It is positively said that this calamity was effected by a female, in revenge for some affront which she had received. Large quantities of goods which had been removed to supposed places of safety, were consumed, by the rapid spread of the fire.

GIRARD COLLEGE. The treasurer of the Girard trust has acknowledged by letter to the city councils of Philadelphia, the receipt of two millions of dollars from the trustees of the Girard bank, to be appropriated to the erection of the Girard college.

The architect of the college has estimated the expense of the plan adopted for the buildings at $900,000, $700,000 of which will be expended on the principal building, and $200,000 on the out buildings;—and that six years will be required to complete it.

It is further estimated by the committee, that there will probably be no necessity for encroaching upon the capital of the fund for the erection of the building. From the gradual progress of the work as projected, it is believed that the annual interest will be nearly, if not quite sufficient for the buildings.

The erection of the new college will be modelled after the banking house of Mr. Girard,—the old United States bank, and the whole building will, in the opinion of the committee, "remain a lasting monument of his fame, as well as a model of architectural beauty."

BALTIMORE. The corner stone of St. James' church, was laid on Wednesday afternoon at the corner of Monument and Aisquith streets, by the most reverend archbishop Whitfield. We understand that this building, for the further accommodation of persons of the Roman Catholic faith, will be erected at the sole expense of the archbishop, and when completed will add much to the embellishment of that section of the city.

FROM CHARLESTON. Four companies of U. S. troops had left this city for Fortress Monroe, and two others were embarking with the same destination. One company had also sailed for New York. Col. Bankhead had relinquished the command of the troops in the harbor to major Heilman. And the war in this quarter is supposed to be at an end—for the present.

VIRGINIA. Mr. Loyall has been elected to congress from the Norfolk district, because of the addition of the Isle of Wight to it, under the late apportionment of representatives. The old Norfolk district stood thus—For Mr. King 1,225, Mr. Loyall 1,146; but Isle of Wight gave Mr. L. 282 votes against 36, and elected him by a majority of 167.

The Whig gives the following list of the members elected: John J. Allen,* William S. Archer, William F. Gordon, Jos. W. Chinn, Charles F. Mercer, John Y. Mason, Edward Lucas,* James H. Beal,* Andrew Stevenson, Saml. McDowell Moore,* George Loyall,* James H. Gholson,* John Randolph,* Thomas W. Davenport, William P. Taylor,* John M. Patton, John H. Fulton,* William McComas,* Nathaniel H. Claiborne—To be heard from, the Ohio district, (in which Messrs. Wilson and Morgan are candidates), and the Accomac in which Messrs. Coke and Wise are candidates.

[The Ohio district has been heard from—and Mr. Wilson, a national republican, is elected.]

Those marked thus* are new members.

According to the Whig, it is not easy to determine the politics of the members elect—and says: "Jackson or anti-Jackson, seems to be rather antiquated, though the Globe insists upon regarding that test, and that only. If it is still of that mind, we must ask of its co-sponsors to inform us, how we are to class Messrs. Patton, Gordon, Gholson, Randolph, Davenport, Taylor? Are they Jackson men or not? Messrs. Allen, Mercer and Moore [and Wilson] are not and never were. If we adopt the proclamation as a test, Messrs. Patton, Gordon, Gholson, Randolph, Davenport and Taylor, are unequivocally opposed to it. To these we presume Messrs. Archer, Mason, Chinn, Claiborne, Loyall and Lucas may be added; or if more agreeable to the Globe, they may be ranked as disapproving some of its abstract doctrines, and approving others. We beg those gentlemen's pardons, if we have mistaken their sentiments through ignorance.

"The unsettled state of politics may be inferred from the difficulty, if not impossibility, of classifying gentlemen so conspicuous as to be chosen to congress. No wonder the people are befogged."

The editor of the Richmond Enquirer, having been harshly spoken of by Mr. Randolph in one of his recent speeches, in the last number of that paper, says—

"We owe our acknowledgments to Mr. John Randolph for several favors of this description. The time may come, when we shall return the debt with interest. He has calumniated us—but how could we expect to escape his remorseless vengeance? Why should he who has abused so many others, have spared ourselves? Or, how could we, who despise his avaricious spirit, and his unblushing rapacity of the public money, have calculated upon his forbearance?"

In another place, in the same paper, he says:

"A man who has sinned against his own conscience, and sunk himself in the opinion of all honorable patriots, by plunging his arm into the public coffers, and disgracefully feeding in the public crib, may falsely charge us with looking only after the loaves and fishes.* We scorned to justify his rapacity—and the inextinguishable resentment which we have provoked, may now vent itself in the bitterest and the most unfounded reproaches. We defy them all—all—from the low, needy scoundrel of John C. Calhoun, who is paid by the column, by his employer, to do his dirty work—or, from him, whose conscious soul shrunk abashed from the light of day, and caused him to appear like a guilty thing, in a convention of his fellow citizens—up to him who, "condemned to have an itching palm," could stoop to —Sell the mighty space of his large honors,

For so much trash as may be grasped thus."

This is "awful." The "nuisance and the curse" that was—became a blessing, and has returned into a nuisance again! No man has such a happy knack of reforming angels of darkness into children of the light, or of transforming demigods into devils, at his own sovereign will. But why quarrel with the philosopher of Roanoke because that he so greedily put his paw into the treasury chest? Why not rather blame those who permitted the plunder?

RISE OF LAKE ERIE. For the last several years, the rise of water in the lake has made serious encroachments on its southern shore in many places. For a considerable distance above the mouth of Black river, the banks of the lake are low and without rock. Twelve years ago, the bank was generally sloping, with a wide beach. Now the waves beat against a perpendicular bank, which from continual abrasion is frequently falling off. From one to three rods in width are worn away annually. The phenomenon of this rise of waters, remains unexplained. (Ohio Atlas.

LEHIGH COAL. The managers of the Lehigh coal company, have determined to deliver coal during the coming season, by the cargo, on board of vessels, at the company's wharves on the Delaware, at $5 50 per ton, when from 50 to 300 tons are purchased—at $5 25 per ton, when from 300 to 1,000 tons are purchased—and at $5 when more than 1,000. For any order not exceeding 100 tons, payment to be made on the 1st of November, 1833—above that quantity, one half on the 1st of November, 1833, and the other half on the 1st of January, 1834. In case vessels take in coal at Bristol, they will be towed up and down at the company's expense.

MUNIFICENT CHARITY. Col. THOMAS H. PERKINS, of Boston, has presented the following donation to the New England Asylum for the blind. Truly the spirit and liberality of such conduct is above praise:

"I give the house in which I reside, as a permanent asylum for the blind, upon the conditions expressed below. As the house is fifty feet square, and the adjoining land contains nearly eleven thousand feet, it will furnish accommodation for all the persons who may be thrown upon our community at one time; and as the stables are of brick, and substantially built, they may, if required, be converted into dormitories. The conditions I annex to the gift are as follows, viz:—The house and land shall always be occupied as an asylum for the blind; and in case the present mansion should be destroyed by fire, it shall be rebuilt for the same purpose; or in case it is not rebuilt, within three years after being destroyed, the land shall revert to my heirs at law.

"I value the estate at $30,000; but as a house, whatever be its value, is of comparatively little use without the means of supporting those who are to inhabit it, my second condition is, that $50,000 shall be raised to form a fund for the support of the establishment; hoping that it may be increased by donation hereafter, by those who are at present unable to afford their aid. Another condition I shall exact by the terms of the deed, which I shall give, is, that in case the corporation for the blind should cease, the estate shall revert to my heirs at law—hereby making it obligatory upon posterity to keep up the establishment, to avail itself of my donation."

Mr. J. P. Cushing, of Boston, has given 5,000 dollars, in furtherance of the above magnificent project—and two other gentlemen are named that would give the same sum. It is probable that the amount will soon be made up, so much for "Yankee notions" and "wooden nutmegs."

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY. There has been a difference of opinion (our readers are aware) as to the real object of the mission of the secretary of the navy to the south-west. We get entirely new light on the subject from the administration paper at Louisville. His tour is, it seems, in some degree at least, connected with a contravention of the supposed influence of the abolition of slavery in the British West Indies. Among all possible objects of the secretary's journey, we certainly never should have guessed at this. [Nat. Intel.

*John had said that Thomas was a man of seven principles—
"five loaves and two fishes." [Editor.

From the Louisville Public Advertiser.

The reply of Lord Althorp to the inquiry of the marquis of Chandos, as to the probable course of the British ministry with regard to the abolition of slavery in the West Indies, indicates that such a measure is seriously contemplated. If adopted, its bearing on the condition of the southern states of this union must be speedily felt. The executive is fully aware of this, and we do not doubt that steps will be taken to counteract the influence which it is supposed the English project will necessarily have.

We are inclined to believe the southern tour which the secretary of the navy is now making, is, in some degree, connected with this subject. An increase of our naval force on the southern coast may be required; the harbors at Pensacola and Key West may need improvement, and other points may be selected, possessing equal or greater advantages, for naval stations.

AN AFFRAY AT ECONOMY, PENNSYLVANIA. From the Pittsburg Manufacturer—

"We learn that a serious affray occurred among the Germans living at Economy, eighteen miles below Pittsburg, and those at Phillipsburg, in Beaver county. It appears that the assailants were composed of persons who were formerly members of the Economy society, but who seceded with the celebrated German adventurer, Barnard Muller, (but better known here as count de Leon), at their head, and settled themselves at the town of Phillipsburg, which they purchased of Messrs. Phillips and Graham, and partly paid for. We know not the exact cause of this serious affray which occurred between the members of these two societies, but believe it arose from the division of the property consequent on the secession of the followers of count de Leon. In the affray many serious wounds were inflicted by both parties; and but for the timely arrival of the sheriff of Beaver county, lives would probably have been taken by the excited combatants. Several of the Leonites or Phillipsburg members, have been arrested and imprisoned in Beaver county jail. We therefore suppose a legal investigation of the matter will take place, which we shall give to the public.

The "Pittsburg Gazette" with reference to the preceding, says—

A gentleman, residing in Beaver, related to us, a few days ago, an anecdote which pleased us much. At the time of the late disturbance in Economy, the people near that village collected in considerable numbers to preserve order and to suppress any violence which might be attempted. Among those thus assembled were some, known not to be very friendly to the Economites, and yet, these persons were as ready and willing to interfere as were the warmest friends of Mr. Rapp and the society. The assailants were much surprised at this, and some of them exclaimed—why do you take the side of the Economites; we know that you do not like them? "It is true," replied the men thus appealed to—"it is true that we do not like the society, but we take the side of the law." The Germans could not understand this kind of abstraction. They expected that the yeomanry of the surrounding country would make the matter entirely personal, and take sides, according to their respective predilections.

THE ANT BEAR. Salem, (Mass.) April 22.—Monsieur Buffett, a distinguished French naturalist, arrived this morning in the Ohio from Rio Grande, has a rare and valuable collection of birds and quadrupeds. He has spent several years in travelling through the states of South America, particularly Brazil, and in his researches has discovered much to add to the cabinet of the ornithologist. Among the quadrupeds on board the Ohio is a female ant bear, or ant eater. This animal is seldom, if ever, seen in this country, and we believe this is the second one that has lived to reach here. It is about seven feet in length and two high, and is perfectly harmless, although it has strength sufficient to master a tiger. When she lies down to repose, her tail serves as a shield from the weather, it being large enough to cover the whole body—when viewed in this situation, she resembles a straw mat spread on the ground. Its food consists entirely of eggs. [Essex Register.

JAMAICA. The Cornwall Chronicle of the 30th March has an article which states that a full meeting of magistrates took place on the 25th March, when Mr. Murray, the Wesleyan minister, and Messrs. Abbott and Nicholas, Baptists, were summoned to attend. They were required by the bench to enter into securities not to preach, or to hold meetings for that purpose. Upon their refusal to comply with the requisition, they were sent to the county jail.

INSURRECTION IN FORMOSA.

From the Canton Register, of December 20th, we derive the following particulars of the insurrection in the island of Formosa. It appears to be of a formidable character.

The insurrection commenced near Chang-foo—been about 40le from Tae-wan-foo, (the capital of the island) where twenty-six mandarins, great and small, together with about two hundred men, were killed.

The inhabitants of the western side of Formosa are natives of the island: Chinchew men, and Canton men; and the affray originated about five piculs of yams, which some Chinchew vagabonds took away from some of the resident Canton people, who immediately applied to the heads of the village where the plunderers lived, and received redress, but thinking that by applying to the Chang-hwa-heen they might prevent a recurrence of similar outrages, they did so, and the Chang-hwa-heen directly called upon five of the heads of families, and demanded money to the amount of 1,000 dollars each, the payment of which they resisted alleging that the affair was already settled.

To this he lent a deaf ear, keeping them in prison till the money should be paid. When they had been thus, for seven or eight days in confinement, finding them untractable he raked up a stronger charge against them, calling upon them to produce a Ladroue, who had escaped, and who could not be found. The head men concerned, exasperated at this unexpected demand, sent to the village privately, and offered a reward of 1,000 dollars to any one who would kill the Chang-hwa-heen. The villagers listened to the proposal, and in open day attacked the house of the officer, killed him and his attendants. The Tae-wan-foo, hearing of the affair, went in person, attended by about five hundred soldiers, when he was attacked, killed and all his force destroyed. Several other bodies of troops advanced, under various officers and were also beat off with great slaughter.

When the last accounts left, the Ching-tsung-pingwan was missing; the city of Tae-wan-foo in the possession of the Tae-wan-tae-yay, and about 30,000 men hired for the occasion. The villagers under the five head men were advanced against it more than 50,000 strong. From Amoy, 5,000 troops had embarked for the island under the land and water Tetubs. So the affair rests for the present.

YANKEE WIT.

The following is a capital and fair "hit," at certain things which have lately happened:

DINNER TO MAJOR JACK DOWNING—EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM DOWN EAST.

It affords me much pleasure to be able to send the first account of the civic honors conferred on this illustrious chieftain, who has been so instrumental in bringing to a glorious and bloodless termination the war of the straddlebills.

On the arrival of major Downing at the barrier of slabs and upturned roots which forms the eastern line of Harrysuki, and is now the suburbs of Downingville, he was met by a committee, the chairman of which, squire Joshua Grant, addressed the major as follows:

"Major Downing! Penetrated with the profoundest feelings of respect and gratitude, your fellow citizens of Downingville and of the region round about, have directed us to meet you at the threshold of your native city, rendered illustrious by your deeds of arms, and in their name to welcome and congratulate you on your safe return, after the perils, fatigues and hair breadth escapes encountered by you, alone and single-handed, in meeting the whole chivalry of South Carolina, with brigadier general Hamilton at the head, and ensign Frost at the tail;—sustaining the honor of knighthood unsullied; compelling the enemy to retreat beyond the reach of his own voice; out-bragged him at all points; and finally causing him to lick the dust, and cry pccavi!—thus showing to all Europe, Asia, and a pretty considerable part of Africa, how much can be done by one man when he is in earnest! We, therefore, invite you in the name of your fellow citizens in general, and your military copatriots in particular, to partake of a public dinner now "being cook'd," and in all probability (unless the devil is in the pot) will be ready in two hours from this time."

To which major Downing was pleased to make the following laconic and characteristic reply:

"Gentlemen! No more palaver, but let us prepare for action—some bitters—and while the punch is brewing I will take a julp, and then to dinner with what appetite we may."

At one o'clock, the company sat down to a sumptuous repast prepared in captain Zebulon Tripe's best style. After the cow-cumbers were removed, the president, general Flash-in-the-pan, rose and addressed the company in substance as follows:—Fellow soldiers and fellow citizens: citizen soldiers and soldier citizens! one and all please to fill a bumper to the man that's filled the gallon pot of his country's glory, and is ready to do it again and again if so be his country's glory should again be dry: are you all filled?" "I rather guess not," said lieutenant Spare-ribs—who like somebody of old grew hungry on what he fed on. The president not hearing or not heeding the lieutenant's reply, gave "Our guest—if Trajan found a Pliny, major Downing shall not lack an historian, nor brigadier Hamilton a bellows blower."

9 cheers—music "The Campbells are coming."

Major Downing arose amidst a thunder of applause, and with that peculiar winning, modest, retiring manner, and subdued tone, said: "Mr. President and gentlemen! little did I think when I left my native hills to meet the wishes of the hero of three wars (since the war of nullification is ended) little did I think that in the short campaign of six months such a change would be wrought in the destinies of the world! When I left you, all was dark and dismal despondency. The tariff, that terrible monster, was abroad like a roaring lion, seeking whom he might devour—all was going to wreck and ruin. The sun never rose till noon-day, the moon hid her pale face behind a nullification cloud which grew thicker and thicker and thicker, until my arrival at Washington, when on the 10 of December, anno Domini 1832, Andrew Jackson and myself issued a proclamation which dispersed the cloud and produced (if I might be allowed so to say) a day of political Pentecost; when Parthians and Medes, Elamites and dwellers in Massachusetts, were all amazed, saying one to another "what is this we hear? our own tongue wherein we were born?" A truce was sounded by squire Calhoun, and a nine years armistice agreed to by and between the keeper of the nullitys and the keeper of the tariff, by which it is agreed that the tariff is to go at large, having one inch of his tail cut off every year for eight years, and then the whole to be clipped close to the rump, provided they can hold him to perform the operation. Thus you see, fellow citizens, how all our difficulties are settled to the satisfaction of every body, and the tariff is now as tame and as harmless as a pussy cat—even before one inch of his tail is curtailed."

The major concluded his very animated remarks by proposing very magnanimously—the health of

Governor General Hayne,
Brigadier General Hamilton, and
"Ensign Frost!"

Wo to the Yankee who has his sauce out when such a frost comes on!

Song—"Twenty thousand volunteers all in a row."

Several other speeches and "volunteer" toasts were uttered, but I have not time to give them in regular order, but hope to have them prepared and revised by the authors, to send you next mail.

One of the invited guests, being "a stranger of distinction."

THE GEORGIA GOLD REGION.

Charleston, April 16. We have received the first number of a new weekly paper, called "The Western Herald," published by O. P. SNOW, and edited by A. C. FARMINGTON, at the village of Auraria, in the gold region of Georgia.

The village of Auraria is situated on the ridge dividing the waters of the Chastee and Etowah rivers, in Lumpkin (originally Cherokee) county. This melodious and appropriate name was adopted on the suggestion of Mr. Calhoun, when at his mines in the neighborhood, last November.

The first cabin was erected in Auraria about the first of June last, by William Deau, esq. who was followed by Nathaniel Nuckolls, esq. who opened a house of entertainment for the accommodation of those disposed to examine for gold in the surrounding country, and soon had it crowded. Around this nucleus a population soon gathered, composed of all classes and conditions of the human family, and there is now in Auraria one hundred family dwellings; eighteen or twenty stores; twelve or fifteen law offices, and four or five taverns, &c.

The town population is estimated at one thousand, and that of the county at ten thousand, and constantly increasing with a rapidity almost too incredible to relate.

The Indian population is small; their right of occupancy to the soil having, in most cases, been extinguished previous to the survey and distribution of the country.

The mines already drawn in the vicinity, (not involved in litigation) are yielding to the proprietors in rich abundance, the anticipated fruits of the most sanguine speculator.

The price of gold in Auraria is from 85 to 92 cents per dw't. according to its fineness; that collected in the neighborhood will average 90 cents, when well cleansed; when fluxed and run into bars, 92 cents.

Mr. McCollom, late of Tennessee, has constructed in the neighborhood a boat with a diving bell attached to it, for the purpose of raising gravel and collecting gold from the bed of water courses. The "Herald" gives the following account of "golden specimens" found in the vicinity.

"A. McLaughlin, esq. of our county, exhibited to our inspection, a few days since, a specimen from his mine, weighing upwards of forty dwts. supposed to be four-fifths gold, the remainder rough sand, which, from every appearance, must have been cemented to the bulk by heat at the time of its formation.

"Col. D. C. Gibson has also brought us a specimen taken from the bed of the Chastee river, on the lot owned by himself and col. Calhoun, weighing nine lbs. and three oz. with one hundred and twenty-four particles of gold upon its surface, plainly perceptible to the eye.

"On gen. Lawhon's lot in Cherokee county, we understand that a piece of pure gold was found last week weighing upwards of thirty dwts."

BLACK HAWK AND THE PRESIDENT.

From the Globe of April 27.

Black Hawk and his son, the Prophet and his son, and the other Indian hostages surrendered under the late treaty, waited on the president yesterday, to receive his orders. The president met them kindly. He directed the articles of dress provided for them to be exhibited to them, and told the principal chief that the whole would be delivered to him to be distributed, with a view to their common comfort—that they must repair immediately to Fort Monroe, and remain there contented, until he gave them permission to return to their homes—that the term of their detention depended upon the conduct of their respective tribes—and that they would not be restored to their families until it was ascertained that the stipulations of the treaty had been complied with by their people, and all the bad feeling which had led to the bloody scenes on the frontiers banished.

The Prophet replied to the president, and said, that they expected to be permitted to return immediately to their people; that the war in which they had been involved, grew out of their attempt to raise provisions, where they supposed they had a right to do so; that they had lost many of their people, as well as the whites; that their tribes and families were now exposed to the attacks of their enemies, the Sioux and Menominees, and that they hoped to be permitted to return to take care of them.

Black Hawk added to the remarks of the Prophet, that they considered that, like Keokuck, they had come to visit the president, and, like him, would be permitted to return to their homes. He entered into some brief explanation of the cause of the aggressions on the frontier.

The president told them, in conclusion, that he was well apprized of the circumstances which led to the disasters alluded to—that it was unnecessary to look back to them—it was his purpose now to secure the observance of peace—to prevent the frontiers from being again stained with the blood of its inhabitants, the peaceful and helpless—that they need feel no uneasiness about their own women and children, they should not suffer from their enemies, the Sioux and Menominees. He meant to compel the red men to be at peace with each other, as well as with their white neighbors—that he had taken measures with this view, and when it was ascertained that they were effectual—when the tribes had learned that the power they attempted to contend with, was equally able and disposed to protect the peaceful and to punish the violence of aggressors—when his information assured him that their people in particular, were convinced of this, and were disposed quietly and in good faith to observe the terms of peace granted to them, then they would be restored to their families. He then gave his hand to the chiefs and dismissed them.

Black Hawk is not an ill-looking man—his countenance is intelligent, and not savage. The prophet, we think, has more the look of the mischief maker, and, indeed, he assumed to be the principal in the interview with the president. He was, we suppose, the instigator of the massacres perpetrated on the frontier. His utterance and manner, as well as his countenance, indicated a dark and ferocious character.

SPERMACEETI WHALE FISHERY.

From the Nantucket Inquirer, of March 9.

For the following statistical views in relation to the spermaceeti whale fishery, we are indebted to a merchant of this place, who has carefully compiled them from the most authentic sources. We believe it to be the only accurate account yet published, of the importations of spermaceeti oil, at the various ports of the United States during the past year; and of the exact number of vessels actually engaged in the fishery at the commencement of the current year.

By comparing the importations of spermaceeti oil in 1832, with those of the preceding year, it will be seen that the supply was diminished more than 25 per cent.

Produce of the spermaceeti whale fishery in 1832.

Import of 1832, 107,751 bbls.—deficiency, 28,753 bbls.

At sea from the United States, employed in the sperm. whale fishery, Jan. 1, 1833, 203 ships and barges, viz:

From New Bedford and Fairhaven, 90; Nantucket, 57; New London, 10; Bristol, 10; Warren, 5; Edgartown, 5; Falmouth, 5; Hinds, 4; Newport, 4; Plymouth, 2; Salem, 2; Fall River, 1; Portsmouth, 1; Poughkeepsie, 1; Rochester, 1; Wareham, 1; Dartmouth, 1; Holmes' Hole, 1; New York, 1; Sagharbor, 1.—Total 203. Of which 8 sailed in 1829—43 in 1830—70 in 1831, and 77 in 1832.

A very important statement concerning the whale fishery is inserted in the volume of documents which issued from the New York convention of the friends of domestic industry. Among other things, it shews the quantity of sperm. oil imported from 1816 to 1830, inclusive. The quantity in a year is very uncertain—for instance, in 1826—32,840 bbls. in 1827—93,180; in 1828—73,077; in 1829—79,840; and in 1830—106,829.

This business consumes 30,000 bbls. of flour, and 30,000 bbls. of beef and pork, with great quantities of staves, iron, cordage and lines, duck, &c.

Of the common whale oil about 120,000 barrels were imported in 1831.

The whole number of ships employed, in both fisheries, is about 400—their value $7,500,000, and that of the annual product, one year with another, $3,500,000; and in all requiring not less than 100,000 barrels of flour and beef and pork, annually, 10,000,000 staves, and a vast amount of other lumber, timber, &c.

"Free trade" England imposes a duty of 5s. per tun of 252 gallons, on (right) whale oil, and of 8s. 3d. on sperm. oil—if imported in British vessels, manned with British subjects, being British caught—but of £22 3s. 4d. and £34 18s. 3d. if American caught, and imported in American vessels.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

In our collection of pamphlets, there is one published at Baltimore in 1835—recording the proceedings of "the [Maryland] state convention, on internal improvements," &c. with an "appendix, containing the views of Thomas Ellicott, esq." which latter so much accords with our own opinions on the general subject, and are so important in this AGE of VETROES, that we are induced to make a liberal extract—as follows:

"If it be an axiom that labor is the source of wealth—that the most fertile lands possess no intrinsic value, unless labor be united with them in producing those commodities which add to the convenience and happiness of man—the richest mineral productions of nature have no intrinsic value, unless labor be applied to convert them into convenient form for use; hence a country abounding in the most fertile soil—all the various mineral productions—the finest rivers and water powers for prosecuting the mechanic arts—with a varied and highly genial climate, may be so poor as not to afford a comfortable subsistence for a single individual; because the absence of labor prevents the bounties of nature from being called into action to supply the necessary wants of human life.

"All plans, therefore, which are calculated to produce the application of labor, to bringing into operation those latent bounties of nature, which, but for labor, would remain in the bowels of the earth, are plans that are highly worthy the consideration of political economists, and are legitimate objects for the exercise of sovereign power.

"It is a principle in political, not less than in domestic economy, that when the expenditure exceeds the income, poverty must ensue. A nation can no more sustain, in fact, a balance of trade against her, for a long time, than can an individual. Though an individual may own tracts of the finest lands, if he neglect, either directly or indirectly, to apply labor to cause them to produce the commodities that will supply, not only such of his wants as they are capable of, but in addition to this, also, a surplus sufficient to exchange for such commodities as his happiness requires, and which his own domain will not produce: such an individual may exist, but his reasonable wants will not be supplied; he can neither bear his portion of public burthens, nor educate a family in such way as shall preclude the certainty, that a few generations only will elapse, before such family will have sunk into barbarism. A community thus circumstanced, would, by parity of reasoning, pass few generations before it would become semi barbarian.

"If an individual should possess an island so remote from the other parts of the world, that the produce of his fertile soil, brought forth by the most judicious application of labor, will not bear the expense of transportation, to effect an exchange for articles produced in other parts of the world, and which are necessary to supply his reasonable wants, his labor would be lost; his fertile soil without value, and he miserable. No stimulus exists to labor beyond the amount necessary to sustain life, and he dwindles from a useful member of a social community to a drone, existing in common with other animals, by the same means, upon the common air.

"Thus the United States, extending over a region containing every variety of climate and soil; every where irrigated with the purest streams; with a population unequalled, for industry, intelligence and enterprise, spread every where over her territory may, nay, must become, in a few generations, less industrious, less intelligent and less enterprising, if labor shall continue to receive no reward, owing to the expense attending the transportation from the grower to the consumer.

"If a barrel of flour shall be worth, in the island of Cuba, seven dollars, and it will cost to the grower of the wheat, seven dollars to transport the flour from the place of its production to Cuba, he will receive no reward for his labor: but, if a barrel of flour will sell in Cuba for seven dollars, and the grower of the grain can convert it into flour, and transport it to Cuba for five dollars, he will receive a reward of two dollars for his labor.

"Under such circumstances, labor is most valuable near the seaboard; because the expense of transportation from the producer to the consumer is less—a scale may be graduated from a point on the seaboard where labor is most valuable, to a point in the interior of the country where it is of no value, as a means of producing wealth.

"For instance, suppose a ton of iron in England be worth fifty dollars, and the freight even in a foreign vessel, will cost four dollars; if this iron be produced in Baltimore county, Baltimore county will gain forty-six dollars for that which cost nothing but the application of labor upon inert matter, for neither of which she would have received any thing but for the market afforded in England. But if the ton of iron is to be sent from Pittsburgh to England, the cost of transportation from Pittsburgh to Baltimore must be also deducted from the English price; which would be so great that there would be no reward left for the labor required in converting the mineral into malleable iron; it would therefore not be produced at Pittsburgh; both the mineral and labor would be of no value at that place.

"A ton weight of superfine flour may be worth at Baltimore, for exportation to foreign countries, fifty dollars, while at the distance of two hundred and fifty miles from Baltimore, in the interior of the country, it will be worth nothing for exportation, because by the ordinary means of transportation, even on good turnpike roads, it will cost fifty dollars to transport it to Baltimore. The soil, therefore, must remain unoccupied, because the husbandman can receive no reward for his labor—and the nation will be none the richer for possessing both land and labor, at the distance of two hundred and fifty miles from the seaboard, unless the value of agricultural products shall increase in foreign countries, or labor be diverted to other objects than the growth of grain.

"The expense of transportation on the most perfectly constructed turnpike road, per mile, will be nearly as follows, viz:

"For twenty miles, which is a day's travel, it will require, to carry two tons, six horses and one man—
Six horses at 75 cents per day, each, is	$4 50
One man at 75 cents,	75

Making $5 25

"Which, divided by two, will leave for transporting one ton, $2 62½; for twenty miles, which $2 62½ divided by 20, will make the cost of transportation of one ton, one mile, 13½ cents.

"The expense for transportation by a good canal will be as follows, viz:

"For twenty miles, which is a day's travel, it will require to carry twenty-five tons, one horse, one man and one boy—

One horse at 75 cents per day	- - - - -	75
One man at 75 cents per day	- - - - -	75
One boy at 50 cents per day	- - - - -	50

Making together $2 00

"Which, divided by 25, the number of tons, will give 8 cents for transporting one ton twenty miles; which 8 cents, divided by 20, will give less than half a cent per mile for a ton weight.

"In this calculation there is no charge for wagon or boat; nor is there any charge for toll, because these would be nearly equal in either mode.

"Let it, however, be assumed as a fact, that the cost of transportation on a road is twenty cents per mile, exclusive of tolls, for each ton weight; it will appear then that a ton weight that is fifty fifty dollars on the seaboard, is worth to the producer of the article one dollar less at the distance of five miles therefrom, and so on for every five miles as he recedes into the interior of our country; until at the distance of two hundred and fifty miles, it is worth nothing with the ordinary means of transportation.

"It will then follow that all the labor which the population of that portion of our country which is situated two hundred and fifty miles or more from a shipping port, with all the fertile lands equally distant, are worth nothing, as a source of national wealth, if the labor can only be employed in agricultural pursuits, or in the production of articles of no greater value than wheat; because there is no inducement to employ labor, which is the mother not only of individual, but of national wealth.

"The demand for the produce of our soil, it is true, may become greater than it now is, or has been for the last seven years; and consequently, the value be increased on our sea coast, so as, at times, to extend the limit beyond two hundred and fifty miles, from which the great staple of the middle states may be exported; but this will not alter the principle: the relative value of land and labor will remain the same, agreeably to the scale of distances stated—for, admitting that a foreign demand shall increase the value of a ton of flour to double of its present value, or one hundred dollars at the port of exportation, the same article would be worth nothing, as an article for export, at the distance of five hundred miles from such port.

"Having now, as I suppose, established the premises, that neither labor nor land, with the ordinary means of transportation, are of any value as a source of national wealth, during the present pacific state of the world, at a distance of two hundred and fifty miles from navigable waters; it will follow that, if the means of internal transportation cannot be rendered less expensive than it now is, that at least two-fifths of the physical power of the nation, with eight-tenths of its most fertile soil, must remain inoperative, until called forth either by increased demands in foreign markets for the produce of our soil, or until the means of conveyance from the grower to the consumer shall be rendered less expensive.

"If it be admitted now that the exports of the United States amount to fifty millions of dollars annually, with but three-fifths of the population employed in productive labor, it will follow that, if the remaining two-fifths can be employed with equal industry upon a superior soil, that the surplus produce for exportation will be eighty-three and one-third millions, thereby adding to the national wealth thirty-three and one-third millions of dollars annually, from a source now producing nothing beyond the means of subsistence of the population inhabiting a remote, though the most prolific portion of our country.

"This wealth may not, it is true, return to us in the precious metals; but if it is more than sufficient to supply our wants in the products of other countries, the difference must remain with us in those metals. Experience has shown, however, that with the means of gratifying wants, wants increase; and hence it is fair to presume that an increased importation would naturally follow a greatly increased exportation: the effect of which would be, that, supposing an increased importation to the amount of thirty-three and one-third millions, and the imports to be collected upon the amount at an average of twenty per cent. the resources of the national treasury would be augmented upwards of six and an half millions of dollars annually; or in ten years sixty-five millions.

"But there are other considerations of great weight, which ought to urge the general government to the adoption and execution of an enlarged system of internal improvement.

"Nearly the whole body of public land lies far in the interior of our country; too remote from the sea coast to justify a hope that it can be sold to settlers for the purpose of cultivation, until a channel is opened by which the surplus produce of the soil can be transported to market.

"The United States is supposed to contain two millions of square miles, and, at the rate which Europe is populated, is capable of sustaining one hundred and twenty millions of souls—one million square miles are assumed to be arable land. The Atlantic states may contain about three hundred and seventy-five thousand square miles, of which one-half or one hundred and eighty-seven thousand are supposed to be arable; this amount deducted from one million will leave for the western states and territories, eight hundred and thirteen thousand square miles, or upwards of five hundred millions of acres of arable land. Of the whole quantity of land west of the Alleghany mountains, there is but an inconsiderable portion sold: perhaps not more than two hundred thousand square miles; and this is incumbered with a debt due to the government of about twenty millions of dollars. There must, therefore, remain in the hands of government upwards of six hundred thousand square miles, or three hundred and eighty-four millions of acres of arable land. A great portion of this land, it is true, may not be required for settlement and cultivation for a long time; but it is a mine of wealth, which the nation may, with much certainty, look to at some time both for direct revenue, and indirectly, through a vastly extended population, as resource of incalculable national wealth.

"The population of the United States, which now amounts to ten millions, may be reasonably expected, within the next thirty years, to amount to twenty millions, and will naturally seek to spread itself into that region of country where land is to be had upon the cheapest terms and of the best quality.—This increase of population will furnish purchasers for lands, that would otherwise remain useless to the nation. A reasonable estimate would be, that one-half of this increase will be located in the valley of the Mississippi, and that ten acres of public land will be purchased for each inhabitant. This, for five millions, in addition to the inhabitants which that region now contains, would require fifty millions of acres of land; which, at one dollar per acre, would produce to the national treasury fifty millions of dollars, at the end of thirty years. Great as this consideration is, it is, however, of minor importance, when it is considered that the labor of this five millions will increase the whole exports of our country one-half more than they would be, if the land remains useless for want of a cheap and easy channel of communication with other parts of the world.

"Under such views, can a doubt exist that it is the true policy of the national government to use all the constitutional power it possesses to call into action the force of the nation, in producing from that which is now useless, that which is valuable and necessary to the whole human family. It would seem that sound reason, not less than self interest, would forbid a different conclusion. The object then, is a national one; the nation at large is to be benefited by an augmentation of its wealth, and the treasury of the government is to be enriched from that cause. Who then ought to effect the work? The government of the nation. Who ought to pay the expense? The national treasury.

"But it will be asked, admitting that the government of the United States has ample powers, and the national resources would be augmented to the extent supposed, what measures must be adopted that will produce the result? It may be answered, canals, or rail roads, if experience shall prove them preferable. But canals have been proved in Europe and more recently in our own country.

"Let us therefore, examine the result of a calculation upon the means of transportation by canals, and see whether that portion of the labor of our country with the fertile lands, which lie beyond a distance of two hundred and fifty miles from the seaboard, may not be brought into operation.

"The expense of transportation upon a good canal, exclusive of tolls, does not exceed for a ton weight, by actual experiment, one cent per mile. If, then, a ton of flour at Baltimore be worth fifty dollars for exportation, at the distance of two hundred and fifty miles from Baltimore, it will be worth forty-seven dollars and fifty cents, or at the distance of five hundred miles, it will be worth forty-five dollars; affording an inducement sufficiently strong when their more fertile soil is considered, to call forth the energies of the population of that portion of our country which lies more than two hundred and fifty miles from the sea coast.

"If the introduction of canal transportation will, with a population of ten millions, increase our exports of domestic articles from fifty to eighty-three and one-third millions, it will follow, admitting that only one-half the increase in the next thirty years, shall settle on the west of the Alleghany mountains, and that no increased export shall take place in consequence of an increased population on the east of those mountains, that at the end of thirty years our exports will amount to one hundred and twenty-five millions of dollars annually; and consequently, if the proceeds of this shall be returned in articles paying the same duty that is imposed by the present tariff, the revenue of the government will be further increased five millions of dollars; making in the whole, an increased revenue of eleven and an half millions annually, in consequence of calling into action additional labor, by affording the means of canal transportation to the products of the west, at the end of thirty years; to which may be added the addition of fifty millions of dollars, the proceeds of the sale of public lands, that otherwise would remain unproductive in the hands of government; and also, enable the debtors to the United States to pay for land already sold, twenty millions of dollars, by affording them the means of transportation for the produce of labor to market. These results being susceptible of mathematical demonstration, require no further elucidation; nor can it be supposed that the enlightened body who compose the government of the country, can require arguments to convince them that the true principles of political economy require that measures should be adopted, without delay, which shall in the shortest time possible, effect objects so highly beneficial to the community over whose destinies they hold so important a control.

"If the preceding views be correct, it would seem clear, that the people of the United States, as a community, are all deeply interested in opening a communication from the waters of the Atlantic to those of the valley of the Mississippi. At what point this communication ought to be made, can only be ascertained by actual survey and measurements, that which shall be the shortest and most certain ought to be adopted, without regard to local prejudices or partial considerations. And it is of secondary importance to the nation, whether the expense of construction shall be ten or twenty millions of dollars, seeing that it will be paid for by money, which will have been drawn from the pockets of the community, and which, after having returned to them, will again find its way in the shape of imposts to the public treasury.

"But the recent instance of the construction of a canal from the Hudson river to lake Erie, a distance of three hundred and sixty miles, by a single state of this union, without imposing a dollar tax upon her inhabitants, shews that no fears are to be entertained of increased public burthens, even by those who watch over the treasury of the nation with the most Argus-like eyes.

"If it be admitted that the canal to unite the eastern and western waters, were to cost twenty millions of dollars, and to be ten years in the construction; that the whole money to be expended should be borrowed, upon an average of five years time, at five per cent. interest; the cost of the canal would then be, when finished, twenty-five millions of dollars, the interest of which would be one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars per year; for which, in the first place, the nation would increase its exports thirty-three and one-third millions annually, with its present population, and increase its revenue six and a half millions annually, in addition to whatever tolls shall be imposed upon the navigation.

"These considerations have induced me to believe, that the only question with the general government ought to be, is the communication between the waters of the Atlantic and those flowing from the immense valley of the Mississippi, practicable, either by canals or rail roads, with locomotive and stationary engines? and not what will be the expense in the construction; seeing that if it be at all practicable, no expense can be incurred but what the nation can bear without oppression in the first place, and which, in the end, will be ten fold remunerated.

"And here, permit me to state, that I entertain none of those scruples which appear to prevail in some parts of our country, upon the legitimate powers of the general government, extending to what is emphatically termed works of internal improvement; provided those works are calculated either 'to pay the debts or provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States;' or 'to regulate commerce among the several states;' or 'to establish post offices or post roads;' inasmuch as congress possesses the power 'to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying the above objects into execution'—I entertain, and I trust the general government will entertain none of those scruples, because the necessary powers appear to be as clearly granted to that body as any other implied powers under the constitution.

"If the adoption and execution of a system of internal improvement will not aid in the 'payment of the debts of the United States,' by increasing their ability to produce the means of payment, or will not aid in the 'common defence,' by providing channels of communication for the transportation of the means of national defence, from one part of the union to another; or will not 'promote the general welfare,' by increasing the resources of the nation, and cementing the union, by the ties of intercourse and common interest; or will not 'regulate commerce among the several states,' between which no commerce can exist without such improvement; or will not 'establish post roads'—if none of these objects will be effected, then, indeed, is the general government precluded from legislation upon the subject: but if any one of those objects are to be accomplished by the construction of roads and canals, then the general government certainly possesses the constitutional power 'to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying such objects into effect.'"

"[§§—The rest of the matter is generally local, and is therefore omitted, except the last paragraph.]

"Having endeavored to show, that the interest of the United States, at large, will be greatly promoted by the prosecution of a liberal and extensive system of internal improvement, which shall extend its benefits to every portion of the union, and that no constitutional impediment now exists to their government immediately commencing such works; and also, that the state of Maryland is equally interested in the adoption and prosecution of a liberal system of internal improvement, within her own limits; and that her resources are amply sufficient to meet any expense she may incur in effecting a work, calculated in so great a degree to increase her population and augment her wealth, I commit the resolutions, which I have had the honor of submitting, to your candid consideration, with an assurance that if the principles they contain shall be found objectionable, that any others which may be proposed, and which shall present a reasonable prospect of accomplishing a work in which I feel that all my interests are united, shall have my most cordial approbation and support."

§—While the Alleghenies stand,—will stand the principles so ably set forth by Mr. Ellicott.

LEGISLATURE OF NEW YORK.

IN SENATE—APRIL 12. Report of the committee on finance, on the bill from the assembly relative to reducing the rate of interest, and sundry remonstrances against the same.

Mr. Bronson, from the committee on finance, to whom was referred the bill from the assembly to reduce the rate of interest to 6 per cent. and discount to 5, and guard these rates by the existing usury penalties; and to whom also was referred the several remonstrances from the cities of New York, Hudson and Albany, and from the county of St. Lawrence, against the passage of said bill, reported:

That the important bearing of the proposed enactment upon the industry of our state, the elaborate discussions had thereon, the anxiety manifested in relation to the measure, and the diversified views of legislators, commend it to the careful consideration of the committee, and demand their best efforts to elucidate a subject somewhat perplexed by subtleties and speculation. They propose,

1st. To explain the distinction between capital and currency:

2d. Describe the appropriate office of each and the laws which govern them, and allude to our banks:

3d. Inquire into the necessity or propriety of regulating by law the hire or interest to be paid for capital.

And 1st. Capital comprises all the commodities of a country which have value, including the soil, mines, manufactories and their products, as well as merchandise and the artificial channels, the vehicles, craft, ships, &c. which circulate it.

The amount of capital thus defined, owned or possessed by the citizens of this state, or invested in it, we estimate at a sum not less than 800 millions of dollars.

The valuation by the town and county assessments, including the stock of chartered banks, would amount to about half that sum, allowing for other corporate property not returned by them, for under valuation, for personal property which escapes the assessor, and it is believed the above estimate is below the truth.

The currency of our state amounts to about 14 millions, of which say 12 millions are bank paper, and 2 millions are metal. Our currency, therefore, bears the proportion to our capital of 13 per cent. that is, for every hundred dollars of capital we possess one and three-fourths dollars in currency.

Office of currency, and the laws which govern it.

The office of currency is to measure capital when it changes owners, or passes from producer to consumer, saving to parties the trouble of seeking out each other and exchanging their products. Thus, a person possessing a commodity and wishing to exchange it for another, first converts it to currency, and with that seeks out the article which he desires to possess. The currency is not an object of desire to either party, except so far as it facilitates the exchange of the commodities they would part with for those they would possess, and it is always dismissed so soon as it has performed this office of measuring the value of the article exchanged, and is again required to minister to the convenience of others in the same manner.

It has been estimated by writers of authority that one dollar of currency would exchange five dollars worth of commodities each year; thus our 14 millions would exchange 70 millions annually. Although currency bears so small a proportion to capital, yet it is of the first importance that it should be well regulated, measuring capital with precision and steady uniformity; for it is this small amount of currency, (13 dollars to the hundred), which stamps on capital its apparent value; we say apparent, for it does not affect its real or intrinsic value. A well regulated currency, or in other words, a uniform measure of capital, performs not only our domestic exchanges faithfully, but the foreign also; it regulates our exports and imports with all the precision of which exchanges are susceptible. But a deranged currency not only exchanges our domestic products imperfectly, but perplexes foreign trade, deranging exports and imports, and baffling the skill of the merchant in his efforts to equalize the markets of the commercial world. Thus a superabundant currency operates upon the capital it measures like a short yard stick, a light weight, or a small measure; while a contracted currency operates like the long stick, the heavy weight, or the large measure. Each extreme is alike mischievous. Abundant or degraded currency apparently swells the value of commodities, and we say houses, lands and merchandise are dear, whereas in truth, money is cheap, or currency is degraded. Thus, a man purchasing a farm, or merchandise, at a time when currency was degraded, being too abundant and too cheap at 25 per cent. and being obliged when his payment falls due to convert the same farm, or merchandise, into a currency restored to its true standard value, would find to his cost that the capital which had been measured to him at $4,000, and for which he had obligated himself to pay in currency, would, by the corrected and true standard, be measured back at $3,000, and that he had lost by this derangement of currency 25 per cent. of his estate, while the estate itself, the farm or merchandise, had neither gained or lost in its intrinsic value; but his loss had been produced by the use of a fluctuating measure or standard, a loss as fatal to him as if the estate had actually withered to two-thirds of its dimensions under his possession.

The currency of a country will always be best regulated when left free to obey the impulse of commerce, unshackled and unembarrassed by legislation. Such impulse will expand and contract its volume, expel it from a country when it has become abundant, and restore it again when it has become scarce. Commerce tends with all its force to equalize currency as well as all exchangeable commodities among trading communities, at home and abroad; and although, like the tide, it is perpetually ebbing and flowing and never finds an exact and quiet level, yet commerce will not tolerate great inequalities in the currency of the trading world, unless thwarted by political events or legislative enactments. It is this approach to equality of distribution which constitutes both the utility and perfection of currency.

The process of regulation is as follows: A superabundant currency at a given place becomes a degraded currency, compared with that of the rest of the world. It gives to exchangeable commodities a false value, raising the price of exportable articles until they will not pay cost and freight; then the dollar, the guinea and the doudloon drop their character of currency or measure of value, assume that of merchandise, and take the place of the bushel of wheat, the barrel of flour and the bale of cotton, which the merchant rejects, and go abroad in lieu thereof to pay a debt, or in search of foreign commodities with which to gorge a market rendered voracious by this excess of currency. An equilibrium is soon restored by the four fold operation of refusing to export the domestic products which accumulate at home, where they are useless, by superadding foreign commodities to a market already overstocked with them, and by transferring specie from a country where it is abundant and cheap, to one where it is scarce and dear. Thus money rises, commodities fall, exportation increases, importation diminishes, and the vibration thus produced is not arrested until the redundant currency has become a contracted one; commodities in their turn become too cheap, and money too dear, and the former are sent in search of the latter to restore again the equilibrium.

Such are the laws by which commerce and currency mutually govern and control each other, and when the currency consists of metal alone, its ebb and flow is so gradual as never to produce agitation, unless impeded or impelled in its progress by political convulsions or unwise and fickle legislation; an abundance or scarcity is hardly felt before it is corrected.

Not so, when 12 parts of the 14 of our currency is paper, which cannot like metal assume the character of merchandise for exportation. Commerce is then compelled to make all her drafts on this small stock of metal which the banks have collected to her hands and hold ready for banishment at the shortest notice. And at the moment commerce begins to exhaust the metal, the banks, under the influence of a panic, and in obedience to the law of self-preservation, withdraw the largest possible amount of their paper currency in the shortest period of time, until by the combined efforts of all the merchants and all the banks, a pinching and cruel dearth of currency is suddenly produced, measuring out the debtors' capital to his more fortunate creditor with unrelenting extortion. It is true this severe process soon restores order and health to the commercial community, but like the tornado, which replaces a pestilence by a salubrious atmosphere, leaves abundant traces of its devastating march.

Banking.

This important subject, which the bank commissioners have discussed with ability, demands from us a brief notice, from its connexion with the subject under consideration.

If our banks could be restrained to their legitimate office, of furnishing our currency, and affording a safe deposit for the idle capital of our citizens, and possessed the power of withdrawing at pleasure a portion of this currency, as it became redundant, without producing revulsions in commerce, they would fulfil the office for which they were created, and prove abundantly useful to the public.

The bank capital of our state amounts to about twenty-five millions	$25,000,000
The currency	14,000,000
Deposites of idle capital, say	10,000,000

Together	$49,000,000
----------	--------------

being the amount of the debt due the banks, excluding the United States branches.

If we assume that fourteen millions of currency are required to perform the exchanges of our state, then banking capital to an equal amount, say fourteen millions, it is believed would be adequate to our wants, and sufficient for all useful purposes.

Of these fourteen millions of capital, ten might be invested in public stocks, or permanently loaned on bond and mortgage, while the remaining four millions were held in specie; with the capital thus disposed, these banks might safely exchange their credit in bank paper for good commercial bills or notes, payable at two, three and four months, and thus would the banks furnish the fourteen millions of bank currency required, and would hold, in addition to their capital thus secured, fourteen millions of commercial paper, representing the exchangeable commodities of the country, always convertible to currency, and always to be converted and applied to their payment as the discounted bills reached maturity; every cancelling or payment to be followed by the discount of a new bill, and a new issue of bank paper; and thus would a sum equal to such capital be loaned and redeemed four times each year, amounting in the aggregate to fifty-six millions. If each 90 days loan of bank paper performed two exchanges of property before it returned in payment of the bills discounted, one hundred and twelve millions of commodities would be exchanged annually with this bank currency, a larger sum we doubt not than would require the agency of currency.

With such a reservation of specie, say four millions, and with good bills equal in amount to the currency in circulation, and payable at the rate of more than one per cent. or one hundred and fifty-five thousand dollars per day, being about one million per week, the banks could never be embarrassed, or alarmed by any commercial revulsions, and might witness the exportation of their specie with calm indifference, knowing that a few days' receipts would be equal to any redundancy of currency; they might have issued in exchange for business paper, for it will be recollected that this redundancy cannot be very excessive when confined to such operations, and it should also be borne in mind, that the banker has to provide, in case of emergency, to redeem an amount equal to the difference between the minimum and maximum of the circulation. If ten millions shall be the minimum, and fourteen millions the maximum, then four millions will be the most that can be thrown back upon the banks, leaving at the least ten millions suspended in circulation.

We have thus endeavored briefly to describe strict, rigid and useful banking, a system by which the banker could contract or enlarge his business gradually, and would never, under the influence of a panic, diminish the currency so much and so suddenly as greatly to distress a whole community, and would possess the means in his specie and business paper, to meet all exigencies without resort to his bond and mortgage debt, or to his public securities, both of which would stand apart as a safety fund for his bill holder.

If it were necessary to wind up the whole system, and abolish the banks, a single year would suffice to accomplish it, and replace their paper by specie to the amount of fourteen millions; a year of scarcity of money and low prices to be sure, but not of severe distress.

If it be true, as we believe, that fourteen millions of capital, and more than two-thirds of that permanently invested, can be made to sustain a currency adequate to all the wants of our populous and commercial states, a currency convertible to specie at pleasure, and exempt from frequent and excessive fluctuations; the inquiry may well be made, whether there are not defects, dangers and delusions, connected with a system which pretends to have absorbed already near twice that amount of capital, and clamorously demands much more, no portion of which is permanently invested, but all held, or pretended to be held, in a condition to redeem bank paper, if occasion should put it in requisition.

Not only this bank capital of twenty-five millions, but also the deposit of ten millions idle funds and the fourteen millions of bills receivable, for which bank paper has been exchanged, amounting together to forty-nine millions, pretend to stand ready to redeem at short notice, any portion of these fourteen millions, or rather, that portion which can require redemption, being the difference between the minimum and maximum circulation, say four millions. With resources apparently so ample, the call of commerce for a single million of metal produces a serious bank panic, and a sudden contraction of bank currency.

This debt of forty-nine millions, which ought, if made upon banking principles, to produce spontaneously for the redemption of paper half a million per day, requires a severe and protracted pressure upon it to produce two or three millions for an emergency; and if forced to yield four or five millions, a sum equal to eight or ten per cent. of the debt, such pressure is attended with wide spread ruin and general consternation.

To reconcile such apparent power with such impotent and feeble results, we are forced to the conclusion, that many of the rules which ought to govern good banking, are disregarded. That much of the stock, though apparently paid for is withdrawn, and the holders' paper substituted therefor, in the same or some other bank. That much of the capital is loaned for long-winded operations, as farming, ship-building, long voyages, the erection of manufactories, mills, &c. That much of the discounted paper professing to be commercial, and representing commodities which can be converted to currency for the payment of the bill, is not strictly such, and that such paper, although paid at maturity, is indebted to some of the many expedients familiar to commercial operations for such payment—expedients, however, which demand new loans, equal in amount to those cancelled, and thus the merchant continues to be debtors to the bank, not for a small and temporary loan in anticipation of his bills receivable, but for a large proportion of his capital; which, though borrowed temporarily, is retained permanently, and cannot be surrendered in times of pressure without great sacrifice, if not ruin.

The committee cannot command the time or space necessary to explain intelligibly the evils resulting from the combination of so much capital with our currency, compelling them to share the fate of each other, and vainly attempting to subject them to the same laws, by which means both perform their office imperfectly; the capital but half subserves the interests of the borrower, as he holds it by a tenure so precarious as the wants and necessities of the banker—wants and necessities which are sure to press both banker and borrower at the same time, while currency is contracting and expanding by an artificial impulse, which greatly impairs its utility.

While we entertain no doubt of the solvency of our banks and their ultimate ability to redeem their currency, pay their depositors, and restore their capitals to the stockholders, except in the event of a commercial convulsion, yet all this is deemed secondary in importance to their duty of furnishing a uniform and stable currency. It is a law applicable to currency, that it increases in value as it decreases in volume, and decreases in value as it increases in volume. Thus, 10 millions of currency would exchange a given amount of commodities as effectually as 14 millions, with this difference; the contracted standard of 10 millions would give to them a value of about 72 millions, while the 14 millions would expand the same commodities to 100 millions; and if this was the annual amount of our exchanges, a variation of 4 millions in our currency, the difference between the extremes of a contracted or an expanded circulation, would raise or depress their value by 28 millions in one year, a sum equal to twice the amount of our currency; and when we estimate the mischiefs produced by applying a fluctuating and unstable currency to such an amount of exchanges; its gambling influence unsettling prices, enriching some, impoverishing others, and embarrassing all, by baffling and mocking their calculations, the consideration that our safety fund of a few hundred thousand dollars will protect us against an occasional loss in the currency of a broken bank, loses all its importance. Such failure and loss would be abundantly compensated, if they would teach caution to the public, and skill and prudence to the banker.

Notwithstanding bank charters have absorbed so much of our active capital, to the prejudice of long winded and permanent operations, stimulating trade and commerce almost to intoxication; notwithstanding that many villages of the interior are laid under contribution for their last dollar to gorge with capital and stimulate to excess the fevered few living bank charters, still the mania for charters threatens to swallow all our floating capital, leaving no other resource than banks for borrowers.

It is believed that restraining banks in their discount to 6 per cent. would tend to improve the character of their debt, by inducing them to reject long loans and collect more rigidly. And that restraining them in their issues to the amount of their capitals, (instead of twice the amount), would check the efforts of a part of the small country banks to extend their circulation; banks which with limited means for redemption, and emboldened by their high credit derived from the safety fund, push their operations beyond the limit of prudence, and fill up by their circulation, the vacuum, if any, left by their more cautious competitors. Such restraint might reduce the circulation of the country banks from eight millions, its present amount, to seven millions, or from about the amount of their aggregate capitals to seven-eighths of that amount, counteracting the general tendency to overload currency.

Both restraints would tend, in some small degree, to check the flow of capital into the bank channel.

Of capital.

In discussing the subject of capital, the laws which govern it, and the interest or price paid for its use, the committee will study to avoid all allusion to currency; and when they speak of interest they are to be understood as meaning the hire of capital, by which means they hope to relieve these subjects from the perplexing obscurity which has enveloped them when capital and currency were confounded.

Capital does not expand and contract with the same elasticity, or ebb and flow with the same rapidity, as the currency by which it is measured; nor does it obey the same laws. It is the fruit of industry, skill and economy. Under a good government, and in a community well regulated, its accumulation is constant and rapid, and the largest accumulations are found in the oldest countries thus governed and thus regulated. Its constant tendency is to flow off from these abundant and swollen fountains, and in the direction which promises the best return with the greatest security, whether that return be yielded in the shape of interest for loans, dividends on investments, commercial and manufacturing enterprises, or land speculations.

The same law which diffuses capital from fountain to rill, from an old to a new country, also requires at all points its perpetual and ceaseless change of investment, as one subject allures with more force than another; and thus do the various branches of industry approach and maintain their level.

It is believed that of the eight hundred millions of capital belonging to and in the possession of the citizens of our state, at least four hundred millions of dollars are lent and borrowed at from four to fourteen per cent. interest per annum. When it is considered that the bond and mortgage debt of the city of New York exceeds forty millions; that the debt on personal security must be still larger; that our bank loans of capital, excluding currency, are between thirty and forty millions; add to these large items the debts due the foreign land-holders, as the Holland company, the Pulteney, the Parish, the Chaumont and the Hornby estates, with many others of less magnitude; the three millions loaned by the Life Insurance and Trust company, and an equal amount by the savings' banks; the Connecticut school fund debt, and the vast amount of foreign and domestic debt due to and from individuals; this estimate will not be deemed an exaggeration.

With a debt so vast, being equal in amount to twenty-eight times our currency, and with such a propensity in our citizens to borrow and lend, it may be well to inquire whether its influence is salutary or pernicious, whether it should be tolerated or prohibited, encouraged or restrained; and to the committee it is consoling to believe, that this debt, vast as it is, produces public benefits proportioned to its magnitude.

The committee will assume that capital cannot be too abundant in any country, or too widely diffused, provided that diffusion is gradual. To deny this proposition would be to assert that we had cultivated and stocked too many farms, had built too many houses, mills, manufactories, and ships, or had accumulated too much merchandise.

Hire or interest of capital.

Capital cannot be made to yield capital again, without combining with it skill and labor, nor can skill and labor be made to yield capital, (beyond the hiring or servant's pay), without combining capital with them. Now it so happens in the wise ordering of nature, that the ability of the possessor to apply this labor and skill to the management of his capital, diminishes in the ratio of the increase of such capital, and that from two causes; first, from the increased labor of managing such accumulated capital, and second, from the decay of physical and mental powers by the approach of age; hence the man who has acquired wealth, finds his interest in lending or in investing it, to be loaned or managed by corporations. While every man in our community, where the field for enterprise is broad and ample, whose education, talents, occupation and skill fit him for a station above the servant or day laborer, being destitute of means, finds his interest also in borrowing, to the end that he may turn his talents and acquirements to profitable account. Even the mechanic, without a patrimony, could not avail himself of years of indentured service, unless he could borrow a shop and tools; nor the students of law and medicine of their mental acquirements, without their borrowed libraries; or the indigent farmer or merchant of their skill, without the borrowed farm or merchandise. Both parties therefore, find a mutual interest impelling them to lend and borrow; nor does the interest of the parties conflict with that of the public, as these loans diffuse and augment capital, affording alimony for labor, and yielding to humble industry an ample reward.

It is believed all these objects are best promoted, and capital most widely diffused, by loaning it in minute portions; thus combining the greatest amount of labor and skill with a given amount of capital, yielding in the aggregate the largest amount of revenue.

To illustrate: If a capitalist possessing $100,000, should invest this sum in the purchase and culture of one hundred farms, worth each $1,000, these hundred farms could have the benefit of the superintending skill and labor of one man only, and it cannot be doubted that such an investment would be wholly unproductive of revenue; whereas these hundred farms loaned to one hundred young, efficient and skilful farmers, would have the benefit of the superintending skill and labor of one hundred men, yielding to the lender $70 each, or an aggregate of $7,000 and would yield to the borrowers the support of one hundred families, and a gradually increasing surplus, until the whole debt of $100,000 should be ultimately extinguished and the farms doubled or trebled in value; such is the rapid process of accumulation in a country like ours, by the judicious combination of capital and labor.*

The capitalist undertaking to manage a hundred ships, mills or stores, could not prosper better than the farming experiment. Although capital thus divided into minute parcels yields the largest return, and can afford to pay the highest rate of interest, yet it may be advantageously borrowed in larger sums, and for more extended and costly operations, as manufacturing, navigation, &c. and the capitalist is content in such cases with a lower rate of interest, as he is saved the trouble of multiplying his transactions, and of re-investing so frequently. Capital, therefore, when loaned, has its wholesale and retail price or rate of interest.

Usury.

The committee being satisfied of the utility of borrowing and lending, it remains to inquire what regulations and restraints

* The committee are aware that our frontier settlements afford exceptions to this rule so numerous, as to furnish a plausible argument against our present rate of interest. But these settlements were made during a period of five or six years succeeding the late war, the flood of migration breaking away at that time, which had been restrained for a quarter of a century by a prosperous foreign trade, and the temporary prosperity of manufactures on the sea board, and the hostile and unsettled condition of the frontiers. When this settlement was making, our currency was exceedingly degraded by a long suspension of specie payments, baffling the skill and deranging the contracts of landlord and settler. One company alone have since abated near a million of dollars in principal, besides a large amount of interest, to conform those contracts to a regulated standard currency, and also to the depressed legal price of United States lands.

the law should impose upon these contracts. The most essential part of the contract, that of fixing the value of the capital borrowed, or the sum on which interest is to be charged, when that capital does not undergo the process of transmutation to currency, but passes direct from lender to borrower, has never been deemed a subject proper for regulation by legislative enactment or supervision; this price or value of the farm, the cotton mill, or the ship, is left to the exercise of individual discretion and skill, and even the forbearance or interest, technically called rent or charter, may be settled by the parties in all cases where the same farm, cotton mill or ship, are to be returned, no matter how remote the period of restoration; but when the value of the farm, cotton mill or ship, is to be restored in their several products, agricultural, manufactured or commercial, and these products are to be converted to currency, then legislation has decided that the case comes within its province, and the interest, hire, charter or forbearance, is no longer a fit subject for the exercise of individual skill and agreement. Nor is this all, or the worst of all. Legislation has also decided, (if the agency of currency happens to be invoked), that all lending and borrowing shall conform to one standard, and that an arbitrary one, which yields to no exigency, a standard at or below which all must lend and borrow, without regard to abundance or scarcity of capital, amount of loan, nature of security, prospect of gain or hazard of loss.

And yet this legal standard, which professes to regulate interest so rigidly, performs almost any other office than that of regulating. When the market rate of interest is below the legal rate, the law has no regulating force, capital is then loaned at the market rate, the law being a dead letter. When the market rate at one place is below, and at another above the legal rate—for instance six per cent. on Long Island and eight per cent. at Chautauque, the legal rate of seven per cent. guarded by penalties, instead of equalizing the interest of the two places, as it professes to do, would tend with all its force to increase the disparity, by checking the flow of capital from the cheap to the dear region, depressing the market rate to five per cent. on Long Island, and raising it to nine per cent. in Chautauque, deranging instead of regulating. When the market rate of interest at retail, or for sums of small amount, exceeds seven per cent. instead of regulating for this valuable class of borrowers, the law denies to them the use of capital, and in effect forbids their borrowing at all, while it secures to the large borrower and the best security the monopoly of borrowing.

Another class of borrowers, though not regulated by legal enactments, are greatly embarrassed and oppressed by them. We allude to the class whose moral integrity forbids the suspicion that they will avail themselves of the penalties of a law, the proffered protection of which they are willing to waive; and it is creditable to our community that this class is numerous, comprising, with many others, almost the entire mercantile population; but as the class of lenders are far less numerous than the borrowers, and many of them are deterred by moral restraint, and others by suspicion and timidity, from making loans at high interest, this large class of honorable borrowers are consigned to the mercy of a few lenders, and those the most enterprising and least scrupulous of their order, while their more scrupulous competitors retire from the field to avail themselves of the thousand doors thrown wide open for the profitable investment of their capital, by means of a temporary security thus aggravated by their own change of pursuit. Even the lender himself, whose conscience would not tolerate a ten per cent. loan, may, with a clear conscience, and under the protection of law, purchase the estate of the person to whom he had refused the loan, at a price which will yield twenty per cent. profit, and at a sale rendered necessary perhaps by such refusal.

It is notorious that the market rate of interest is often, and at places almost always below the legal standard, as at present regulated. Such standard, therefore, only operates where the market rate exceeds this limit, and then it works positive mischief by checking an influx of capital, which a higher market would lure from abroad; locking up at home by investment what had been loaned, denying to the borrower his accustomed supply, expelling capital and turning it into new channels, raising the market price extravagantly, and securing to a few the monopoly of lending at such exaggerated rates, deranging industry, and forcing our citizens to a frequent change of pursuit; and all this without, as we believe, one solitary benefit to atone for so much mischief.

When the crops of a country fail, famine is prevented by a rise in the price of bread-stuffs, which rise operates beneficially two ways: it allures a supply from foreign countries, and it also induces each one to curtail his consumption as much as possible. What would be thought, in this age, of a law that should counteract this salutary rule of commerce, and from a mistaken kindness to the poor, prevent a rise in the price of bread-stuffs? All laws restraining the price or hire of capital operate like such a law, with this difference, that the famine would fall indiscriminately upon all who did not possess bread, although they could command the means to buy at the cheap legal rate, but in the dearth produced by the attempt to make capital cheap, the whole calamity falls upon the borrower, the unfortunate victim of legislative care.

Our statute fixing interest forbids us, under penalties, to invite capital by the allurement of high prices to our market, and forces us to contract our business by bankruptcy and ruin to the quantity of capital which under, or in spite of the legal standard, can be had. It is precisely as if a furnished city should kill its inhabitants, till the numbers left were proportioned to the quantity of food on hand.

The committee are aware that improvident and ruinous loans are contracted, and would continue to be with or without legal restraint; but so far from requiring legislative interposition, these losses are the only legitimate and effectual restraints upon improvident borrowing.

Capital is borrowed solely with a view to gain; a pledge is required by the lender equivalent to the loan, which pledge is surrendered if the capital is dissipated. Here then are two motives of equal force to guide and control the borrower—the hope of gain and the fear of loss. If the hope of gain be strong, the fear of loss is equally so: if the desire for acquisition be inordinate, the fear of loss will be equally controlling.

With hopes and fears thus balanced, experience and observation alone are required to guide the judgment, and nothing can be more impressive and admonitory than to witness a neighbor struggling for years, and sinking at last under a load of debt charged with a high rate of interest; all who witnessed would avoid the danger as they value their former acquisitions or their future hopes.

Losses are incident to all pursuits having gain for their object, and they admonish to prudence and caution. Ship building ceases when low freights give warning to the merchant that navigation has been pushed to excess—importations are arrested by a losing market—so money borrowing ceases when it results in loss.

The committee have come to the conclusion that the best interest of the state will be advanced.

1st. In promoting the free circulation of foreign and domestic capital over our state, by giving stability and security to its investment, and by extending legislative facilities to associations who borrow and lend capital unconnected with currency—as savings banks, trust companies, &c.

2d. By restraining banks in their circulation to the amount of their capitals, and by restraining them in their discounts to 6 per cent.

3d. By repealing the usury penalties, except in relation to banks, and fixing the legal rate of interest 6 per cent.

If, however, the usury penalties should not be repealed, we would object to reducing the limit of interest from 7 per cent. which seldom presses upon the market rate, except in the new parts of our state, and fixing that limit at 6 per cent. which in many parts of our state, and at all times, would press upon the market rate, aggravating the evils incident to the present standard of interest. If these amendments generally should not prevail, then we would respectfully recommend that the further progress of the bill under consideration be arrested, in conformity with the prayer of all the memorials addressed to the senate.

REMARKS OF MR. DAVIS, OF MASSACHUSETTS,
In the house of representatives, February, 1833, on Mr. Root's amendment to Mr. Beardsley's amendment to the part of the bill which relates to wool.

Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. Davis), it is worth our while, before we vote on this measure—as it is the first, and will be followed by others of like character—to understand what principles we act upon. The amendment proposes to reduce the duty on wool, in three years to 25 per cent. ad valorem; and the amendment to the amendment proposes to leave that duty at 30 per cent. He should, he thought, vote for both, not because he approved of them, or considered them as suitable acts of legislation for this government to adopt, but because he considered them more favorable to the great agricultural interests of the country than the bill; and this was the only reason why he should give them his support, if he gave it at all.

He would, while up, take the occasion to say that probably few members on the floor felt more anxious than he did to see this all-stirring subject settled—to see national harmony restored, and the jarring opinions, if possible, reconciled. He had from the outset entertained this sentiment, and while all around him seemed to concur in it, and seemed anxious to allay excitement, and to cherish better feeling, it gave him pain to observe that the house, after more than four weeks of intense labor, had approximated little towards it; indeed, he said, the signs of the times were such that he despaired of any reasonable adjustment.

He saw the bill of the committee of ways and means execrated throughout the country as a measure unsuitable to be the basis of future revenue. He used no harsher language than facts justified, for it gives satisfaction no where in the portions of the union attached to the protection of our industry; and he was equally confident it was repudiated where he supposed it was designed to give contentment. We had now had it under consideration a month, had endeavored to amend, alter, adjust and bring it into an acceptable form. We had labored early and late, and what had it all come to? Would any one say we are now apparently any nearer to the object of desire than when we commenced? Every motion, every proposition to modify this bill, unsatisfactory as its provisions are, has been steadily and resolutely resisted by the south, and we have this painful evidence that no better propositions, no terms more just and beneficial to the country, are to be offered to us. The bill, therefore, and nothing else, has the approbation of those opposed to the tariff. We have, therefore, he observed, no alternative left, but to resist a measure so unjust and injurious; and this, for one, he should do to the last, if it were not improved.

The Speaker. The gentleman from Massachusetts must confine his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. D. inquired if it was not in order for him to argue that the proposed decrease of duty was impolitic and bad legislation?

The speaker assented to this.

Mr. D. observed, he believed he had confined himself within the strictest rules of order, and should continue so to do. He had spoken at large, on a preceding day, of the injurious policy of reducing wages, and of the pernicious tendency it had to make a poor, ignorant and miserable population, like that of Europe. He had said that duties could not be reduced on protected articles without producing this effect to an extent proportioned to the reduction; and this would not reach manufacturers alone, but all laborers in the country. He had therefore said, a question of reduction was one of serious import and should be well considered. And he would now inquire if the avowed object of this bill was not a reduction of revenue because there would be a surplus in the treasury? He did not concur with the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Beardsley), that we had any evidence before us of such an excess of revenue. The secretary of the treasury proved to us last summer, if the bill then passed, which did become a law, that it would raise only a revenue of $12,000,000; but he now alleges, only a few months having elapsed, that it will produce $18,000,000. It is not easy to understand his reasons for this change of estimates; nor is it easy to settle which opinion is entitled to most consideration. If it will raise no more than $12,000,000, the government will need that sum, and there is no occasion for further reduction. The secretary, however, does not pretend that even if the sum of $18,000,000 is raised, that there would be any surplus this year, for the whole will be absorbed by the demands of the government. No excess can accrue, therefore, before the close of the year 1834, and it is by his statement problematical whether there will be any then. Why should we be pressed so urgently on this subject now, as if it was a matter of certainty, when it is only a contingent? Why should we be forced to go forward blindfold—to grope along a path which the secretary himself seems not able to point out with any certain knowledge? Yet this reduction is alleged to be the main object of the bill, and we are urged to act here as if we knew that the laws would place in the treasury six millions of surplus revenue in 1834; and this is the reason pressed unceasingly upon us to pass the bill.

Such matters, he said, as came properly before us he was willing to consider. The public debt was nearly paid off, and we shall consequently have less occasion for money—we must therefore raise less than we hitherto have done, but we had not been unmindful of this event, and had prepared for it by lessening the revenue ten or twelve millions in a short period. He admitted that the argument against an accumulating surplus in the treasury was sound, and did not deny that the government must be limited in its income to its necessary expenditures, but the enemies of American industry insist on lessening the protection of the laborer, on the ground of a surplus. He desired assurance of the existence of such surplus—before he acted on this question, he wished to be made reasonably certain that hostility to our industry did not outrun all other considerations.

In voting, he said he should keep these considerations steadily in view, and would reiterate that he should support no bill that abandoned the principle of protection. In reducing the revenue, let us, he said, understand what we do, and upon what principles we act. It seems to be assumed here, that the only mode of reducing revenue, is to reduce all duties on imports equally. He protested against this, as a false, unsound theory, designed to destroy by its insidious action, the protective doctrine, without accomplishing the object it professed to have in view. The bill before us, which is recommended because it is alleged to be necessary to reduce revenue, contains items that by this process will increase, instead of diminishing revenue. Take, for example, ardent spirits—the duty on which is perhaps one hundred and fifty per cent. and suppose this duty reduced to seventy-five per cent. will not the importations which are now restrained by the very high duty be so increased as to increase the revenue? The committee of ways and means, he said he believed, admitted that this would be the result. The same may be said of other articles.

Mr. Wilde rose and inquired if it was in order to discuss the whole subject?

The speaker said no, the argument must be confined to the amendment.

Mr. Davis desired to be informed if it was not in order to shew the impolicy of reducing duties on wool in the manner proposed.

The speaker replied, yes. There was a cry from different quarters, "go on—go on." The argument he had used, was to that point. The general proposition is to reduce the revenue, and to accomplish this object the amendment proposes to reduce the duty on wool. To this he, in the form in which it stood, was opposed, and his argument he considered direct and legitimate for this purpose. The speaker nodded assent. Certain and fixed principles, he said, ought to govern us in this and all votes that we give on this and all other propositions for reduction—and at the head should stand constantly the principle of protecting American industry—no measure should meet with countenance that aims to abolish this.

The gentleman from New York, (Mr. Beardsley), said, the only wise way to reduce is to do it gradually. With that gentleman, he said, he concurred thus far—but we ought to look as well at what we had done as to what we were called on to do. In July last, congress considered this matter with the most anxious and deliberate attention, and lowered the duty greatly, and this should not escape observation, as any attempt to descend further may be attended with great peril, and may be followed by grievous calamity. Notwithstanding this, he observed, greater reductions were demanded to compose the irritated state of feeling which is alleged to exist in the country, and how can it be done? If done at all, it can be accomplished in but one way, without violence to private rights and great private suffering. It must be gradual—very gradual—and a long time, and arranged with great judgment and discretion. There is an immense interest at stake, and the prosperity—nay, almost the existence of a vast population involved in it, and it should be approached with caution, and changes affecting it made with sound judgment. What, he said, he would repeat, do you propose to do? Last July a great change was made, but the law goes into operation in March next; that change which was a reduction of twenty per cent. of the present duties on wool is still future, and will congress add to it the present proposed reduction of fifteen per cent. of the duties of 1832? Can the country bear this? for it is to be followed up on woollens and other articles. Will the wool grower be satisfied to have his property made thus the sport of this body? But this is not all, for this reduction is to continue for three years after the same rate. This is not gradual, but rapid—very rapid—and full of hazard. The time is not long enough, especially for men in debt. The descent should be slow; the annual reduction so small, that by increased skill and economy, men may not only exert themselves, but may succeed in meeting it. If, he said, you descend sixteen or twenty per cent. in a year, they will sit down in despair, being unable to grapple with it. Men should have time to prepare for changes in their business. This proposition of the gentleman from New York goes by long strides; it is very hurried; and though, said he, the principle is the right one, yet the details are objectionable.

He said he had occupied the attention of the house much longer than he intended when he rose. He would not, in conclusion, say the wool growers or the manufacturers would bear any change from the bill of '32, without hard pressure and suffering. He believed they would not, but hoped they would willingly make great sacrifices for repose. They were wearied with this endless warfare. And believing such to be their feelings, he should, for one, take the responsibility of voting a judicious and gradual reduction, if the discontented would sit down and be at peace under it; otherwise he would not lift his finger to carry any measure through. He rose to express these general views, that his course on this, and the measures which will succeed, might be understood. He did not propose, at present, to introduce any measure, but hoped, if the south desired, as they had often expressed themselves, to save our manufactures, and at the same time to compose all controversy, that some gentleman from that quarter would offer something beside this bill, which no man in favor of protection can support.

TREASURY CONSTRUCTIONS OF THE TARIFF.

CIRCULAR TO OFFICERS OF THE CUSTOMS.

Treasury department, April 20th, 1833.

The 7th section of the act of the 14th July, 1832, entitled "an act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," provides, "that in all cases where the duty which now is, or hereafter may be imposed on any goods, wares or merchandise, imported into the United States, shall, by law, be regulated, or be directed to be estimated or levied upon the value of the square yard, or of any other quantity or parcel thereof; and in all cases where there is or shall be imposed any ad valorem rate of duty on any goods, wares or merchandise, imported into the United States, it shall be the duty of the collector, within whose district the same shall be imported or entered, to cause the actual value thereof, at the time purchased, and place from which the same shall have been imported into the United States, to be appraised, estimated and ascertained, and the number of such yards, parcels or quantities, and such actual value of every of them as the case may require; and it shall, in every case, be the duty of the appraisers of the United States and every of them, and every other person who shall act as such appraiser, by all the reasonable ways or means in his or their power, to ascertain, estimate and appraise the true and actual value, any invoice or affidavit thereto to the contrary notwithstanding, of the said goods, wares and merchandise, at the time purchased, and place from whence the same shall have been imported into the United States, and the number of such yards, parcels, or quantities, and such actual value of every of them as the case may require," &c. &c.

The 9th section of the same act provides, "that it shall be the duty of the secretary of the treasury, under the direction of the president of the United States, from time to time, to establish such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States, as the president of the United States shall think proper, to secure a just, faithful, and impartial appraisal of all goods, wares and merchandise, as aforesaid, imported into the United States, and just and proper entries of such actual value thereof, and of the square yards, parcels or other quantities, as the case may require, and of such actual value of every of them; and it shall be the duty of the secretary of the treasury to report all such rules and regulations, with the reasons therefor, to the then next session of congress."

The 1st section of the act of the 2d March, 1833, entitled "an act to modify the act of the 14th July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, and all other acts imposing duties on imports," declares "that from and after the 31st day of December, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, in all cases where duties are imposed on foreign imports by the act of the 14th day of July, 1832, entitled 'an act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports,' or by any other act, shall exceed twenty per centum on the value thereof, one-tenth part of such excess shall be deducted," &c.

It is believed that by this provision, and as necessary to the execution of the law, all duties imposed by any act of congress, upon foreign imports, are substantially regulated by, and are directed to be estimated and levied upon, the value of the square yard, where that is the form, and upon some other quantity or parcel in cases where the duty is not imposed by the square yard, and that consequently the authority conferred by the 9th section aforesaid, must necessarily be exercised, for the more effectual execution of the said act of the 2d March, 1833.

The following rules and regulations are therefore established, under the direction of the president of the United States, for the purpose of securing a just, faithful and impartial appraisal of all goods, wares and merchandise imported into the United States from and after the 31st December next, and for the just and proper entries of the actual value thereof, and of the square yards, parcels or other quantities, as the case may require.

In all cases of ad valorem duties under the act of the 14th July, 1832, or any other act, the regulations at present authorised by law, for ascertaining the actual value, will remain unaltered. With respect to those articles liable to a specific duty, or other duty than that of ad valorem, the actual value thereof at the time purchased, and place from which the same shall have been imported into the United States or in the country wherein the same may have been originally manufactured or produced as the case may be, will be appraised, estimated and ascertained, and the number of yards, or square yards, tons, pounds, gallons, bushels or other parcels or quantities, and such actual value of any of them as the case may require, and just and proper entries thereof be made, in the same manner and according to the same regulations, as are required by the said act of the 14th July, 1832, and other acts now in force in regard to articles paying ad valorem duty; and in all cases the same verification of invoices and other proofs will be required and produced as are at present authorised in respect to articles liable by previous acts to an ad valorem duty.

The value of all such articles being thus ascertained, the proportion which the duty now paid by such articles bears to the said value, will be calculated, and from the excess thereof beyond twenty per centum: that is to say, where such proportion shall be equal to fifty per centum, there shall be deducted ten per centum upon thirty per centum, or three dollars; and from after the 31st December, 1835, the like deduction shall be made from the same excess, or ten per centum upon thirty per centum, being three dollars more; and in the same manner, at the several periods specified in the said act of the 2d March, 1833, until the 31st of December, 1838, from and after which, one-half of the residue of such excess will be deducted, and the other half thereof from and after the 30th of June, 1842.

From the proportion of the duty thus ascertained upon the wines of France, in addition to the said ten per centum, there will also be deducted such further per centum as will be necessary to preserve the discrimination in favor of such wines, stipulated in the convention between the United States and his majesty the king of the French, concluded at Paris on the 4th of July, 1831, and authorised by law.

It may be proper to observe that all manufactures of cotton, or of which cotton shall be a component part, will be appraised, estimated and ascertained, and the number of yards, square yards, or otherwise, parcel or quantities, and of such actual value thereof as the case may require, will be ascertained, and just and proper entries thereof made, according to the foregoing regulations.

It is believed that the value of foreign imports referred to in the act of the 2d March, 1833, is not the assumed value on which the duty upon all manufactures of cotton, or of which cotton shall be a component part, is directed to be estimated under the act of the 14th of July, 1832—viz: of thirty cents, if not dyed, colored, pointed or stained, though valued at less than thirty cents; and of thirty-five cents if dyed, colored, painted or stained, though valued at less than thirty-five cents the square yard. This value is merely artificial, and assumed by previous laws as a means of augmenting the ad valorem rate of duty imposed, for the purpose of protection, upon such articles; and the amount of the duty, although ascertained by the adoption of the minimum principle, is the proportion which the sum collected by the government bears to the actual value of the article; and, therefore, a quantity of such cottons, costing in fact eighty dollars, but valued for the purposes of the act of the 14th of July, 1832, at two hundred and forty dollars, really pays a duty of 75 per centum upon the true value thereof.

The act of the 2d of March, 1833, however, proceeds upon a different principle, and aims at a different purpose. It obviously intends to make an equal deduction from the duty on all foreign imports, and ultimately to reduce it to a rate not exceeding twenty per centum upon the real, and not an assumed, value of the articles imported. This last purpose is explicitly stated in the last clause of the 5th section, which provides "that all imports on which the 1st section of this act may operate, and all articles now admitted to entry from duty, or paying a less rate of duty than twenty per centum ad valorem, before the said thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, from and after that day, may be admitted to entry, subject to such duty, not exceeding twenty per centum ad valorem, as shall be provided for by law." And the first section, which has been already referred to, expressly provides for the deduction, after the 30th of June, 1842, of all excess of foreign imports above twenty per centum on the value thereof, which shall have been imposed by previous laws, and to which they may then be subject.

The object of thus establishing a general ad valorem duty on foreign imports, and of equalizing the rate only be attained by calculating the duty on the real, instead of the assumed value. This purpose is more particularly manifest from the last clause of the third section, which provides that from and after the 30th of June, 1842, "the duties required to be paid by law on goods, wares and merchandise, shall be assessed upon the value thereof at the port where the same shall be entered, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law." Each of these clauses relates to the actual value of the foreign import, and they differ only in estimating that value; previously to the 30th of June, 1842, the value in the foreign country being taken, and after that time, the value at the port of entry. The object of neither can be accomplished at any period, by adhering to the nominal value assumed by previous acts, or to the rate of ad valorem founded upon such assumption.

In all importations of manufactures of cotton, therefore, or of which cotton shall be a component part, after the 31st of December, 1833, the value thereof will be ascertained in the manner aforesaid; and from the amount which the rate of duty under the act of the 14th of July, 1832, or any other act, shall exceed twenty per centum on such value, the deduction required by the act of the 2d of March, 1833, will be made according to the foregoing rules.

Though these rules and regulations will not go into effect until the 1st of January next, they have been thus early adopted and made public for the purpose of giving timely notice to the manufacturers and merchants, and all others concerned; and especially as to the verification, by the consuls abroad, of the invoices of importations to be made after that time.

CONFAGRATION OF THE TREASURY BUILDINGS.

Treasury department, April 12th, 1833.

In the late confagration of the treasury building, nearly all the correspondence of the secretary of the treasury, from the establishment of the department to the 31st March, 1833, was destroyed, including, as well the original letters and communications addressed to the secretary of the treasury, as the records of the letters and communications written by him. With a view to repair the loss, as far as may be practicable, all officers of the United States, are requested to cause copies to be prepared, and authenticated by them, of any letters (excepting those hereinafter alluded to) which they may at any time have written to, or received from, the secretary of the treasury; and all those who have been in office, and other individuals throughout the United States, and elsewhere, are invited to do the same. That this correspondence may be arranged into appropriate books, it is requested that it be copied on folio foolscap paper, with a sufficient margin on all sides to admit of binding, and that no more than one letter be contained on a leaf. It is also requested, that the copies be written in a plain and distinct or engrossing hand. Where the original letter can be spared, it would be preferred. The reasonable expense incurred in copying the papers now requested, not exceeding the rate of ten cents for every hundred words, will be defrayed by the department.

The correspondence which has been saved, and of which, therefore, no copies are desired, are the records of the letters written by the secretary of the treasury to presidents and cashiers of banks, from the 1st October, 1819, to the 20th February, 1833; all the correspondence relating to revolutionary claims under the act of 15th May, 1828, and to claims of Virginia officers to half pay, under the act of 5th July, 1832; and to applicants for the benefits of the acts of the 2d March, 1831, and 14th July, 1832, for the relief of certain insolvent debtors of the United States. Copies of some circular letters and instructions, written by the secretary have also been preserved: and it is requested that, before a copy be made of any circular letter or instruction, written by the secretary of the treasury, the date and object of the circular be first stated to the department, and its wishes on the subject ascertained.

LOUIS McLANE, secretary of the treasury.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 11.—VOL. VIII. BALTIMORE, MAY 11, 1833. [VOL. XLIV. WHOLE No. 1,129.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

§7—A violent assault was committed on the person of the president of the United States, at Alexandria, on Monday last, by Mr. Randolph, lately dismissed from the navy—the particulars of which will be found in subsequent pages. We have no comments to make on this outrage. It requires none. It will, as it ought, receive the unqualified reprobation of every good citizen—whether the offence be considered with respect to the public office held by the assailed, or his advanced age and long and distinguished services.

We have inserted, (as was intended before an account of the assault reached us), Mr. Randolph's address to the public, setting forth his case—and added an article, on the same subject, which has since appeared in the "Globe;" but the merits of the matters stated cannot be allowed to have any sort of influence either to excuse or aggravate the offence of Mr. Randolph—it admits of no excuse, needs no aggravation.

§8—We present a collection of law cases, briefly deciding certain important points concerning matters of every-day interest to the public, and such as every-body ought to be well acquainted with.

§9—Under the head of "Foreign Articles" we have inserted an account of the passage of the "Irish disturbances bill," and certain interesting views of the origin and prospects of negro slavery in the British West Indies. If the government shall carry out its plans concerning the slaves, a compensation to the owners of them cannot be avoided without committing a flagrant act of injustice—for it was the [British] government which established the right of property in one man over the person of his fellow being, in the British West Indies, &c. On the policy of the project, and concerning its effects—there is much room for discussion.

§10—We much desire to publish and record, Mr. Burges' able speech in the house of representatives, at the last session of congress, on the tariff—and especially because of its important statistics. Its length has heretofore prevented its insertion—but we expect soon to have room for it. It will not suffer by the delay, nor "perish in the using."

"YANKEE NOTIONS." We inserted an article in our last, stating that Mr. T. H. Perkins, of Boston, had given a property worth 30,000 dollars, as an asylum for the blind, on the condition that 50,000 dollars should be raised as a fund to support the institution—adding that Mr. J. P. Cushing had put down 5,000 of the 50,000,* and that others were expected to contribute large sums, &c. The ladies of Boston have "notions," as well as the gentlemen, and they got up a fair, at Faneuil Hall, on the 1st inst. of which we have a long and vivid account, but cannot make room for. The display of ladies, and of the work of their hands, seems to have been truly magnificent; and the result was—that the receipts amounted to about ten thousand dollars, in aid of the fund for the instruction and support of the blind. A blessing will attend such "notions;" and, though some have preferred strong objections to such exhibitions of ladies, and we certainly think that they ought not to be frequent—the objects accomplished powerfully plead in favor of them. And besides, they afford convenient opportunities for persons to contribute such sums as are best suited to the condition of their purse, or flow of their heart, without an apprehension of shame for a "mite put into the treasury;" or hope of applause for a gift bestowed. A gentleman, whose name is not stated, sent $300 to the fair, with orders to invest the money in a pen-wiper!

"MORE YANKEE NOTIONS." The quadrant, the idea of steam wagons, the practical application of steam-power

* At the latest account, only 15 of the 50 thousand remained to be raised; so there is no fear that Mr. Perkins' "notion" will be "nullified," which may shew lack of "chivalry" at Boston!

in propelling boats, the cotton gin, the card making machine, and a multitude of other important and useful machines—are "Yankee notions." And the following, copied from a New York paper, adds another "notion" to the list:

It is we believe, generally understood, that in completing the manufacture of a single pin in the ordinary method twelve persons are employed in various branches; and Mr. Babbage in his treatise says that the lowest number employed is ten. We were this morning invited to examine a beautiful piece of mechanism made and patented by Dr. J. J. How, of this city, by which a pin is completed from the wire by a single turn of a crank. By this ingenious invention from forty to fifty pins are made each minute, and they are produced more perfect than those made in the ordinary way. Dr. How goes out with his machine to England in the packet ship Montreal, which is to sail on the 10th instant. He intends to take out a patent both in England and France. The machine was made at the manufactory of Messrs. Hoe & Co. Gold street, where it can be seen during this day.

INVENTIONS, &c. Judge Hinkle, of Hanover, Pa. has invented and obtained a patent for an apparatus, which he calls a "steam generator and refiner," and which from the certificates published, appears to be an important improvement in steam machinery. A distiller in Heidelberg township certificates that by means, of the apparatus, he is able to procure in one hour from twelve to fifteen gallons of whiskey, while by the old process from six to eight gallons only were procured in the same time. Mr. Mumma, the proprietor of the steam mill near Hanover, says, that before [the introduction of the apparatus, when the mill was in good order, 61½ bushels of grain could be ground in nine hours with a half a cord of wood; but that by means of the improvement, he can now grind 82 bushels in eight hours, with the same quantity of fuel. These are important advantages, and an invention capable of producing them, cannot fail to get into general use.

A watchmaker of the name of Buschman, living at Eisenberg, not far from Attamburg in Saxony, has contrived a piece of machinery, which without the assistance of steam, has been found strong enough to move a heavily laden wagon, placed in a fresh ploughed field, with the greatest ease, although sixteen horses could not stir it. The machine may be easily handled, and the vehicle moved by it most safely managed. The inventor has been offered 200,000 dollars for the secret, but as he had obtained patents from all the principal German governments, he has refused all offers.

[The above is called a "wonderful invention," and well it may be—whether on paper, or in fact.]

MASSACHUSETTS. A second fruitless attempt to elect a member of congress in Boston has failed. The votes were for Mr. Gray 1733, Mr. Lyman 1,138, Mr. Greene 776, Mr. Walker 521. So the first falls short of an election by 562 votes.

CONNECTICUT. No choice of governor and lieutenant governor having been made by the people at the last election, Henry W. Edwards has been elected governor, and Ebenezer Stoddard, lieutenant governor, by the legislature, as follows: for Mr. Edwards (Jackson) 147; John S. Peters (national republican) 70; blanks 10. The Jackson lieutenant governor was chosen by a larger majority.

NEW-YORK. The great fire in the night of the 30th ult. is thought to have dispossessed 300 families, and more than 1,000 persons of their homes, losing also the chief part of their effects, and generally of the poorer classes of society. On all the property lost, only 45,000 dollars were insured.

PHILADELPHIA. It is well known that when Philadelphia was laid out, it was the design of its founder, Penn, that all the space between the west side of Front street and the Delaware river should be kept open for the benefit of air, and the preservation of the health of the future inhabitants of the city; but this ground has been closely built upon, having one narrow street passing from north to south (Water street) and many narrow lanes and alleys from thence to the wharves; and when an epidemic has prevailed, the loss of life in this part of Philadelphia was excessive—for persons of the worst classes of society are sometimes huddled together, in great numbers.

As the means of the city, by the bequests of Stephen Girard, are now very abundant, it is proposed to restore, at least in part, the original plan, and remove the buildings located on the east side of Front street between Mulberry and Vine. The buildings are not of great value. The distance proposed to be thus thrown open, is about one-eighth of a mile long.

It is also suggested, that laws will be passed to prevent the opening of other streets and alleys than are now laid down in the plat of the city—and that the front on the Schuylkill, on which vast improvements are making, shall be kept open, &c.

BALTIMORE. The new line between this city and Philadelphia, via the canal, commenced operations on Saturday last. The steamboat Kentucky, in the Chesapeake, and the Ohio, in the Delaware, are admired by all who have seen them. They have few equals, and no superiors.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAIL ROAD. We understand that certain negotiations entered into between this rail road company and the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, have resulted in an arrangement by which the former work will proceed through the difficult passes of the Potomac to Harper's Ferry. We intend to give the particulars—for, whether mutually advantageous or otherwise, to the companies, the public is deeply interested in this matter.

The business on the road is mightily increasing—as the following from the Baltimore Gazette may serve to shew: Statement of the revenue of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, for the month of April, 1833, viz:

Revenue from passengers.....	$7,413 27
Do. do. tonnage—westwardly.....	7,550 37
Do. do. tonnage—eastwardly*.....	5,054 61

Total.....$20,023 25

VIRGINIA. The Whig gives us the following classification of the members of congress elect—all the returns being now in.

Messrs. Stevenson, Chinn, Beale, Fulton, McComas and Claiborne, "Jackson men."—6.

Messrs. Archer, Mason, Loyall and Lucas, "anti proclamation, but decided Jackson men."—4.

Mr. Wise—holds the right of secession, but is "eminently Jacksonian"—1.

Messrs. Gordon, Patton, Gholson, Randolph, Davenport and Taylor, "radical anti-proclamation men," and may be classed anti-administration—6.

Messrs. Allen, Mercer, Moore and Wilson—"anti-Jacksonians"—4.

SALT. New and valuable springs have been discovered in Delaware county, New York, at about 150 feet beneath the surface of the earth. The water rises in the wells to within 9 or 10 feet of the surface.

WATER POWER. We recently mentioned the creation, or acquisition, of a great water-power, at Trenton, on the Delaware, and now notice a similar improvement of that hitherto neglected on the Passaic, also at the head of the sloop navigation, and only 11 miles from New York. It is called the "Dundee," one mile from Paterson—and supposed equal to "fifteen mill sites."

*Had the crop been equal to the average one of ordinary years, the result of the business of the last month would greatly have exceeded the above returns. It is gratifying, however, to perceive, that whilst the revenue from tonnage eastwardly has, from the above cause, been injuriously affected, that arising from the transportation westwardly, has increased from $3,535 83 (being the amount for April, 1832) to $7,550 37, being that for the last month.

SHIP BUILDING. The manufacturing of ships is, at present, a great business in the United States, notwithstanding we have "gained" the West India trade, and lost the transportation of many bulky articles to that part of the world. Four first rate ships, and many smaller vessels, of superior qualities, are now building in Baltimore. The tariff has not yet ruined the "commerce" or navigation of the country.

GOLD. It is estimated by the superintendent of the United States mint, that one half of the gold found in this country, is coined at home; and that the amount of last year's production was a million and a quarter of dollars. This is estimated to be equal to one-sixth part of the entire quantity produced in Europe and America; and as the amount gathered by us increases annually, the proportion will be in all probability for some years extending in our favor.

[The gold business in the United States has then about the same value as the button manufacturing—perhaps rather less than more.]

GOLD LANDS. The capital prizes in the gold lottery, which have caused so many wishes and raised so many hopes, have at length come out, after having modestly kept in the back ground for a long time. The great prize, lot 1,052 12 1, was drawn by Alfred Allison, Greene county. The next greatest prize; lot 1,031 12 1, was drawn by Lewis Hays, of Henry county. We wish both of these fortunate drawers long life to enjoy their success. Fame has put the lot 1,052 12 1 at the high valuation of $100,000. [Savannah Georgian.]

MR. MADISON. Extract from his message to both houses of congress, Dec. 5, 1810—

"I feel particular satisfaction in remarking that an interior view of our country, presents us with grateful proofs of its substantial and increasing prosperity. To a thriving agriculture, and the improvements related to it, is added a highly interesting extension of useful manufactures; the combined product of professional occupations, and of household industry. Such, indeed, is the experience of economy, as well as of policy, in these substitutes for supplies heretofore obtained by foreign commerce, that, in a national view, the change is justly regarded, as of itself more than a recompense for those privations and losses resulting from foreign injustice, which furnished the general impulse required for its accomplishment. How far it may be expedient to guard the infancy of this improvement, in the distribution of labor, by regulations of the commercial tariff, is a subject which cannot fail to suggest itself to your patriotic reflections.

"It will rest with the consideration of congress, also, whether a provident, as well as fair encouragement, would not be given to our navigation, by such regulations as will place it on a level of competition with foreign vessels, particularly in transporting the important and bulky productions of our own soil. The failure of equality and reciprocity, in the existing regulations on this subject, operates, in our ports, as a premium to foreign competitors; and the inconvenience must increase, as these may be multiplied, under more favorable circumstances, by the more than countervailing encouragements, now given them, by the laws of their respective countries."

MR. GALLATIN. Extracts from his report to the house of representatives, (pursuant to a resolution) on the subject of manufactures, April 17, 1810.

"From that imperfect sketch of American manufactures, it may with certainty be inferred that their annual product exceeds one hundred and twenty millions of dollars. And it is not improbable that the raw materials used, and the provisions and other articles consumed by the manufacturers, create a HOME MARKET for agricultural products not very inferior to that which arises from foreign demand. A result more favorable than might have been expected from a view of the natural causes which impede the introduction, and retard the progress of manufactures in the United States."

"The information which has been obtained is not sufficient to submit, in conformity with the resolution of the house, the plan best calculated to protect and promote American manufactures. The most obvious means are BOUNTIES, increased duties on importation, and LOANS by government.

"Occasional PREMIUMS might be beneficial; but a general system of bounties is more applicable to articles exported than to those manufactured for home consumption."

"Since, however, the comparative want of capital, is the principal obstacle to the introduction and advancement of manufactures in America, it seems that the most efficient, and most obvious remedy would consist in supplying that capital. For although the extension of banks may give some assistance in that respect, their operation is limited to a few places, nor does it comport with the nature of those institutions to lend for periods as long as are requisite for the establishment of manufactures. The United States might create a circulating stock, bearing a low rate of interest, and lend it at par to manufacturers, on principles somewhat similar to that formerly adopted by the states of New York and Pennsylvania, in their loan offices. It is believed that a plan might be devised by which five millions of dollars a year, but not exceeding in the whole twenty millions, might be thus lent, without any material risk of ultimate loss, and without taxing or injuring any other part of the community."

VALUATION OF OUR CITIES. We meet with the following items in sundry papers.
Boston—real estate,	- - -	$39,145,200
Personal estate,	- - -	23,028,200
Total,	- - -	$62,173,400
Total tax,	- - -	$320,000
New York—real estate,	- - -	$104,042,405 00
Personal estate,	- - -	42,260,213 00
Total,	- - -	$146,302,618 00
Total tax,	- - -	$655,385 74

Philadelphia—(real estate) is put down at $25,818,144. Boston and New York, probably include the estimated values of the counties in which they stand, as well as of the cities, proper. Philadelphia means the city proper, which does not contain half the population of what is called, and really is, (except in corporate relations) Philadelphia.

But these valuations are a poor guide to just comparisons. The manner of making them is almost every where different, and arbitrary. They are none the worse on this account for local purposes. But we cannot see any reason why all such valuations should not be made at the estimated money-price of the property. The official value of Baltimore hardly exceeds one-third of its money value, and so it may be elsewhere.

CHRONOMETERS. For the purpose of encouraging and improving the manufacture of these useful instruments, the British government offer annually £500 in premiums for such as shall be found to perform best during a twelve months' trial at the royal observatory. From an inspection of the monthly reports, issued from that institution during the trial recently closed, we find that out of the number sent in, (sixty-two) the best was declared to be that by Messrs. Molyneux & Sons, No. 1,038, which took the first premium—having performed with an accuracy almost incredible—its actual variation from its rate in twelve months, being only sixty-seven hundredths of a second.

THE ENGLISH CHURCH. Mr. Hume has called for a return, which the house of commons has ordered to be printed, showing the number of resident and non-resident clergymen, the number of curates, the amount of their stipends, &c. for the year 1831, to which we would earnestly recommend to every church reformer to direct his attention. By this return it appears that out of the 10,560 benefices in England and Wales there are only 4,649 which have resident incumbents. Of the remainder there are 2,506 incumbents who are non-residents by exemption, 1,968 who are non-residents by license, 509 absent without license or exemption, 412 who have made no return as to residence, and 183 who have made no return at all. There are 115 benefices vacant; and in the few that remain the clergymen are non-resident, from different causes, more or less valid. It is but fair to state that this enormous number of non-resident incumbents have among them 1,648 who, in the words of the return, perform the duties of their respective parishes.

WATER IN THE DESERT. Two persons who understood the business of boring for water, were lately taken to Egypt by Mr. Briggs, then consul at Cairo. They were employed under patronage of the pacha, to bore for water in the Desert. "At about thirty feet from the ground (says the Repository of patent inventions) they found a stratum of sand stone; when they got through that, an abundant supply of water was procured. We believe the experiment has succeeded in every place where it has been made. The water is soft and pure." In the desert of Suez a tank has been made, of 2,000 cubic feet contents, and several others are in building. It is a question worthy of philosophical consideration, what may be the effect of this discovery on the civilization of Egypt and Arabia—the fertilization of the soil—the increase of population, and the advantages derived by that commerce to which the barren and arid deserts have presented so many obstacles. PATRONAGE. From the "Pennsylvanian" of May 3. During the last few days, we have received an accession to our subscription list of one hundred good democratic names from the single city of Albany, N. Y. When the editor of the Standard hears this, he will jump out of his breeches with vexation.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From London papers to the 1st April, inclusive.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

The failure of the great house of Alexander & Co. Calcutta, for four millions sterling, had caused an extraordinary sensation among the monied men; and interests, in London.

Thirty ships were fitting out at London to carry emigrants to Canada, New South Wales and Van Dieman's Land, and ten had just sailed. One was about to leave for New South Wales with more than three hundred females—so many berths being already taken.

American stocks, March 28th.—United States bank shares £22 a £22 10; Pennsylvania fives, 108; Ohio sixes, 114; Louisiana state, 104; Baring's do. 98½; Mississippi sixes, 108.

Lord Durham has resigned the privy seal, and other changes in the ministry are speculated on.

About the 25th of March last, there arrived at London 130 vessels in one day—50 of them from foreign ports, and chiefly large ships. It is mentioned that for several years so large a number had not arrived in a single day.

The latest accounts from Ireland, give lamentable details of the anarchy and crimes perpetrated in that unhappily-doomed island. "Plague, pestilence, famine and murder" seem to be the litanic and legislative causes of the day. Trials were accumulating in all parts for murders, conspiracies, and connexion with secret societies. The catholic hierarchy, in synod, have denounced such illegal bodies, and have ordered the priests throughout the country to refuse absolution to any person convicted, or known in any way to belong to, or abet such societies. How long will this state of things continue, when not all the coercion of a misguided legislation, nor the denunciations of an influential hierarchy can deter from crime, or restore to order?

A fearful declaration against Irish landlords. We take from the Wexford Freeman, the following description of two men named Redmond and Jackman, convicted of the barbarous murder of the Madoxes:—

Upon the announcement of the verdict, the prisoner, John Redmond, in a firm and distinct tone of voice, said—

"The verdict is right, so far as I am the man who committed the murder; but as for Nicholas Jackman, he is as innocent of it, or any participation in it, as (pointing to the bench) your lordship. Jas. Jackman, who was condemned yesterday, is also innocent."

This declaration produced a thrilling effect, as well upon the bench and jury, as upon the by-standers, all looking at each other in stupor and silent amazement.

"Yes," resumed Redmond, "I am the man who committed the murder, and for which I am willing to suffer. Bad landlords and bad agents have driven me to commit the desperate deed. My old father, who had grown grey upon the farm, and his numerous and helpless family, being thence expelled by them. My father was in arrears five pounds; it was the last five pound note he had, he went and paid it down, and after all was ejected. I say again, bad landlords and bad agents have forced me to seek this desperate redress. I was resolved upon vengeance, and now that I have taken it, I am content to die."

Poor Jackman, who all the while stood in a trembling attitude; his face as pale as death, now fell upon his knees, saying—

"My blood be upon the jury who condemned me, for as I hope to appear before my Creator, I am perfectly innocent."

PORTUGAL.

The London papers have long details of proceedings at Oporto. It appears that the Miguelites had made two fierce attacks on Oporto in March last, in both which they seem to have been defeated, with a heavy loss; but nothing definitive has happened.

An attempt has been made to arrest admiral Sartorius, but he made prisoners of the persons appointed for that purpose; and things had proceeded so far that the admiral would probably blockade Oporto! But another account says, that the misunderstanding between him and Donna Maria's regency, had been settled.

FRANCE.

Changes in the ministry are talked of, but nothing important is mentioned as having recently occurred.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

The affairs of these kingdoms remain as they were—unsettled.

TURKEY AND EGYPT.

A Russian squadron remained in the Bosphorus—which gave much uneasiness to French politicians; and it is intimated that some coldness existed between the two courts on this account.

Ibrahim Pacha has taken possession of Smyrna. He made the governor a prisoner, and seized all the Turkish property on board of vessels in that port: and yet it is given out that an arrangement between the sultan and Mehemet Ali had been made. It is said that M. claims only to hold Syria as a pachalik under the supremacy of the porte, to which he acknowledges himself tributary, and to have Egypt declared an hereditary government in his family. It is added, however, that Russia is opposed to the independence of Egypt, which is advocated by France and England.

The St. Petersburg Gazette, contains a report of the proceedings adopted by the emperor towards the Ottoman empire, and of their results at Constantinople. The sultan is reported to have been highly gratified by "the splendid proofs of the exalted regard of his majesty the emperor, for the interest of the Ottoman empire," and has made arrangements to avail himself of the aid of Russia, should events require it.

GERMANY.

The king of Wirtemberg has had a collision with the assembly of the states, and abruptly dissolved them. The reason was their refusal to sanction and adopt the tyrannical edict of the Frankfort diet. A rumour was current in Paris on the 30th, that the Prussian ambassador had received an official notification of a resolution by the German diet to suspend, for five years, the representative chambers throughout Germany.

GREECE.

Trieste, March 18. The last accounts from Corfu confirm the news, that all parties in Greece have made their submission, and that universal tranquillity prevails. Trade is resuming its activity. New ships are already constructing on the south side of the Morea, as well as in the dock yards of Galixidi, in the Bay of Corinth.

Irish disturbances bill.

A motion for the third reading of the Irish disturbances bill was made in the British house of commons on the 29th of March. A long, but not very interesting debate ensued.

Mr. Cobbett moved, as an amendment, that the bill be read a third time that day six months—Mr. Fielden seconded the amendment.

The third reading was opposed by Mr. Clay, sir S. Whalley, Mr. Langdale, Mr. Ruthven, Mr. Barron, Mr. M. O'Connell, Mr. Hume, Mr. Bellver, and Mr. E. Ruthven; and was supported by Mr. Willbraham, Mr. Poulter, Mr. Barnard, sir H. Verney, Mr. H. Dare, Mr. G. Young, Mr. Ward, Mr. Lamont, Mr. D. Brown, Mr. Peire and sir J. Tyrrell.

Mr. O'Connell, in opposing the bill, warned the house of the consequences of passing such an act, which would exasperate the Irish people, and be the sure means of effecting a separation between England and Ireland; for though the original horrors of the bill had been mitigated, it was sufficiently atrocious to rouse the indignation of his countrymen.

Lord Althorp replied. Crime, he said, was as great as ever in amount, life and property as insecure, when the bill was first brought in. "The honorable and learned gentleman, (Mr. O'Connell), said that the waters of liberty required agitation, but if they did require perpetual agitation—if freedom could not exist with peace and order, it was not the freedom, or the definition of the freedom, which he had been taught from his youth upwards to love, (hear, hear.) One of the great merits of liberty—one of its most endearing qualities, was that it provided for the peace and happiness of all. Liberty was not that state in which one party only could express its sentiments, (hear,) in which men who voted according to conscience in their legislative capacity, were to be denounced as traitors to the best interests of their country, (cheers.)—That was not what he called liberty, (hear.) Again, the honorable and learned gentleman had asked what country required agitation so much as Ireland? He, (lord Althorp), would rather ask what country required quiet more? (Cheers.) The honorable and learned gentleman also said that Ireland had never been injured, save by her own sons. In that position he fully agreed with the honorable and learned gentleman; and would further add, that it had never been more grievously injured by her own sons, than of late years, (hear, hear.) All Ireland's real grievances had been freely admitted by the government and the parliament, and both were steadily bent on applying proper remedies to them, (cheers.)

The house then divided—for the third reading, 345—for Mr. Cobbett's amendment 76—majority 269.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

BRITISH HOUSE OF LORDS—MARCH 28.

Negro slavery—intentions of ministers.

Lord Suffield said he had several petitions on the subject of slavery in his hand, which he was induced by peculiar circumstances to present to their lordships at an earlier period than he had at first intended. Certain rumors had lately been afloat respecting the plan of emancipation to be proposed by government, which he confessed had produced in his mind, and he believed in that of the public, the greatest consternation. He did not mean to say that those rumors had lessened the general confidence which he was disposed to place in his majesty's ministers, or cause him to regard with distrust their intentions with respect to the particular question to which the petitions he held in his hand referred. He felt convinced that the principles of his noble friends near him were sound and right, and he had no doubt that they were fully disposed to act upon them; but yet he was not blind to the formidable array of prejudice and false notions of self interest with which they had to contend. He was anxious, therefore, to obtain for them such support throughout the country, and such a decided expression of the national feeling, as could alone enable them to encounter the opponents of the settlement of this question.—The petitioners prayed for a total and immediate emancipation; and he could assure their lordships that nothing but total and immediate emancipation would satisfy the country. He wished, however, to explain, that by the expression "immediate emancipation" was meant—not that the slaves should be at once liberated on the sending out of a despatch, or the sailing of a ship—but that at the earliest possible period there should take place a substitution of legal restraint for the present absolute and irresponsible power of the slave master.

Lord Goderich said it was obviously impossible for him to give any answer to the rumors which his noble friend said he had heard respecting the supposed intentions of government on the subject of negro emancipation. He did not think it at all incumbent on government to offer explanations relative to rumors stated on such loose authority as newspaper report. It was not his duty to state at the present time what communications had taken place between the government and different parties on this subject; but, aware as he was of the importance of submitting it at the earliest possible period to the decision of parliament, yet we must take the liberty of saying that if the wish of the noble baron opposite—that this question had been brought under the notice of parliament before the present time—had been realized, the result would have been any thing but advantageous to the safe and satisfactory settlement of the question. (Hear hear.)

The duke of Buckingham regretted that the measure of government on the subject of emancipation had not yet been brought forward. To the government and not to the West India proprietors, was to be attributed the blame of all the delay. The government had communicated with a portion of the West India interest, and to them they had told their hopes, their wishes, and their disputes, which were kept a secret from the general body of West India proprietors.

Earl Grey said there was no doubt that this question was one of deep importance; and however anxious he might be to have it settled, he was still as anxious that all circumstances connected with it should be carefully examined, and the co-operation of all parties interested procured. However easy and popular it might be to attack ministers for delay, he was content to submit to any imputation of that kind, provided that they avoided the greater danger of precipitation, of which the only result could be an unsatisfactory and unsafe settlement of the question. As to communications that had taken place between government and other parties on this subject, he did not think that the noble duke would impute it as a crime to them that they had endeavored to ascertain the opinions of the West India body, and to obtain their co-operation in a work which was beset with difficulty and danger.

The noble duke complained that the government had communicated with a select portion of the West Indian proprietors. How would he have had the government act? Would he have had the ministers go to a general assembly—to a meeting at Exeter hall—and there publicly declare their intentions? All that ministers could do was to consult those privately whom they knew to be opposed to them, but in whom they had the greatest confidence, in order to ascertain in what way their objections could be met. Of course it would be inconsistent with his duty to throw out any hint respecting the nature of any plan which it might be in the contemplation of ministers to propose. All he would say at present was, that the attention of government generally, and of his noble friend near him, had been directed carefully to this great subject, with a view to bring it, as speedily as possible, to a satisfactory settlement. He could not say what the rumors were to which his noble friend had alluded; for such rumors the government were not responsible, and it could not be expected that they should enter into any explanation with respect to them. To declare immediate emancipation would undoubtedly make short and easy work of the matter, but he confessed that that was not the way in which he wished to deal with the question; and he was glad to hear from his noble friend's explanation that the word "immediate" was not to be taken as meaning immediate [laughter], but the earliest period at which emancipation could take place with safety to all the interests concerned. He (Earl Grey) was anxious for the abolition of slavery, but he was not prepared to declare for immediate emancipation, without considering the consequences that might flow from such a measure.

The duke of Richmond begged leave to emphatically deny that there were any disputes or differences in the cabinet in relation to the West India question.

The plan of liberation.

We extract the following from the London Standard, in which it was given as a faithful outline of the government plan, for the settlement of the West India question:

A loan of 20 millions is to be negotiated upon the credit of the colonies. The legislative assemblies of those colonies which have any are to be called upon to guarantee this loan, and in the colonies which have not legislative assemblies, some agreement is to be come to with the planters for the like purpose. The loan is to pay an interest of five per cent.—one per cent. being reserved for the creation of a sinking fund and the remaining sum to be payable to the subscribers.

The money so raised is to be applied as follows to the immediate emancipation of the whole negro population:

The planters are to be paid an ad valorem price ranging between £10 and £20 per head, for their several slaves. The slaves then, de facto, cease to be the planter's property, and become the indentured laborer, as it were of the public. They are, however, to be held in gaugs upon the estates in the cultivation of which they are employed.

They are to be compelled to work six days of the week and the compulsory instrument is to be supplied by a numerous and efficient white police, acting under a subordination of magistrates communicating with the several colonial governors.

CONDITION OF THE PEOPLE OF IRELAND.

From the American Almanac for 1833.

According to the returns of houses in 1791, there were—

Houses inhabited by paupers,	112,556
Houses having only 1 hearth and not inhabited by paupers,	515,346
Houses having 2 hearths,	32,785
Houses having 3 hearths,	10,216
Houses having more than 3 but less than 9 hearths,	23,299
Houses having from 11 to 144 hearths,	9,900

Total, 704,102

This statement indicates what is notoriously the fact, that the great mass of the people of Ireland are extremely poor. The number of inhabited houses, since the above date, has much increased: in 1821, it was 1,142,602; but the condition of the people has probably not been on the whole, improved. "Four mud walls with one entrance, and frequently without either window or chimney, constitute an Irish hovel. The rent of these cabins is from one to two guineas a year. To each cabin there is commonly annexed about one acre of ground, which is cropped with potatoes, oats and flax. There are numbers of peasants who have not a bedstead, nor even a truckle bed-frame. They sleep on a bundle of straw or heath, laid on the clay floor; sheets are scarcely known, and their blankets are scanty and tattered. Their food is almost entirely potatoes and milk, and their fuel turf."

The habitation of the Irish peasant is described by Mr. Bicheno as follows:—"It is built by the occupier of the soil out of the materials which he finds on the spot. The four walls are of dirt, mixed with rushes or straw beaten up with it. The floor is the earth. The roof is constructed of bogwood fastened together with pins of the same, or tied with rude cordage made of grass or rye-straw, which is a favorite material. The covering is sods or perhaps a thatch of heath. If a window be indulged in, it consists of a single pane of glass, built in with the wall. There is a door-way, but frequently no door; its place being supplied by a straw mat. The chimney, if there be one, is a square frame of wood work, wrapped round with wattles of hay plastered with clay. The smoke indeed seldom escapes by its lawful channel, but makes its way as it can, by every pore through the roof, walls and door. The general aspect of these hovels at a distance is that of heaps of dung reeking with the steam of their own fermentation."

"No country upon earth," says Mr. Bryan, in his Practical View of Ireland, "has exhibited so stern an evidence of the fatal power of an oligarchy to counteract the bounties of heaven as Ireland. Her soil has been proved by the clearest experiments to be superior to that of England; yet 5,000,000 acres are at this day undisturbed by the plough or spade; her seas abound with fish, and some of the finest fishing banks are in sight of her shores; yet the Irish peasant on the first failure of his potatoe crop, dies of hunger. In this country we behold capacious jails, extensive barracks and crowded hospitals; and in their vicinage the clay-built habitations of the people, whose food is roots—drink, water—and beds, straw;—all manifesting their moral and physical degradation. In one year 20,000 persons have perished from famine and 8 millions' worth of produce exported. Mr. Nimmo, the government engineer, states the yearly expenditure on idle beggars to be £1,500,000: soldiers cost £1,300,000: police, £250,000: total $3,050,000 for idle consumers, to keep Ireland in a state of misery, famine, idleness and insurrection, where there is no security for life or property."

"More than £12,000,000," says Mr. Bryan, "is annually taken from direct investment in Irish industry; £4,000,000 of absentee rent; £2,000,000 invested in the funds; more than £5,000,000 of taxes; £600,000 for tithes, if we consider the whole island brought under the composition act, and make our estimate from the 1,200 parishes now under it; £600,000, the rent of glebe and bishops' lands. The tyranny of the Irish landlords is almost incredible." "The rents," Dean Swift affirmed in his time, "are squeezed out of the very blood, and vitals, and clothes, and dwellings of the tenants, who live worse than English beggars." Mr. Bicheno remarks, that "there are many liberal landlords; but still as a class, they are needy; exacting, unremitting, harsh, and without sympathy for their tenants." "The Irish landlord," says the Quarterly Review, November, 1831, "is not even restrained by the check of fear which operates on an eastern despot, lest extremity of suffering should drive his ryot peasants to desperation and endanger the security of his power and property. He depends on an English army, maintained by English taxes, for the collection of the amount of his bond, and for securing the passive submission of his tenantry to any exactions he may choose to inflict. There can be no question of the various classes of peasantry, the Irish cottiers stand the most thoroughly destitute and alone in the time of calamity, are the most entirely at the mercy of their own landlords, and, as a body, occupy the lowest, the most helpless, and utterly hopeless position. It is only the circumstance resulting from the proximity of England—the facility, namely, of procuring money and suppressing insurrection—which creates the peculiar power of extorting high rents possessed by the landlords of Ireland, and places the cultivator of the soil of that country in a situation of unexampled hardship. May the common legislature, by extending the benefit of the English poor laws to that portion of the empire, speedily remove this dreadful state of things, which, so long as it exists, is an indelible disgrace to a nation that prides itself on standing at the head of civilization, on the benevolence of its character, and on the equality, the justice, and impartiality of its institutions!"

"The Irish proprietors," says Mr. Bryan, "reside chiefly in England, indulging in luxurious ease and comfort, and participating in all voluptuous amusements, purchased by means of the toil and blood of thousands of their fellow creatures." The cultivator receives barely what keeps him alive. "The potatoe is the only produce he reserves to himself. All the rest, cattle, corn, butter, pigs, poultry, eggs, go to the landlord," Bichenor. "The average rate of rural wages for men, in the whole country, is 10*d.* a day; in some districts it is only 8*d.* And when the days, nay, weeks and months, in which great numbers of laborers cannot obtain employment, are deducted, what a wretched remuneration is even 10*d.* a day? When the employment is constant, this remuneration is insufficient. It is but 5*s.* a week: out of which deduct 10*d.* a week for house rent, and 3*s.* 6*d.* for potatoes to give a family three meals a day, allowing 23 lbs. for each day, at 3*d.* a stone, a low average for the whole country throughout the year, and but 8*d.* a week, or £1 14*s.* 8*d.* a year would remain to provide fire and clothing for the family. There would be nothing for salt, milk, or any kind of sustenance other than potatoes washed down with water. The Irish are not singular in being turbulent, when suffering privations or oppression; but they are singular in bearing so much of both before they become turbulent." Commentaries on Ireland, 1831. "The people, naturally hardy, easily subsisted, and singularly vigorous, laborious and intelligent, when we consider their opportunities," says Bryan, "are yet one-eighth of them paupers, and almost all restless, insubordinate, and embittered against the laws and present-system of government."

ORIGIN OF THE BRITISH SLAVE TRADE.

The following statements respecting the origin and history of the British slave trade, are from the London Courier.

The slave trade was instituted in the reign of queen Elizabeth, who personally took a share in it. At that time the West India colonies did not exist.

In 1662, Charles II. granted an exclusive right in the slave trade to queen Catharine, the queen dowager, the duke of York, and others, who formed themselves into a trading company, they undertaking to supply the West India planters with 3,000 slaves annually. In the same year that monarch issued a proclamation inviting his subjects to transport themselves to Jamaica, agreeing to allot lands to every individual who would go to reside in the island, and signify his resolution to plant there.

The slave trade continued to be fostered during the reigns of Charles II. and James II. but still under a monopoly.

In 1679, petitions from the manufacturers in Great Britain of woollen and other cloths, and the makers of the various articles necessary to the slave trade with Africa, were presented to parliament, alleging that the trade was cramped by being in the hands of an exclusive company, and praying that it might be opened.

In consequence of these and similar petitions to the house of commons, a committee of the whole house, in 1695, resolved, "That for the better supply of the plantations, all the subjects of Great Britain should have liberty to trade to Africa for negroes, with such limits as should be prescribed by parliament;" and by statute 9 and 10 William III. c. 26, the trade was accordingly laid partially open, the preamble of that act stating, that "the trade was highly beneficial and advantageous to the kingdom, and to the plantations and colonies thereunto belonging."

The manufacturers of Great Britain, however, were still dissatisfied with the restrictions imposed upon the trade. They continued to ply the legislature with petitions to give greater latitude to a traffic, by which they exchanged their goods for negroes, and sold those negroes to the West India proprietors,

From 1711 until 1749, the demands of the manufacturers for a more unrestricted trade continued to be the subject of parliamentary investigation and dispute.

At length, in 1749, the statute 23, Geo. II. c. 31, was passed, which removed all obstruction to the operations of private traders, declaring "the slave trade to be very advantageous to Great Britain, and necessary for supplying the plantations and colonies thereunto belonging, with a sufficient number of negroes at reasonable rates."

To show the light in which the courts viewed the slave trade, the following is quoted from the report of a case referred to the judges for their opinion by the crown on the Assiento contract. The judges say: "In pursuance of his majesty's order in council hereunto annexed, we do humbly certify our opinions to be, that negroes are merchandise; that it is against the statute of navigation made for the general good and preservation of the shipping and trade of this kingdom, to give liberty to any alien to trade in Jamaica, or other his majesty's plantations, or for any shipping belonging to aliens to trade there, or to export thence negroes," &c. And the certificate is signed by lord C. Holt, justice Polexfen, and eight other judges.

Neither does the case rest here. The colonies anxious to limit the trade, passed laws imposing a duty on negroes imported. Great Britain refused to sanction any laws having such a tendency. The colonies began in 1760. South Carolina, then a British colony, passed an act to prohibit further importation.

Great Britain rejected this act with indignation, and declared that the slave trade was beneficial and necessary to the mother country. The governor who passed it was reprimanded, and a circular was sent to all other governors warning them against a similar offence.

The colonies, however, in 1765, repeated the offence, and a bill was twice read in the assembly of Jamaica for the same purpose of limiting the importation of slaves, when Great Britain stopped it, through the governor of that island, who sent for the assembly, and told them that consistently with his instructions he could not give his assent; upon which the bill was dropped.

At a later period, 1774, another attempt to the same purpose was made by the assembly at Jamaica, who passed two bills to restrain the importation of negroes. This was met by letters from lord Dartmouth, the secretary of state, to sir Basil Keith, the governor of Jamaica, stating that, "the measures had created alarm to the merchants in Great Britain engaged in that branch of commerce," and forbidding him upon "pain of removal from his government to assent to such laws."

The despatch proceeds:

"At the same time, I am to acquaint you that the alarm taken by the merchants of this kingdom, on account of that act, has been greatly increased, and fresh complaints of a very urgent nature, have been made by them, from their having received advice, not only that such additional duty has been continued for another year, by an act passed in November last, but that propositions have been adopted for laying the slave trade under further restrictions, and subjecting it to impositions that will have the effect of an entire prohibition."

BRITISH WEST INDIA COLONIES.

The following information, respecting the British West India colonies, acquires more interest at this time, when their future fate depends on the measures which may be adopted by the British government, with regard to the slave population:—

Estimates of the value of the British West India colonies, as taken from the report of the select committee of the house of lords, and recently published in London.

FRENCH LIBERTY OF THE PRESS.

Paris, March 21. Yesterday, at noon, the court of assizes assembled to pronounce judgment in the affair of M. Paulin, editor of the National, and that of M. Cuchet, editor of the Charivari. The judges remained in deliberation in the council chamber till a quarter past five, when they entered the court and delivered judgment. M. Cuchet was declared guilty of having, with bad faith, given an unfaithful report of the proceedings on the late trial, and condemned to a month's imprisonment and a fine of 5,000fr. with prohibition to make in the Charivari any report on judicial proceedings for the space of one year. M. Paulin, for the same reason, was also condemned to a fine and term of imprisonment, with interdiction to report judicial proceedings in the National for two years.

The Temps has the following:—"If these judgments are carried into execution, there is an end to the freedom of the press. However much accustomed we may be to the enormity of judgments by default, this surpasses all our powers of expression. The restoration, which for fifteen years was engaged in sacrificing our liberties, presents only one example of such an excess of power. We do not, however, entertain any apprehension for the ultimate fate of our brethren—the court of Cassation will do justice to this decree, which is already rejected by public opinion. A painful impression must nevertheless remain. On seeing the judges of the land eagerly joining the administration in its acts of violence, men begin to ask each other whether the contest, which was carried on between the restoration and the press, is not about to be renewed, and whether it may not terminate in another revolution?"

March 22. The Tribune and the Echo Français of yesterday were seized—the former for its leading article relative to the condemnation of the National and Charivari, and the latter for having copied the same article.

LONDON POLICE.

The following is a list of the number of prisoners taken into custody by the metropolitan police, and the result of the charges, in the year 1852:

Males	49,890	Committed for trial by magistrates.
Females	27,653
Total	77,543	Males	2,700
Drunken persons dismissed when sober by the superintendents.		Females	956
Males	15,411	Total	3,656
Females	10,291	Discharged by magistrates.
		Males	15,727

CANAL TRANSPORTATION.

From the Cincinnati Gazette, 13th inst.

We are indebted to Messrs. Mills and Townsend, agents for the New York and Ohio transportation lines, for the following communication received by them from Alfred Kelly, esq. acting canal commissioner of the Ohio canal:

"Persons engaged in commercial pursuits, and particularly those who receive merchandise from the eastern cities, or send property of any kind to those cities, will be interested in learning that such important reductions have been made in the rates of toll, both on the Erie canal of New York and on the Ohio canal, as will materially reduce the cost of transportation between the western country and the seaboard, by way of the lake and the canals.

"On the Erie canal of New York, the tolls on the staple articles of agricultural produce, such as flour, wheat, beef, pork, lard, whiskey, &c. have been reduced from 7 to 5 mills per 1,000 lbs. per mile, and on merchandise coming from tide waters, from 14 to 12 mills per 1,000 lbs. per mile.

"On the Ohio canal, the toll on the staple articles of agricultural produce, in all distances beyond 200 miles, have been reduced from 5 to 3 mills per 1,000 lbs. per mile. The toll charged on the staple articles of agricultural produce from Portsmouth to Cleveland is 15 cents 8 mills per 1,000. Sugar and molasses in hogsheads or barrels, cotton in bales, and manufactured tobacco, transported from the Ohio river to the lake, throughout the whole length of the Ohio canal, and charged with toll at the rate of five mills per 1,000 lbs. per mile. Under the present rates of toll, flour may be transported from Cleveland to New York for $1 00 per barrel, covering all expenses, and for about $1 62 from Portsmouth, and other staple articles at the same prices, according to weight. Merchandise may be delivered at Portsmouth from the city of New York for $2 25 per 1,000 lbs. and at Cincinnati $2 37½ to 2 40, covering all expenses at intermediate points.

"On lake Erie arrangements have been made to have 2 steam boats leave Buffalo every day for Cleveland, and the other for Detroit by way of Cleveland. One steamboat leaves Cleveland for Buffalo, and one touches at Cleveland on its way from Detroit for Buffalo each day. This arrangement will expedite the transmission of goods between New York and the western country, and together with the arrangements made for the tow boats on the Hudson river, will prevent those delays in the forwarding of merchandise which have heretofore been the subject of complaint. The average time required to transport goods from New York to Portsmouth on the Ohio will not exceed 17 to 20 days."

OLD OPINION ABOUT NULLIFICATION.

The operation of a state veto on our foreign relations is not matter of conjecture; it is history, and is strikingly exemplified in the following letter from the duke of Dorset, to the American commissioners in 1785, at Paris. They, it seems, had made overtures to enter into a treaty of commerce with Great Britain: and this is his grace's answer. If the doctrines contended for by the Cooper party* in South Carolina, and his disciples Calhoun, Hayne & Co. should be established, such would be the language of every power in Europe to whom we might

*Great injustice is done to that celebrated man, Dr. Cooper, in designating the nullification doctrines as the work of Calhoun. From the duke of Dorset to the commissioners.

Paris, March 26, 1785.

GENTLEMEN: Having communicated to my court the readiness you expressed in your letter to me of the 9th December, to remove to London, for the purpose of treating upon such points as may materially concern the interests, both political and commercial, of Great Britain and America, and having at the same time represented that you declared yourselves to be fully authorised and empowered to negotiate, I have been, in answer thereto, instructed to learn from you, gentlemen, what is the real nature of the powers with which you are invested, whether you are merely commissioned by congress, or whether you have received separate powers from the respective states. A committee of North American merchants have waited upon his majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, to express how anxiously they wished to be informed upon this subject, repeated experience having taught them in particular, as well as the public in general, how little the authority of congress could avail in any respect, where the interests of any one individual state was even concerned, and particularly so, where the concerns of that particular state might be supposed to militate against such resolutions as congress might think proper to adopt.

The apparent determination of the respective states to regulate their own separate interests, renders it absolutely necessary, towards forming a permanent system of commerce, that my court should be informed how far the commissioners can be duly authorised to enter into any engagements with Great Britain, which it may be in the power of any one of the states to render totally fruitless and ineffectual. I have the honor to be, &c.

DORSET.

"THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER."

From the Cincinnati Republican.

The circular, copied below, has been received by a gentleman of this city. To say that the object intended in it meets our cordial approbation, is but imperfectly expressing our feelings. We love the American union—and we love every thing connected with its history that tends to throw glory and beauty around it. Sometime last winter, we published the speech of Mr. Poinsett, (made, we believe, in a meeting of the unionists, in Charleston, South Carolina), in which the almost magic triumph of our American flag, in Mexico, was related. No American, whose heart is still alive to the revolution, can read the little incident referred to in the circular, and which is so touchingly and eloquently described by Mr. Poinsett, without feeling proud of our union. The intention of the circular is to procure the means of embodying that one glorious triumph of the star spangled banner upon canvas—to construct from the circumstances a memento of our national greatness, flattering alike to our patriotism and our taste. Copies of the circular have, we presume, been sent to all the other cities in the U. States, and the funds necessary to the execution of the design will speedily be raised.

[CIRCULAR.]

Charleston, S. C. April 11th, 1833.

At the period of the revolution of the Acordada, which compelled the congress of Mexico to reverse the election of Pedraza and place Guerrero on the presidential chair, the city was taken by assault, and the army of Guerrero attacked and plundered the houses of the European Spaniards, who were peculiarly odious to the native Mexicans. Many of these had taken refuge in the house of the American ambassador, and it was pointed out to the exasperated soldiery as the asylum of their enemies. They rushed to attack it, and in a few minutes would have massacred all within its walls. At this moment, when hundreds of muskets were levelled at the windows, Mr. Poinsett, with his secretary of legation, Mr. John Mason, jr, threw themselves into an open balcony which overlooked the crowd, and, unfurling the STAR SPANGLED BANNER, demanded that all persons in his house should be protected while the flag of his country waved over them. The scene changed as by enchantment, and the very men who were about to make the attack, cheered the standard of our union, and placed sentinals to guard it from outrage. The history of the world presents no parallel to such a scene: and its moral beauty and grandeur should be equally preserved on the page of the historian and the canvas of the painter. It is therefore proposed to raise by subscription a sufficient sum to have this illustrious triumph of our national flag represented on canvas and afterwards engraved. The painting will be presented to some public institution of the state or United States.

The minute particulars attending the unfurling of the United States flag at Mexico, furnish materials for a splendid national painting. The sectional excitements, at the present existing among the states, are obliterating national feelings. These must be revived, the arts are powerful in their operation, and lasting in their influence. We must have national paintings, national songs, national celebrations, to excite and perpetuate national enthusiasm. Though it is difficult for the mind to calculate the value of the union, yet the hand of a master may successfully exhibit to a single glance, that national protection, which, like the pressure of the atmosphere, though omnipresent and powerful, is neither seen nor felt. The flag of every country is its emblem. It should command respect abroad—adoration at home. The man who loves and reveres not his country's flag, is prepared to violate her laws and destroy her institutions. To pourtray then the Star Spangled Banner overawing, in a foreign land, an infuriated and lawless soldiery, and protecting from revolutionary violence the objects of political hatred—is to spread before the eyes of our countrymen, and particularly of the rising generation, the unseen, but high moral protection afforded by a great, because a united people. The chief object, however, is to have this scene engraved, that the flag of our country may wave in every house, in every cottage, even every log house beyond the mountains; that our children may learn, before they can read, to love and reverence the emblem of their country's power, and may realize that it is their guardian and protector, not only on their native soil, but in a land of strangers.

The amount of your subscription you will please transmit to the joint address of

WILLIAM DRAYTON,
DANIEL E. HUGER, } committee.
BENJ. F. PEPOON,

And yet the "star spangled banner" was absent—at the late grand military celebration at Charleston.

THE PUBLIC CREDIT.

In a circular letter written by Messrs. Baring, Brothers & Co. of London, dated March 14th, 1833, we find the following account of United States stocks:

The letter closes in the following manner:

"Scarcely any thing is doing in American stocks: there are, however, fewer sellers, and confidence is, in a great measure, restored; but it will be a long time before they recover the favor to which they had reached before the violent proceedings in Carolina."

Here is evidence derived from the most respectable source, of the evil effects of such principles and such conduct, in one of the United States, as have been lately manifested in South Carolina. They necessarily shake all confidence in the character of our system of government, and the stability and permanency of the union of the states. The first visible effect is in the injury to our credit. It is impossible that it should be otherwise. When foreigners perceive that one of the states of which the union is composed, claims right to prevent the execution of the laws of the nation within its limits, and, in the prosecution of its opposition, adopts measures entirely subversive of the national authority and power, setting that authority at defiance, and arming its inhabitants to resist by military force the execution of the laws, it is not possible in the nature of things, that they should not lose their confidence in a government, which to them must appear so weak and insecure, as such a state of things would necessarily indicate. And it is worthy of remark, that the evil thus produced, does not primarily fall upon the state of South Carolina. Its effects are realized by the government of the United States, and in many instances by the people of the other states.

It is not likely that the United States will ever be reduced to the necessity of going abroad to borrow money, and therefore they will not be exposed to the effects of the loss of credit in that particular way: but when the character of their government is injured, and doubts of its stability and security are raised, the loss of credit necessarily follows, and every state, as well as individuals, must be, in greater or less degree, sufferers. The credit of many of the individual states has hitherto been, and still is good, abroad as well as at home. Much of this credit, however, arises from their relationship to the union, and its continuance in a great measure depends on the permanency of the national government. Let the union once be destroyed, and the states be "thrown back upon their sovereignty," and not only South Carolina, and other small states, but the great states of New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia and Ohio, would be most materially affected by such a state of things. Nor could any future union that might be formed between any number of the states, restore them to the ground they had lost; because the first attempt to maintain an united republican government over such communities having failed, and for no substantial cause, it is perfectly apparent that the world at large would place no confidence in the more fortunate result of a second experiment.

We are perfectly aware that reasoning against pride and passion is a hopeless task; and that men who are under the influence of the latter, and who wholly disregard the former, consider it a matter of far greater importance that their will should be gratified, than that the general interests of the country should be consulted, or the union and the constitution be preserved. This feeling may last for a while; but the tempers of men must eventually cool, and grow more moderate; and when the consequences of rash and violent measures are realized in their full extent, conviction will force itself upon their minds, and will add much to the poignancy of unavailing regret.

THE PROTESTED BILL.—ON FRANCE.

From the Washington Globe.

In order to counteract the misrepresentations which mischievous persons are making on the subject of the non-payment by the French government of the bill drawn for the first instalment payable under the late convention between the United States and France, it may not be improper to state the facts.

The act of the 13th of July, 1832, having made it the duty of the secretary of the treasury to cause the several instalments, with the interest thereon, payable to the United States in virtue of the convention with France, to be received from the French government and transferred to the United States in such manner as he may deem best, and the net proceeds thereof paid into the treasury, it was determined, after having obtained all the information necessary to a decision, to accomplish these objects by drawing on the French government, and disposing of the bill on the best terms that could be obtained for cash.

This course was deemed most advantageous to the interests of the claimants, as it would save the expense of commission which would otherwise have to be paid out of the fund, and as it would be free from all the risks of intermediate agencies. For this purpose offers were invited and many made. The highest price for the bill however was offered by the bank of the United States, being $1 for 5¢ 37½ centimes. A bill was accordingly drawn by the secretary of the treasury upon the French minister of finance in favor of the bank of the United States, and the proceeds, being $903,564 89, were at the same time placed to the credit of the treasurer on the books of the bank. By the convention, the amount of the instalment was payable at Paris on the 2nd of February last; and as the bill was not drawn until the 7th of February, after the instalment was due, it was made payable at sight.

It is understood, however, that when the bill was received at Paris, no appropriation had been made by the chambers for the payment of the instalment, and it is believed to be owing altogether to that circumstance that the bill was not paid on presentation. The French government, it is not doubted, will promptly admit the right of the United States to be indemnified for any loss sustained by the non-payment.

Though notice has been given to the treasury by the bank that the bill has been protested for non-payment, it is not understood that it has yet been returned to the United States. The rumor of its having been paid by Messrs. Hostenguer & Co. is, probably, true, but if paid by them, whether it has been for the accommodation of the bank, or at the instance of the French minister or that of the American charge d'affaires at Paris, is yet to appear.

It will be recollected that at the last session, congress authorized the secretary of the treasury to lend these instalments on interest, upon a pledge of the stock of the United States, or of the bank of the United States, or to the bank of the United States. The secretary accordingly invited proposals for borrowing the proceeds of the first instalment, either by the bank itself, or by others on the pledge of its stock at par, it not being deemed advisable to invite an offer on the pledge of the United States stock, as that would withdraw it from the market, and thus place it beyond the reach of purchase by the commissioners of the sinking fund. It is understood that proposals were received for a part only of the proceeds—and in consequence of an objection being made by a highly respectable part of the claimants to the money being lent on such security, no decision had been finally made; and the amount of the proceeds of the bill has therefore remained in the bank until this day.

From the New York Commercial Advertiser, of May 2.

We have some amusing information to communicate, touching the French indemnity for spoliation upon American commerce, and the comparative credit abroad of the government, and the bank of the United States. It will be recollected that near the close of the late session of congress, an act was passed requiring the secretary of the treasury to invest the moneys to be received under the French treaty of indemnity, in the stocks of the bank of the United States. This act, however, as will appear in the sequel, was at least unnecessary—if the government is to act upon the principle of the excellent Mrs. Glass, who, in her directions for cooking a turbot, commences by saying—"first catch a turbot." In other words, it appears that there is no money forthcoming, just at present. Of the emptiness of Louis Philippe's treasury, however, or of his indisposition to meet his engagements, Mr. McLane seems not to have been aware; and having literally "scraped" the bottom of the treasury, as was remarked by a member of congress at the close of the session, his only means of partially replenishing it was through the assistance of the much abused United States bank. For this purpose the bank, to accommodate the secretary, purchased a draft upon the French government, of about a million of dollars, being the amount, as we understand, of the first instalment which France was to pay on the first of February. The bank remitted the bill to the Barings, by whom it was sent over to Paris for payment. But the French government refused to honor the draft, and the bill was protested! The French bankers, however, for the honor of the bank of the United States—not of the government, be it understood—came forward in this emergency, and took up the bill! The reason assigned by the French ministers, as we are informed, why the bill was thus allowed to be dishonored, was, that the chambers have as yet made no appropriation under the treaty. But this is not all, if rumor speaks true. The public have witnessed the clamors raised by the opponents of the bank, against the act requiring the secretary to invest the funds supposed to be coming from France, in the stock of the bank of the United States. Their object was to decry the stock in every possible shape, so that by depressing its value in the market the Jackson speculators could purchase to better advantage in compliance with their contracts to deliver stock ahead. The unshaken confidence of congress in the soundness of the institution, however, operated severely against them, and their wits have been taxed in every possible shape in devising fresh schemes of frightening stockholders into the market with their scrip. The last of these devices, as the report goes, was to get up a memorial to the secretary of the treasury, signed by such Jackson claimants under the French treaty as could be found, protesting against the investment of the money in the stock of the bank, and praying Mr. McLane to disregard the act of congress, on the ground that the funds if invested in the bank would be insecure. A paper of this kind, it is said, was circulated in Philadelphia last week, and perhaps elsewhere. And it was just at this crisis in the movements of the opponents of the bank, as we learn, that the news above mentioned was received from the Barings, viz: that no funds were coming from the French—at least for the present; that the draft of our government had been dishonored; and that it was owing to the sound credit of the bank of the U. States, and not of the government, that an individual banking house in Paris had come forward, as above stated, to sustain our credit. The bank here having advanced the money to the treasury, must of course be reimbursed, to refund the foreign banker, and the treasury is but poorly prepared for the exigency. Under these circumstances, we cannot but admire the position in which the protesting French claimants have thrown themselves, by this last partisan attempt to injure the stock of the bank. Query: will not the government, as the drawers, be compelled to pay the damages to the bank, accruing on the protested bill? At twenty per cent. here will be a neat little item of loss to the government, and a gain to the bank of nearly two hundred thousand dollars. "The administration is in a blaze of glory."

P. S. The preceding article was written for last evening's paper, but was excluded for want of space. Since penning it, we have ascertained that a paper similar to that mentioned above, was circulated in Wall street a short time since. It was not addressed to the secretary of the treasury—the proper officer in the premises—but “To general Jackson”—praying him to interpose and prevent the lending of the money to come from France, to individuals, on the pledge of stock ad par—but not objecting, as we understand the case, to the loaning of it to the bank itself. It was believed, however, to be a stock-jobbing attempt to depreciate the scrip of the bank. But France has taken care that the claimants shall lose nothing by investments in the bank this year!

The Paris Constitutionnel of the 23d of March has this statement:

It will be recollected that the French ministry fixed at twenty-four millions the amount of the claims of the United States of North America for vessels seized and sold under the republic. The government has not hitherto ventured to present to the chambers a treaty so disadvantageous to France. But the government of the United States has taken the ministers at their word, and it is affirmed that it yesterday caused a bill of exchange for four millions to be presented by M. Rothschild, and that the treasury caused it to be protested. It is added that M. Bagueuault, who endorsed it, has paid the amount to M. Rothschild. This is a serious affair, for we much doubt whether the chamber will ratify in 1833, a treaty which the government of the restoration never would sign.

This paragraph presents the question in a new aspect. We think the Constitutionnel must be mistaken. Surely the French chamber will not fail to make the proper appropriation. But if it does refuse what next? [Phil. Ing.]

THE ASSAULT UPON THE PRESIDENT.

From the Alexandria Gazette, May 7.

An incident of a most painful nature occurred on board the steamboat Sydney, as she stopped here on her way down, yesterday. An assault was made upon the president of the United States by Mr. Randolph, late of the navy. At the first blow, we understand, almost a hundred arms fell upon the assailant, and he was with difficulty rescued and carried on shore. We have never known more excitement nor more feeling to be manifested by all our citizens. We are induced to mention this matter, which ought indeed never to be published, only because we know that reports of it will be circulated throughout the country, and printed elsewhere. It was an affair of a moment; but it is said, that, from the feeling produced, it is wonderful that the assailant escaped with his life.

So great was the public indignation at this outrage, that we believe almost any measure would have been adopted to express it. The president was naturally highly excited and exasperated. He departed amidst the cheers and good wishes of the great crowd which had assembled.

In the confusion of the moment, no attempt was made to arrest Mr. Randolph on the instant; but, the court being in session, he was immediately presented by the grand jury, and a bench warrant forthwith issued for his apprehension.

From the "Globe" of May 7.

A gentleman just arrived from Alexandria gives the following account of an atrocious attack upon the president of the United States, as he was on his way to Fredericksburg, where he had been invited to lay the corner stone of a monument about to be erected to the mother of Washington.

"The steamboat Cygnat, [Sydney], in which the president and several members of the cabinet, accompanied by many other gentlemen, were going to Fredericksburg, stopped on her way for a few minutes at Alexandria. Many persons from the wharf came on board, and among them Mr. Randolph, late a lieutenant in the navy. He made his way into the cabin, where the president was sitting reading a newspaper; and, advancing towards him, as if to address him, began to draw off his gloves. The president not knowing him, and supposing it was some person about to salute him, and seeing him at some difficulty in getting off his glove, stretched out his hand towards him, saying "never mind your glove, sir." Randolph, having then disengaged himself from his gloves, thrust one hand violently into the president's face, and before he could make use of the other, received a blow from a gentleman standing near with an umbrella. Almost at the same time two other gentlemen in the cabin sprung upon him, and he was pulled back and thrown down. The moment he was assaulted, the president seized his cane, which was lying near him on the table, and was forcing his way through the gentlemen who had crowded round Randolph, insisting that no man should stand between him and the villain who had insulted him: that he would chastise him himself. Randolph, by this time, had been borne towards the door of the cabin, and pushed through it to the deck. He made his way through the crowd on the deck and the wharf, being assisted, as is believed, by some ruffian confederates, and made his escape. He stopped for a few minutes at a tavern in Alexandria, and passed on beyond the district line. The grand jury, then in session, in a few minutes found a presentment against him, and the court issued a bench warrant. A magistrate had just previously issued a warrant; but before the officers could arrest him, he was gone."

From the Alexandria Gazette of May 8.

¶ We are requested to say, that the term "blow," used in reference to the recent assault upon the president, was not correct. It may be well to say also, here, that the remark made in the Globe, relative to "ruffian confederates," is entirely erroneous. As far as we are able to learn, not a human being knew of the assailant's intention, and he was hurried from the deck of the boat, by gentlemen present, to prevent his being killed upon the spot, and not with any design of assisting him in an escape.

In the REGISTER of the 27th ult. page 136, we inserted a notice from Mr. R. B. Randolph, late lieutenant in the navy, announcing that he had been dismissed, "after twenty three years arduous service," though a court of inquiry had acquitted him "both as an officer and a gentleman" of certain charges which had been preferred against him, as a "public defaulter." And on Monday last, (the day of his assault on the president, but previous to making it), he caused to be inserted in the "Alexandria Gazette," an address to the public, which it now seems required of us to copy, as due to the extraordinary outrage stated above. We have followed the lead of the "National Intelligencer" in omitting a few lines, or words, of Mr. Randolph's address, for the simple reason—that their insertion would impose upon us the necessity, perhaps, of opening a controversy between individuals that would be profitless—in the present circumstances of the case. The lines or words omitted are rather of a personal character, than useful to Mr. Randolph's vindication of his conduct.

From the Alexandria Gazette of May 8.

TO THE PUBLIC.

Robert B. Randolph, late lieutenant in the navy of the United States, having recently announced his dismission from the service by the president, will now undertake, for the information of his fellow citizens generally, and of his late associates attached to the navy, to expose the circumstances which have led to this catastrophe.

In the spring of 1828, John B. Timberlake, purser of the U. S. frigate Constitution, died at Port Mahon, from the effects of derangement, in a fit of which he had unfortunately maimed himself, by cutting his throat. Commodore Patterson, then commander of the frigate, directed me, verbally, to assume the duties of acting purser, as the successor of Mr. Timberlake. About to become the recipient of the money, slops, and other effects belonging to the United States, which were left by my predecessor, it was not my duty to count the money, or take an inventory of the effects. Common sense might teach any one that the counting of the money, and surveying the effects, devolved upon others, before I could be made responsible. I participated in neither.

It has been testified, however, by captain Patterson, that he gave verbal orders, to his first lieutenant to cause the money to be counted, and an account taken of it to be delivered to me; and also to designate three officers of the ship, to make an inventory of all the public effects, before they should be delivered over. Captain Patterson has further deposed, that lieutenant Vallette, the gentleman to whom these verbal orders were given, reported to him that all had been done as commanded. But the persons named by lieutenant Vallette, as those designated to perform the duties before mentioned, disclaim their appointment, and positively assert that they had no agency in making an inventory, or counting the money, and never had any knowledge of the money or effects left by Mr. Timberlake, except from hearsay.

These strange discrepancies in the evidence of gentlemen, made under the obligations of their oaths, necessarily called for the minutest examination by the court and my counsel; when, at length, it was positively ascertained that there had been no inventory taken of the public property; as captain Patterson countermanded his own order to that end, upon the representation to him, by lieutenant Vallette, that the slops and stores were so situated as to render it very inconvenient to make an inventory thereof. The survey was postponed by order of captain Patterson, until after the arrival of the Constitution at the navy yard, Charlestown, Massachusetts; when all the slops and stores were, by order of captain Gallagher, surveyed and turned into the navy store, and received for by Mr. Bates, the navy store-keeper on that station.

So much for the reported inventories made at Port Mahon, by orders of captain Patterson. Here the investigation concerning the mysterious inventories, which from the beginning had existed only in fiction, might be terminated, but for the evidence of captain Patterson, before the court of inquiry, who swore that when the Constitution came near the light house, and before the survey took place in the navy yard at Charlestown, he inquired of me, whether I had forwarded to the fourth auditor, duplicates of the inventories of these same slops and stores, and received an affirmative answer! The reader has seen, above, that no inventory had before been taken, and this with the knowledge, and in pursuance of the orders, of captain Patterson himself. It is scarcely worth while to waste one word more on this subject. How captain Patterson could imagine that I had transmitted to the fourth auditor duplicates of inventories never made—or how I could answer in the affirmative, never having heard or seen any such inventories, I leave to every one to conjecture. It surpasses all my logic. Such, however, it will be seen, in the president's letter of dismission, (A) is the testimony on which he has arrived at the decision, that I am unworthy of the naval service of this republic! * * *

Had the president been actuated by correct motives, influenced by the proceedings and judgment of the court of inquiry, and sought information from the books and vouchers in the navy department, he must have come to other conclusions. * * * I may, however, put up with my share of his denunciation, when in the same scrawl he stigmatizes the integrity and intelligence of the late court of inquiry in my case, composed of officers not surpassed in character and respectability by any in the service of the country.

With any slops that might have been on board when Timberlake died, I am wholly unacquainted. For some time before his death, and until the day of his interment, Norman and Norris, Timberlake's clerks, had charge of all the slops which had been open for the use of the crew. What they must have issued, I had no means of knowing. It having been determined by captain Patterson, that the slops and public stores in the hold, and other departments of the ship, should not be disturbed, I obtained, and receipted to our consul at Port Mahon, Mr. Ladico, for a small amount of slops, which have been fully accounted for with the government. During the inquiry concerning my slop account, the court were of opinion that I had a credit for the amount of $178 in slops not belonging to my parcel. I did not feel disposed to dispute with my judges on so small a matter; and therefore, in forming my account current for the consideration of the accounting officers, I admitted that charge, although perfectly ignorant of any mixture of my slops with any remnant of those of my predecessor. Thus were closed, gratuitously on my part, any claims which the government might have on me for their slops left by Mr. Timberlake, if any there were. In view of this miserable remnant, however inconsiderable, supposing it actually to exist, the president, in his peculiar candor and magnanimity, designated the slops and stores turned into the navy store at Charlestown, as the property of the United States, "some stores which were stored away under the ship's provisions," amounting in all to more than three thousand dollars! some stores in comparison with the enormous quantity supposed to have cost $178!

In relation to the slops and public stores, it will be seen that the president recites "that verbal orders were given, directing an inventory to be taken according to law," without intimating by whom given, or to whom given, leaving room for the inference that the laches is imputable to me. That it may be seen how accurately the president has interpreted the law, screening the guilty, and impugning the innocent, I here insert two extracts, Nos. 14 and 15, from the rules and regulations for the naval service of the United States, under the head "of stores and provisions," viz:

14. "On the death of an officer having charge of stores, his public papers shall be separated from those of a private nature, the former to be forwarded by a safe conveyance to the fourth auditor, and the latter, together with his private effects, to be put in charge of such officer as the captain of the ship may appoint for that purpose, to be preserved for the benefit of the legal representatives of the deceased, unless, from particular circumstances, the captain shall deem it advisable to dispose of them at public sale; in which case a duplicate of the inventory, with an account of the disposal or sale, shall be transmitted to the fourth auditor of the treasury.

15. "If an officer having charge of stores, should, from any accidental circumstances, be separated from his ship, the captain shall proceed to survey and ascertain the state of the stores, as though such officer were actually dead or discharged; and he shall, as in a like case, appoint another officer to act in his place, giving the earliest intelligence of his proceedings to the fourth auditor of the treasury."

So much of the rules and regulations as I have here inserted, consist especially of instructions to CAPTAINS, and they are now produced to show to the people, and my late brother officers, how unjustly and tyrannically the president has acted towards me, while he suffers the negligent and guilty captain to remain in command of a squadron in the Mediterranean. It is somewhat unintelligible to any one not conversant with the history of my case, that there should be a motive with the president to harass and degrade me, who acted in all this affair in a subordinate capacity, and by the commands of captain Patterson.

With respect to the small stores on board belonging to Mr. Timberlake, the explanation is short and simple. Mr. Timberlake died indebted to Mr. Norman, my clerk, something more than six hundred dollars, and before his death expressed a desire to secure him out of his small stores. He directed Norman to make a schedule of them, that he might assign them to him; but before the article could be prepared, he grew so ill, that he was unable to execute it. Captain Patterson, knowing the wishes of Mr. Timberlake, requested me to execute the arrangement for Norman's benefit, as if it had been completed by him before he sunk into the arms of death. These stores were sold at auction by order of the secretary of the navy, and out of the proceeds I satisfied the claim of Norman within a very few dollars. This is a simple and true account of a transaction upon which the president attempts to fix upon me an interference with the estate of Timberlake. Nothing but the most hideous obliquity could have so distorted his poor blind vision.

I have now done with Mr. Timberlake's slops and small stores; having no more agency in their disposition than that above stated, and which is matter of record, as the minutes of the proceedings of the late court of inquiry will abundantly prove, and which, according to the letter of Mr. Woodbury below (B), had been examined and returned by the president without disapprobation.

I shall, in the sequel, tax the reader with a history of the money left by purser Timberlake on his demise. The amount was reported to me, by those who counted it, to be 11,483 dollars, of which I immediately made a memorandum. This memorandum I voluntarily delivered to the court, to save all fruitless inquiry about the money, having no motive to conceal the truth. My first impression was to charge myself with that sum—open a new account with the government, and at my risk disburse it in the service. This was positively prohibited by capt. Patterson, and as peremptorily was I commanded to disburse it on the books of the late purser. I implicitly obeyed; and in paying his rolls, and discharging the outstanding debts to the 31st March, 1828, exhausted the last dollar; inasmuch, that, with the permission and approbation of the commander of the Constitution, a thousand dollars were borrowed of the Dutch consul, to enable the ship to depart in credit from Port Mahon. All the vouchers taken for the payments, upon Timberlake's books, and of his outstanding debts, made out of the aforesaid $11,483, were turned in with his books and papers for his benefit, or rather the benefit of his estate; for all which he has received full credit, while I, who performed this task, by order of my superior, without emolument or compensation, have been denied the credit of a single dollar, in the very face of the judgment of the late court of inquiry, and the records of the files of the department.

With the sanction of Mr. Woodbury, I had access as well to my own accounts as to those of the late purser; and I presented for the consideration of the accounting officers an account current, covering the whole sum which came into my hands, every item of which is supported by a legal voucher, precisely as if the account had been originally mine. The two accounting officers did not deign to ask or receive the slightest explanation; but rejected the whole as inseparable in any particular. Upon their iniquitous report, the president acted; having, as I believe, never seen one of the vouchers. Upon such a report, he charges me with presenting an account current, composed, in a "great degree," of items which have notoriously passed to my credit, or are unfounded and frivolous. A more bare-faced scandal was never penned, alike unmerited by me, and unworthy of the chief magistrate of the United States.

Below will be found my account with the government in settlement of its new claims upon me (C), and I shall now wait two events—a snit at law, which I fearlessly challenge, and the meeting of congress, to which I shall appeal. In the mean time, I claim, for the defence of my honor, and protection of my dear bought fame, a generous interposition of all my late brothers in the service, no one of whom will have heard of the high handed oppression with which I have been assailed, without the deepest grief. I know they will bear testimony in my favor, even at the risk of an odious inquisition. * * *

If there be not honesty and firmness enough in the officers of the treasury department, to investigate the state of this concern, I will take it upon myself to bring it to an issue.

R. B. RANDOLPH, late of the U. S. Navy.

The president of the United States has carefully examined the proceedings of the court of inquiry, charged with the investigation of the conduct of lieutenant Robert B. Randolph in connection with his account as acting purser of the frigate Constitution.

It appears by the evidence of commodore Patterson, commander of the ship, that upon the death of purser John B. Timberlake, at Port Mahon, on the 2d day of April, 1828, lieutenant Randolph was appointed acting purser; and that verbal orders were given directing an inventory to be taken according to law of all the money and stores, public and private, left by the said Timberlake, which were about to pass into the possession of the acting purser; and that it was reported this duty had been performed with the exception of some stores which were stowed away under the ship's provisions, she being nearly ready to sail for the United States.

It appears by the same testimony, that when the ship arrived near the light house at Boston, commodore Patterson inquired of lieutenant Randolph, whether the inventories of the money and property left by Mr. Timberlake, had been sent to the fourth auditor of the treasury, and was answered in the affirmative.

Nevertheless it appears by the evidence of those who were directed to take the inventories, that although the money was counted, no inventories of the stores were taken, and by the records and files of the fourth auditor's office it also appears, that no account, either of the money or stores, was furnished to that office by lieutenant Randolph, or any other person.

It further appears, that in the settlement of his accounts at the office of the fourth auditor, lieutenant Randolph neither charged himself with any portion of the money or stores left by Mr. Timberlake, nor gave any intimation that any had come into his possession.

It further appears, that after lieutenant Randolph had completed the payment of the ship's company on her arrival in the United States, he had left of the public money put into his hands for that purpose, upwards of $20,600, of which, upon the settlement of his accounts, he returned into the treasury a little more than $10,000, applying the rest to his own use, and that he refused to state in his defence before the court of inquiry, in what manner this surplus of funds had accrued.

It further appears, that in the year 1829, having arrived in the United States in July, 1828, and his accounts having been settled in October of that year, lieutenant Randolph paid to Thomas Norman, $600 of the funds remaining in his hands on account of purser Timberlake, proving that he was not ignorant of the fact that all those funds had not been accounted for in his previous settlement with the government.

It further appears, that the accounting officers of the treasury were ignorant of the money and stores left by Mr. Timberlake, until an unaccountable default exhibited in the settlement of his accounts, led to inquiry into the means by which it had been produced; and when, in the course of that inquiry, it was ascertained that money and stores left by him had come into lieutenant Randolph's possession, the latter, when called on, refused to state the amount, or render any account of them, although he acknowledged that he had a memorandum of the amount of the money, indulging in passion and threats unbecoming an officer of the navy, and not to be expected from a man of conscious integrity.

Considering these things so clearly established by the testimony, the president cannot approve of so much of the finding of the court as declares, "it does not appear that lieutenant Randolph said any thing with an intention to mislead or deceive the commanding officer, in relation to taking of inventories of articles left by Mr. Timberlake, or of the disposition made of them;" nor can he approve of the opinion expressed by the court, "that the before mentioned neglect of lieutenant Randolph, and the irregularities in his manner of performing the duties of acting purser, and in keeping and making out his accounts, did not proceed from any intention to defraud the United States or Mr. Timberlake."

These conclusions, in the opinion of the president, are incompatible with lieutenant Randolph's failure to charge himself with the money and effects of Mr. Timberlake, with the misinformation given by him to commodore Patterson in relation to sending the inventories to the fourth auditor—with the appropriation to his own use, before the settlement of his accounts, of near ten thousand dollars of the money sent to him at Boston to pay off the ship's company, showing that he had an accurate knowledge what would be the result of that settlement—with his payment of $600 to Mr. Norman after the settlement of his account, which is a confession of his knowledge, that he had retained money belonging to the United States or to Mr. Timberlake—with his refusal to give information in relation to the money and property left by Mr. Timberlake as he was bound to do, as purser of the navy, by law—and with the manifestation of excitement and the violent language used by him when called upon for explanations.

And finally, instead of coming forward and correcting the errors of his account which have been developed by the court of enquiry, and returning into the treasury the $4,303 11—which that court after liberally admitting every claim advanced by him with a show of evidence, find to be still in his hands unaccounted for, he has presented to the accounting officers of the treasury an account current, composed in a great degree of items which have notoriously passed to his credit, or are unfounded and frivolous, showing a balance of about $600 in his own favor against the United States, thereby evincing a determination not to refund any portion of the money which he has improperly applied to his own use, if it be possible to avoid it.

In the opinion of the president, the facts which appear in this case, and the conduct of lieutenant Randolph throughout the investigation, prove him to be unworthy the naval service of this republic, and an unfit associate for those sons of chivalry, integrity and honor, who adorn our navy. The secretary of the navy is therefore directed to dismiss lieutenant Robert B. Randolph from the naval service of the United States.

And the president trusts that the most efficient means will be resorted to by the navy department to prevent in future that total neglect and disregard of the rights of deceased officers and their families which form striking characteristics in this case.

Navy department, January 24th, 1833.

SIR—The court of inquiry in relation to your conduct having closed its sessions and made a report to this department on the questions submitted, I seize an early opportunity to apprise you of this fact, and of the completion by the president of an examination of that report.

The whole proceedings are on file for your inspection at any convenient time, and a copy may be taken if desired.

Among other things the court find that—

"Lieutenant Randolph has received public property with which he has not charged himself, and for which he has never accounted to the government, as follows, viz:

Cash left by Mr. Timberlake,	$11,483 00
Slops left by Mr. T. which cost	178 75
	$11,661 75

They further find, that you paid from the same, sundry sums, amounting, in all, to	7,358 64

No. 7,428—7,312

Treasury department, fourth auditor's office, Oct. 27, 1828.

I certify, that I have examined and adjusted the account of Robert B. Randolph, acting purser of frigate Constitution, and find that it is closed as appears from the statement and vouchers herewith transmitted for the decision of the second comptroller of the treasury thereon.

T. WATKINS, auditor.

To the second comptroller of the treasury.

Second comptroller's office.

I admit and certify the above balance, this 9th day of January, 1829.

RICHARD CUTTS, second comptroller.

Treasury department, fourth auditor's office, May 25, 1832.

Pursuant to "an act to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts," approved 3d March, 1817, I, Amos Kendall, fourth auditor of the treasury of the United States, do hereby certify, that the foregoing is a true transcript from the original report on file in this office.

AMOS KENDALL.

Alexandria, Dec. 23d, 1830.

SIR: Twelve months have elapsed since the subject of my accounts, and the various controversies growing out of them, have been brought to an issue between the fourth auditor and myself. Serious charges, implicating my personal integrity and official character, have been promulgated to the world upon the authority of the auditor. You will readily concur with me in opinion that it is desirable that this matter shall be terminated, and my own sense of what is due to myself, imperatively enjoins upon me the duty of asking for some proceedings which may either fix upon me the imputed guilt, or honorably relieve me from this state of painful suspense. I am ignorant whether I stand charged upon the books of the department with any moneys which remain to be accounted for; if I am, I pray that I may be apprised of them, as well as of any description of charge which stands against me.

Peculiar circumstances in my situation make me solicitous upon this subject; and will, I trust, afford me an ample apology for the present application to you. I have the honor to be, with unfeigned respect, your ob't serv't,

R. B. RANDOLPH.

Hon. John Branch.

(F.)

Navy department, Dec. 27th, 1830.

SIR: Your letter of the 23d instant has been duly received. In reply, you are informed that a court of inquiry shall, agreeably to your request, be ordered, at as early a day as the public interest will permit, and of which you will be duly informed.

I am, very respectfully, &c. &c.

JOHN BRANCH.

Lieut. Robert B. Randolph, of the U. S. Navy.

(G.)

Navy department, May 4, 1832.

SIR: A court of inquiry in your case has been ordered, and will be held at the navy yard, Charlestown, Massachusetts, on Monday, the 4th day of June next.

This will give to you the longest time for preparation practically, before the supposed sailing of the United States frigate from New York, in which vessel some of the witnesses are now under orders to the Mediterranean.

As other witnesses reside in Boston, whose attendance elsewhere would be highly inconvenient, and as you have declined waiving the personal attendance of any witnesses, the court has been ordered to sit in that neighborhood.

It will be composed of the following named officers, viz: commodore Charles Morris, as president; masters commandant Thomas H. Stevens and Joseph Smith, members; and Henry M. Morfit, esq. judge advocate. I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,
LEVI WOODBURY.

Lieut. Robert B. Randolph, U. S. Navy, Alexandria, D. C.

TOWN MEETING AT ALEXANDRIA.

On the outrage committed on the president.

At a public meeting of the citizens of Alexandria, held at the market square, on Tuesday, the 7th of May, 1833, agreeably to public notice, Bernard Hoare, esq. the mayor, was called to the chair, and on motion, Charles Neal, esq. appointed secretary.

The mayor having briefly explained the object of the meeting, Thomson F. Mason, esq. in an eloquent and animated address, embodying the purport and amplifying and illustrating the principles of the following resolutions, offered them to the consideration of the people assembled in the public square; and the resolutions were severally and unanimously adopted.

Resolved, That the citizens of the town have learned, with mingled sentiments of regret and indignation, that a flagrant violation of the public peace, and of the sanctity of the laws, was yesterday committed on board the public mail boat, whilst lying at our wharves, by Robert B. Randolph, on the person of the president of the United States.

Resolved, That whilst despotic governments, resting on principles of fear, have been necessarily sustained and protected by force, and in the milder forms of monarchical governments, though in some degree distinguished by greater security to the persons of their chief executive officers, it has nevertheless been thought necessary to surround them with armed guards; it has heretofore, been the proud boast of our republican institutions, that obedience to the constituted authorities, was upheld by a sacred reverence for the public will—and that the moral force of public opinion, alone, spread a panoply of defence around the person of every officer in the discharge of his official duties more enduring and certain than the array of armed men.

Resolved, That in the outrage which has been committed, the principles of our free institutions have been violated; and that in the manner and circumstances of its perpetration, there is nothing found to extenuate it or allay the feelings of an injured and indignant people—that in the history of our country, it is the first time within the knowledge of this people, that an attempt has been made to gratify a personal vengeance—for the results of an high official act—and this blow at the fundamental principles of our institutions has been struck by an arm to which had once been confided the high trust of upholding the flag and defending the character and honor of his country!

Resolved, That this outrage on the dignity of the people, in the person of their chief magistrate, calls for a general expression of public indignation.

Resolved, That the chairman be requested to enclose a copy of the proceedings of this meeting to the president of the United States, and also cause them to be published in the newspapers of this town.

FROM THE "GLOBE"—SUBSEQUENTLY PUBLISHED.

Extract from the report of the fourth auditor to the secretary of the navy, in relation to the accounts of John B. Timberlake, and Robert B. Randolph. May 25, 1830.

It recently occurred to me, that it might be ascertained with tolerable certainty what were lieutenant Randolph's receipts and payments from the 3d April, the time he assumed the purchasership at Port Mahon, to July, the time of the ship's arrival at Boston; and again, from the ship's arrival to the settlement of his accounts. A minute investigation exhibits the following result, viz:—

His receipts and payments before arrival, were as follows, as shewn by his account and vouchers, viz:—
Received in shops at Port Mahon $742 50
Received in cash at Gibraltar 11,000 00

Total receipts $11,742 50

He is credited with payments to officers and men, disbursements in the Mediterranean, shops and stores issued, and shops returned to naval store, $30,729 98. Excess of payment over receipts, $8,987 48.

There was no known fund out of which this could have been drawn, other than Mr. Timberlake's money received at Port Mahon. But in addition to these payments, he paid for tobacco at Gibraltar, $148 72, little of which was sold to the crew, in consequence of its inferior quality; and a considerable sum for other stores. How much of this was replaced by issues of the same stores, the papers do not enable me to ascertain.

After arriving at the above result, I examined into lieutenant Randolph's receipts and payments after his arrival in Boston. The result exhibited a balance of receipts, over payments corresponding with the excess of payments over receipts before his arrival.

From these views of the subject, it was apparent to my mind, that lieutenant Randolph must have had left in bank at Boston, after paying off the crew, appropriating all his own commissions, compensation and expenses, and after returning into the treasury the amount found due from him on settlement, at least $10,000. At my request the secretary of the treasury applied for his bank account. The reply of the bank with lieutenant Randolph's account, is annexed, marked (36). It fully confirms my previous conclusions. It shows that, after lieutenant Randolph had finished all his payments, he still had left in bank $19,873 23. Before he left Boston, he drew out 9,873 23, of this sum, $718 06 in cash; $155 17, in a check on the Norfolk branch, and $9,090 in a check on the Richmond branch, leaving precisely $10,000 in bank. This, with $257 43 afterwards deposited, was all of the $19,873 23, which ever came into the treasury.

But a comparison of lieutenant Randolph's bank account with his account in this office, makes it apparent that he had during the progress of his payments, drawn out considerable sums on his own account. His account current, and abstracts from his pay roll, are annexed, marked (37). Had he deposited all the money he received in Boston, and drawn out none except for the payment of the ship's crew, the balance in bank would have exceeded $22,000. A careful examination of all the accounts gives the following results; which I have no doubt are accurate within a few cents:—

1828, July 5, lieutenant Randolph received of the navy agent at Boston, in anticipation of a remittance, $1,500 00
12. Received the amount of $93,000 remitted, deducting the foregoing item, 91,500 00
Received for Timberlake's stores, sold at auction, 607 21
Received for dead men's and deserter's clothes sold, 41 09

Total receipts at Boston, $93,648 30
Whole amount paid officers and men at Boston, 71,394 49

Surplus remaining on hand, $19,873 23, of which was in bank as his account shows, 22,253 36
Of this sum there was returned into the treasury only 10,257 43

Leaving in lieutenant Randolph's hands, $11,995 93

Of this sum he has accounted for the following items, only, viz:—
Expenses at Charlestown, $90 00
Postage, 2 07
Paid R. Calder, ps clerk, 78 15
His own commissions allowed, 2,267 42
Travelling expenses and per diem while settling accounts, 107 40
His own pay on pay roll, 262 89
His own pay for August and September, 200 52
$3,008 45

Leaving in lieutenant Randolph's hands wholly unaccounted for, after allowing all his pay, emoluments, commissions and expenses, $8,987 48

To this amount in cash, must be added, to ascertain what was really detained by lieutenant Randolph, the money on hand when the vessel arrived, the value of all stores on hand, deducting his profit on those sold to the crew, and any debts which might be due to him for money lent to other officers.

Is it possible that all this could have been lieutenant Randolph's money? By acting as purser less than four months, did he make by means unknown, $8,987 48
By commissions, 2,267 42
By lieutenant's pay, 262 89

In all, $11,517 79

And in addition to this, an unknown amount in stores and other things, which do not enter into his public account.

These facts admit of but one construction. Most of Mr. Timberlake's money was paid to the officers and men, or vested in stores, before the ship arrived in the United States. Lieutenant Randolph took a credit for these payments in his settlement. Having called for money enough to cover them he had their exact amount left on hand, after paying the crew, and transferring to the treasury the balance found due from him. This was sufficient to enable him, after meeting all demands of comfort, pleasure and friendship, to carry home a considerable sum in money, besides a check for $9,000.

Extract from a record of proceedings of the court of inquiry in the case of Lieut. R. B. Randolph, Friday, 18th Jan. 1833.

The court met, pursuant to adjournment; present as yesterday: the last day's proceedings were read and the court then, after deliberation, agreed upon the following opinion:

First, that Lieut. Randolph has received public property with which he has not charged himself, and for which he has never accounted to the government, as follows, viz:

Cash left by Mr. Timberlake $11,483 00
Shops left by Mr. Timberlake which cost 178 75
$11,661 75

And that he has paid from the same the following amounts for which Mr. Timberlake has received or is entitled to receive credit by his final pay roll, No. 10, the following amounts, viz:

Amount paid to men at Mahon, discharged on pay roll, No. 10, on 31st March, 1828,	$3,241 69
Amount paid to William Prince, and credited on same roll to Mr. Timberlake	315 00
Amount paid to officers and credited on the same roll	1,442 45
By amount paid for ration money to officers' boys, credited on the same roll	100 00
And by a further amount paid to a taylor named Orfila for articles made by order and for the benefit of Mr. Timberlake, whose bill is receipted as though paid by Mr. Timberlake	2,259 50
	$7,358 64
	4,303 11

Leaving still to be accounted for

And further, that lieutenant Randolph received of the small stores left by Mr. Timberlake to the value of $600 00.

And that he paid to Thomas Norman, after his return to the United States, a sum stated to have been due from Mr. Timberlake at his death to the said Norman, amounting to the sum of $600 00.

That lieutenant Randolph's conduct in relation to his transactions as acting purser of the frigate Constitution was incorrect and censurable in the following particulars, viz:

In assuming the responsibilities and commencing the duties of purser, and taking charge of any of the property and effects left by his predecessor, before a proper order had been given for taking such surveys and inventories of the property left by Mr. Timberlake, as the regulations of the navy department required, and before such inventories had been duly taken and handed to him.

In not charging himself and crediting his predecessor Mr. Timberlake, in his accounts, with the amount of money and other articles left by the said Timberlake, of which he took possession, and which he expended as acting purser, and in not mentioning such receipts to the officers of the treasury, or at the time of settling his accounts.

In making payments and taking receipts for the same as though the payments had been made by Mr. Timberlake during his life, and thereby rendering it impossible to determine with accuracy the precise amounts which were respectively paid by Mr. Timberlake and by himself.

In not taking greater care to separate the articles left by his predecessor, and of which he did not assume the control and expenditure, from those of which he did assume the control, so as to prevent any of the former from being either issued or returned and passed to his own credit.

In returning into the navy store and receiving credit for linen or duck or slop clothing, when in fact it had not been purchased as such nor any part of the whole quantity originally purchased, had been issued or charged as slop clothing.

The court are further of opinion that the before mentioned neglects of lieut. Randolph and the irregularities in his manner of performing the duties of acting purser, and in keeping and making out of his accounts, did not proceed from any intention to defraud the United States or Mr. Timberlake.

The court are also of opinion that the amount of money left in the possession of lieut. Randolph when his accounts were left at Washington in 1828, was so large that it ought of itself to have excited doubts in his mind as to the correctness of the accounts which he had rendered of the amounts which he had actually paid on account of Mr. Timberlake, and to have induced some voluntary attempt on his part to procure a further investigation before the time when he was called upon by the present 4th auditor for explanations.

The court are further of opinion that the conduct and language of lieut. Randolph towards the second comptroller and the 4th auditor of the treasury was not intended by him to embarrass or intimidate either of them in the fair settlement of his accounts, but that the warmth or intemperance of his language was occasioned by his having adopted an opinion that they were disposed to treat him with injustice in relation to his accounts.

The court are further of opinion that lieut. Randolph had no agency, direct or indirect, in writing or causing to be written, any of the anonymous letters referred to in the precept, or that he had any knowledge of such letters having being written previous to their publication.

The court then adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock, meridian.

Saturday, January 19, 1833. The court met according to adjournment, present, all the members and the judges advocate. The proceedings of yesterday were read and the investigation closed.

(Signed)

C. MORRIS, president of the court.

HENRY M. MORFIT, judge advocate.

THE PARDONING POWER.

We copy the following sound and pertinent remarks from the "New York Commercial Advertiser."

Pardoning power. A discreet exercise of this prerogative, is among the most difficult and delicate of the duties which the executive of this state can be called upon to perform. To the late governor, however widely we may have differed from him in politics, (and less widely we have reason to believe in principle and sentiment, than in association), we have ever accorded a prompt acknowledgement of firmness and independence in this branch of that department. It is gratifying to perceive that his successor seems inclined to follow his example. Of this we have recent proof. A young man by the name of George Dennison, was sometime since convicted of murder, in the county of Chenango, and sentenced to undergo the extreme penalty of the law. His case presents perhaps, one of the strongest dissuaves from intemperance that can be urged. Dennison had applied to Mr. Hamblin Gregory, an innkeeper, for liquor—but was refused. Food was given him of which he partook, and said that it was better than liquor. But at a subsequent day, which was on Thursday the 27th September, he called for liquor again, and was again refused, when he threatened to shoot the landlord. On the Sunday evening following, he procured a loaded gun at the house of Mr. Howard, another innkeeper, living about half a mile from the first, with which he repaired to the tavern of Mr. Gregory, and shot his son, supposing it to be the father. The son, expecting to set out the next morning for Utica, had put on some of his father's apparel, which probably occasioned the mistake—for the murderer had no enmity against the former, nor even against the latter, except such as had arisen from the refusal to let him have liquor. The defence set up was insanity—but the evidence to support it was not deemed sufficient by the jury, and they returned a verdict of guilty. That the act was perpetrated by the prisoner no doubt could exist, and it was equally evident that it was done in that state of semi-consciousness or hallucination which is the frequent result of intoxication. After the rendition of the verdict he addressed the court, and without denying the facts that had been testified against him, he said:—

"It appears in evidence that I have taken from one of my fellow creatures that which I cannot restore; but let me tell you, as a dying man, that the circumstances which led to the commission of this crime, are a mystery to me. The whole transaction appears more like a dream than a reality; there is one circumstance in particular, that I have no knowledge of, which is, in relation to my eating supper at Howard's. There is no doubt but what I did eat there, but I do not remember of eating one morsel of food that day. I would, also, mention another fact in relation to the testimony of esquire Campbell, not that I would have you think I doubt his veracity, for I have not the least particle of doubt in my own mind but what he stated the facts precisely as he heard them from my own lips. He testifies that he asked me if I went directly from Howard's to Gregory's. He says the answer was, that I did. Now, gentlemen, I remember being at Howard's, and I also remember being at Gregory's; but do not know any about the manner in which I went there, for there are but a few rods of the ground that I have any recollection of. I do not hesitate to say that I have had a fair and impartial trial. According to the testimony, I think the jurors could render no other verdict than the one they have, with a clear conscience and in conformity to the laws of our country. While I meditate on this, I am sensible that I have not only broken and trampled upon the laws of my country, but have set at naught the dread law of my maker."

The plea of intoxication is no excuse for the commission of a crime. The community would not be safe were such a justification to be allowed; and we feel confident that the public will approve the course which has been taken by governor Marcy, in reference to this individual, as indicated by the letter already published.

LAW CASES.

Brief reports or notices of important or interesting things.

INTEREST ON MONEY. Lord chief justice Ellenborough has laid down the rule of law with regard to interest clearly and concisely thus: "Interest ought to be allowed only in cases where there is contract for the payment of moneys on a certain day; or where there has been any express promise to pay interest; or where from the course of dealing between the parties it may be inferred that this was their intention; or where it can be proved that the money has been used and interest had actually made. A note of hand or promissory note, does therefore legally carry interest; tradesman's bills, where there are no special agreements, do not.

IMPORTANT TO PUBLISHERS. Baillie court of Edinburgh, 25th of February, 1833. A. Deuchar, seal engraver, agent for the British Herald, vs. Thomas Johnson. Johnson was an original subscriber to the British Herald, which, by the prospectus, it was stated, would be published in four parts, price 2s. each. On the publication of the fourth part, it was announced that the work would extend to five parts, and the price of the whole to £5 5s. instead of £4 4s. The baillie held that the publisher was bound by his prospectus, and that the defendant was entitled to have the work complete for £4 4s. however many parts it might extend to. [Glasgow Herald.]

TRAVEL ON THE HIGHWAY. Bostwick and wife, vs. Champion and Evans. This was an action against the defendants, who were two of the proprietors of the late pioneer line of stages. One of the drivers of the line, in passing a one horse wagon near Vermont, in the county in which Mrs. Bostwick was riding, struck the wheel of the wagon with the stage, and the same was upset, and Mrs. Bostwick seriously injured, so that she has been ever since confined to her house, a period of more than two years. A large number of witnesses were sworn on this cause, and great interest was excited. Mr. Bostwick had previously recovered a verdict at a former circuit for his own damages, $800; and this suit was brought to recover the damages, resulting from the personal injury to his wife. The cause was ably summed up to the jury by O. Hastings, esq. of Rochester, for the defendants, and J. A. Spencer, esq. of Utica, for the plaintiffs, and after a minute charge from Judge Williams, the cause was submitted to the jury, who found a verdict for the plaintiff for eight hundred dollars.

[Rome, Oneida co. Telegraph. From the Worcester (Mass.) Freeman. James Reed recovered, before the supreme court of Greenfield, last week, $980 damages and $250 costs of the town of Northfield, for an injury sustained by the state of bad roads in that town. This is a salutary admonition to other towns to take heed to their ways.

Caution to stage proprietors. An action was brought by John O'Hanlan against Asa Hall, to recover damages for an injury received by the wife of the former, by the stage coach General Macomb, of which the defendant was owner. It appeared that in the absence of the driver, who was engaged in seeking passengers, the horses broke loose from their stand, and, in their course through Broadway, ran over Mrs. O'Hanlan, while crossing the street, knocking her down, and injuring her very severely. Judge Hoffman, in delivering his charge to the jury, gave an elaborate and clear exposition of the law in relation to furious and careless driving, involving the liability of stage proprietors. He observed that he was glad the present case had come before the court, as it would furnish an opportunity to make public the liabilities under which stage owners were bound. The corporation had passed a law regulating hackney coaches, by which it was rendered penal for a driver to leave his box, as was done in this instance. The owner must be responsible for the carelessness of those employed by him in the capacity of drivers. If drivers neglect their duty, a jury must measure out their punishment. The jury accordingly rendered a verdict for the plaintiff, fixing the damages at four hundred and fifty dollars, and six cents costs.

[N. Y. Advocate. Another. A jury in New York has returned a verdict of seventy-five dollars damages against the owner of a hack, for careless driving, by which injury was done to a wagon and a lady riding in it.

The judge in summing up the case made the following remark, which may be interesting to husbands, as it shows when are persons personally and when jointly concerned in their wives' misfortunes.

"The next question was, what is the rule in relation to an injury done to the wife? On this head, the law laid down by defendant's counsel was correct, viz: if the wife receives an extreme injury, by means of which she is confined for weeks or months, and her services are consequently lost, the husband could have no difficulty in recovering alone—but if the injury were merely light or trivial, the action could not be sustained by the husband alone. If the services of the wife in the present case were lost at all, the jury must measure the period and estimate their damages accordingly."

[The law of the road seems about to be much better understood than it has been—and impudent or careless drivers of stages and other vehicles, or negligent public officers, will be more frequently "brought into court," (as they ought) than heretofore.]

TAKING UP A DEAD BODY. Among the proceedings of the court in Northampton county, Pennsylvania, reported for the Eastern Continent, is the following case:

Commonwealth vs. Daniel Huntsman. Indictment for taking up the dead body of Hugh Pugh, in Stroudsburg.

The facts of this case were briefly as follows: Mr. Pugh had been buried some two years ago, but contrary to the custom of the congregation had not been placed in the same row with his friends, but in the burial row of the Hollingshead family. One of the said family deeming herself near her latter end, and anxious to be laid beside her deceased sister, to which arrangement the grave of Mr. Pugh, as then located, was an obstacle, employed the defendant to remove the coffin a few feet further off. This was accomplished without the knowledge of Mr. Pugh's friends, and as they alleged, with circumstances of carelessness and brutality—contending that the grave was very shallow, the coffin broken and placed in the grave on the side. The judge charged the jury, that taking up a dead body, and removing it with such intentions as evidently actuated the defendant in this cause, ought not to be considered an indictable offence. The jury found a verdict of not guilty.

LIABILITY OF DIRECTORS OF MONIED INSTITUTIONS. Vice chancellor McCoun has pronounced his decision in the case of William Scott and others, stockholders of the late National Insurance company, vs. Frederick de Peyster and others, president and directors of that institution. The circumstances of this case, growing out of the misconduct of Oliver G. Kane, secretary of the company, are no doubt familiar to our readers. The vice chancellor dismissed the bill, at the same time establishing the following important points.

1. That the directors of the National Insurance company violated the law by discounting notes amounting on an average to $290,000 per year—that they had no right to invest their capital in banking business, and by doing so they acted contrary to the charter of the company and the restraining act.

2. That directors, though they violate the provisions of law, by investing their capital in an illegal manner, and contrary to the provisions of the charter, are not to be held liable for any loss, provided they acted through mistake, and with no dishonest intentions.

3. That the directors of the National Insurance company are responsible, not for gross neglect merely, but for ordinary neglect, which is the want of that care which a man takes of his own concerns, and that on the pleadings and proofs in the cause, the loss of $179,000 out of a capital of $300,000 could not be attributed to the want of ordinary care.

It will be, perhaps, interesting to the public to hear that an appeal will be taken to this decision. [N. Y. Cour. & Eng.]

SLANDER SUIT. A case of slander was lately tried in Troy, N. Y. in which Miss Achsah L. Clark was plaintiff, and John O. Martling, defendant. The trial lasted two whole days, and resulted in a verdict of $1,200 damages. It appeared in evidence that Mr. Elijah Wild, a very respectable young man of Troy, had become intimate with the plaintiff, while residing at the defendant's house, which intimacy was continued after changing his residence; and which finally resulted in a marriage contract between them, that was to be consummated on the first of May next. Martling, the defendant, wishing to retain Miss Clark in his employ, who was a very perfect and competent hand in the manufacture of toys, which was carried on by him, and knowing he could not, unless he could break up her intended marriage with Mr. Wild—saw Mr. Wild, advised him not to marry Miss Clark, telling him at the same time her character was bad, very bad, and related certain circumstances to prove it. Before this slander was communicated to Mr. Wild, he was put under an injunction of secrecy—the defendant thereby thinking to induce him to desert Miss Clark without an explanation. Mr. Wild resolved, however, to communicate the statement to Miss Clark, and called upon her brother and related to him what the defendant had told him.

Her brother immediately called on the defendant, who took him into a back room and told him "that all he had stated to Mr. Wild in relation to his sister was true." Mr. Wild then called upon Miss Clark, and told her the defendant (Martling) had made statements in relation to her, which had induced him to decline marrying her, and all further intimacy, and that her brother would inform her of the nature of the statement made by the defendant. And it was directly communicated to her at the defendant's house—which she immediately left. Thus the contemplated marriage was broken up, and a prosecution about to be commenced—the defendant then immediately set himself to work to pacify Miss Clark, and to get her again into his employ—this he attempted through his wife and Miss Eliza Clark, the sister of the plaintiff. He stated to her brother, and gave out, that all he had said in relation to her was false—a mere fabrication by himself; and offered her $16 per month, exclusive of her board, to return to his employ—which was by her indignantly refused, and she persisted in her determination to appeal to the laws for justice against the murderer of her reputation.

When Mr. Hunt, counsel for the plaintiff, rose to speak, the house was instantly silent; a breath could have been heard—and by him the testimony was most ably canvassed; and perfect justice was done to his cause—and the feelings of injured innocence. Mr. Buel then rose and took a general view of the case. He portrayed in all the colors of language, the principles and objects which actuated the defendant in his attempt to destroy the reputation [all she possessed] of a poor, unprotected orphan girl. And by an eloquent flow of argument, in which he severely and justly castigated the execrable and odious creature before him, the excitement of the audience was raised to the highest pitch of indignation. And being followed by an able and proper charge delivered to the jury, by Judge Vanderpool, a plaudit that could not be suppressed, made the very edifice itself tremble; and when the miserable defendant rose to go out, so great was the feeling of indignation, every person near whom he passed, shrunk back from his touch as if he had been a leper. [N. Y. Gazette.]

PERFECTION OF REASON. The London Morning Herald furnishes the annexed article:

"It has been long understood that English law is the 'perfection of reason,' at least by English lawyers. In a celebrated six hours' speech, the present lord chancellor Brougham, when a member of the house of commons, endeavored to disturb that opinion, so long and so well established at the bar. He, in fact, attempted to show, and some of the 'unlearned' members of the legislature thought his proofs unanswerable, that many things which are law are neither reason nor common sense, nor good policy, nor justice. In an unreformed house of commons, however, the quiver of sarcasm was exhausted in vain, and the 'perfection of reason' still continues to maintain its close alliance with what the human mind, uninitiated in legal mysteries, might easily suppose to be the 'perfection of absurdity.' Judge Buller, a great luminary of the bench, once held that a man who made a tender to another, to whom he owed money, of a few shillings more than his debt, did not tender the sum due. In logic, it is understood that the greater quantity contains the less. Accordingly, logicians would say that the man who offered another four pounds and a few shillings over, when he only owed him four pounds, had, in fact, offered the four pounds due. But what is sound in logic is not always good in law. It was only yesterday that a rule was applied in the king's bench for a new trial, and the rule granted upon the following point: The plaintiff sued the defendant for £20; the defendant pleaded a tender to that amount, which would have barred the action. The jury having heard all the evidence on both sides relative to the tender, were of opinion that the defendant had tendered, not the bare debt of £20 to the plaintiff, but the sum of £20 9s. 6d. A point of law was now raised, whether a tender of the latter sum was, in law, as well as in fact and logic, a tender of the former. One of the learned judges asked why the plaintiff, knowing he was tendered more than his debt, did not take the debt out of it, and leave the remainder? All their lordships seemed, indeed, to desire to reconcile the law with the fact, if the 'authorities' would allow them, and to have an inclination to rule that he who tendered another £20 9s. 6d. did, on the principle of the greater sum containing the less, tender him £20. But the law was peremptory. The Judge-made³ law of Mr. Justice Buller having established that £4 19s. 6d. did not contain £4 9s. 6d. a rule was granted calling on the defendant to show cause why there should not be a new trial, on the ground of his having tendered the plaintiff more than the sum due, and thereby made no tender at all. This is certainly law, but whether it is the 'perfection of reason,' let the unlearned decide.³

LIABILITIES OF PARTNERS. Judge Hoffman, of New York, has recently decided, as we learn by the Commercial Advertiser, that a levy upon co-partnership property, for an individual debt of one member of a concern is not valid. It was not to be allowed as a principle of law, that the whole property of a firm may be taken out of its hands, and be dealt with as a sheriff may think proper, under an execution issued against a partner of the firm. An interest in it may be claimed, but the property cannot be seized. The possession and disposal of it must remain with the firm, and all that the creditor can do, is to give notice to the other parties of the execution against the insolvent partner, to account with him for the balance of his property remaining in their hands, after all the debts due to the solvent partners are paid.

ESTATE OF STEPHEN GIRARD. From the Philadelphia Gazette. It is known to most of our citizens, that the heirs at law of the late Stephen Girard, claimed all the real estate which the deceased purchased subsequently to the publication of the last codicil of his will, amounting, we believe, to between sixty and seventy thousand dollars. The city as residuary legatee, defended its claim upon the property, but the supreme court of this state gave its opinion, which must settle the question, viz: that the property claimed by the heirs did not pass with the real estate previously acquired by the deceased, and by right and in law it belongs to the heirs.

LAW OF PATENTS. We learn from the Greenfield, (Mass.) Gazette, that a case of some interest was lately decided at the supreme court in that county, of which the following is an abstract:

George Dickinson, vs. Richardson Hall. It was an action on a note of hand for $200. The defence was that it was without consideration. The defendant proved that the note, with several others, amounting in all to about $1,000, was given in consideration of the conveyance to himself and others for the exclusive right to make, use and vend Hines and Bains' improved patent machine for dressing flax and hemp in five towns in the county of Franklin. He then attempted to prove that the patent was void for several reasons. It seems that in 1823 a patent was granted to Hines and Bains for the whole machine, and afterwards, in 1826, they obtained a patent for the remainder of the term for the application of the broil wheels and ride shafts for the purpose of turning the fluted rollers only—suggesting that their former patent on the same subject was void on account of a deficient specification. The former patent was accordingly cancelled. The machine was proved to have been in general use between 1823 and 1826, and the defendant contends that this destroys the validity of the second patent, as by the provisions of the patent law, valid letters could only be granted for an invention "not used by the public before the application." But the court held that the invalidity arising from a prior use depended upon the intention of the party—the presumption that he had abandoned his right and dedicated his invention to the public, and that the circumstances of the use in this case negated such an intention, the objection could not be sustained. The defendant then contended that the patent was void—because the "improved machine" was useless, and the improvement patented not new—and a variety of evidence was gone into upon these points on both sides. The chief justice charged the jury that it would be a good defence to the note to show that the patent was void: that in order to a valid patent, the machine or invention patented must be both "new and useful,"—that in order to usefulness, the machine or supposed improvement patented must be applicable to beneficial use, and that it clearly appeared that no man in any part of the United States, under any circumstances, could erect such a machine without loss, that it could not be useful within the meaning of the law. He also directed them if the patented improvement contained neither any new principle, or any new combination of old principles—or a combination for a new purpose—then also the patent would be void. The jury found a verdict for the defendant. Several questions of law were reserved for the whole court. [Boston Courier.

FORFEITURE OF GOODS IMPORTED. In the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, before Judge Hopkinson, and a special jury, a decision was lately had, which is of importance to merchants. An information was filed by the district attorney against a box of laces—which was found to contain thirteen cards of quillings not enumerated in the invoice, or stated at the time of entry—and a forfeiture of the whole package was required.

The defendant did not controvert the fact, but rested his defence upon the ground that the forfeiture accrued only where there was a design to defraud the revenue and that the additional articles having been put in by accident or mistake, the jury might exercise discretion in condemning the property. On the other hand, it was contended by the United States attorney, that the question of fact being admitted or proved, the positive directions of the law demanded the forfeiture, and that the remedy for a party innocent of fraudulent intention, is, a subsequent remission of the penalty in the mode established by law.

Judge Hopkinson reviewed at length the acts of congress bearing upon the question, and charged the jury, that by the law; the whole package was forfeited by reason of containing articles not mentioned in the invoice; and that neither the court nor the jury had any thing to do with the question whether the articles got into the package by mistake or accident, or the intention, fraudulent, or innocent with which they were put there. The verdict was accordingly in favor of the United States, and the package was condemned.

STEALING ONE'S OWN PROPERTY. From a London paper.—At the Manchester quarterly sessions, on Saturday, a man named Richard Harris, of respectable appearance, who had formerly kept a public house in Manchester, was indicted for having stolen, at Manchester, on the 24th of December last, one box, the property of Messrs. Pickford the carriers.

The case excited considerable interest, as it involved a rather singular and novel question—viz: whether the prisoner had or had not been guilty of stealing his own property? According to the evidence adduced, it appeared that on the above named day the prisoner called at the warehouse of Messrs. Pickford & Co. the well known carriers, and asked if they had a box for him, which he expected would be sent, addressed to him from Birmingham, by their conveyance? The porter of Messrs. Pickford, whom he questioned, told him that it had arrived, and was in the warehouse; but that he had better go into the clerk's office, and pay the carriage before the box was given to him. He accordingly went into the office, and asked one of the clerks what was the charge for carriage.

The clerk told him, and he went away without paying any thing; but he said that he would call again about it. In two or three days afterwards he again called at the office, and asked for the box, saying that he had brought the money to pay for the carriage. On searching for the box in the warehouse it was not to be found, and the prisoner appeared to be exceedingly enraged, declaring that he would bring an action at law against Messrs. Pickford for the value of the box and its contents. The clerks and warehousemen had a conversation on the subject, and after considering the circumstances of the prisoner's previous visit to the warehouse, together with fact of the box not being seen since that visit, they began to suspect that the prisoner himself must have taken it away. Messrs. Pickford in consequence applied to the magistrates, and obtained a warrant to search the prisoner's premises, which they did, and there found the identical box, emptied of its contents.

Evidence to the above effect having been adduced, the jury stopped the chairman as he was about to sum up, observing that they were quite satisfied with the facts of the case, but they wished to know from him whether it was "a felony for a man to steal his own goods?"

J. H. Norris, esq. the chairman, said that, under the circumstances, there could be no doubt that, if the prisoner was guilty, it would amount to felony.

The jury immediately returned a verdict of guilty.

The chairman, in passing sentence, said that the prisoner was a man of very considerable and acute intellect and had managed this robbery with a deal of tact. He was liable to be transported for life, but the court would not go that length. Still, however, considering the address he had displayed, they could not do less than transport him for fourteen years.

The prisoner, on hearing his sentence, burst into tears, and was taken down crying bitterly.

A MAN'S HOUSE HIS CASTLE. We notice, in the case of a trial in New York for assault and battery on the keeper of a drinking house, the court held that if a person is ordered out of another's house, he must go, whether he is right or wrong in any discussion which gives rise to the order. The owner can put him out, and is authorised to make use of as much force as may be necessary to force him from the premises. [U. S. Gaz.

A BORROWED HORSE. An action was lately decided in the supreme court of Rhode Island, before Judge Wild, in which William Newhall obtained a verdict against John Webster for the value of a horse which had been drowned about two years since. Webster had borrowed the horse from the plaintiff to go from the town of Fall River to Providence; on his return, and after he had crossed the river, the horse became restive, backed into the river, and was drowned. The jury awarded the plaintiff damages to the amount of $125.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 12—VOL. VIII. BALTIMORE, MAY 18, 1833. [VOL. XLIV. WHOLE No. 1,130.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

¶ There is nothing important, just now, to lay before our readers—but we have endeavored to give them an interesting and well-filled sheet. We intend, next week, to redeem our promise to publish the report of the minority of the committee of the house of representatives, on manufactures—and shall give it entire, by the aid of extra pages.

¶ The shreds of foreign news that we have would seem to shew the probability of some collision between Great Britain and France, on the one hand, and Russia on the other, as to the affairs of Turkey. The former will not agree that the latter shall take the sultan under the "protection?" of her army and navy. But sooner or later, unless Russia shall fall into pieces, because of her own weight and power, the possession by her, of Turkey in Europe, must be confidently expected.

¶ We had hoped that any further notice of that abominable affair, the assault on the president, by Mr. Randolph, at Alexandria—would not appear necessary; but a proceeding as abominable as the assault itself, renders it proper for us to add to the record. A base attempt is making to inflict a wound upon the national character, by representing that attack as a party matter; or, to render it a sorry tool for party to work with. One might almost think that certain miserables are pleased with the assault, because of furnishing matter to feed their scurrilous appetites upon. The exclusiveness of this party is such, that it would rather degrade the whole people of the United States, as it were, for the act of an individual—than permit them to have a common feeling on any subject affecting the national reputation: and these have forced a consideration of the merits of the case of Mr. Randolph, which ought to have had no sort of influence over the minds of men, with respect to his attack on the person of the president. We have laid aside several articles on this subject, and shall register them—but take no other part in the matter than that of a "faithful chronicler."

UNITED STATES BANK. The honest gentlemen who worthily obtained, through some incorruptible public officer at Washington, a copy of the president's message before it was delivered to congress, and, in honorable fairness, speculated in the stock of the bank of the United States, at New York—we have the pleasure to say, have been handsomely rewarded! It is probable that the \$80,000 which they so reputably pocketed by the "chivalric" proceeding just above stated, have been "nullified," three times over, by the confidence of the people in the bank. On Tuesday last 150,000 dollars of its stock was sold at 113 $\frac{1}{2}$ @ 113 7-8—probably to meet contracts for delivery. "The biters have been bitten."

MR. RANDOLPH attended the New Market races in Virginia, a few days since, and addressed the party at the Jockey Club dinner. The "Richmond Whig" says—"He trod the wine press of wrath, and, ranging through society, struck down moral and political offenders on the right and left, even as Achilles among the flying squadrons of Troy!"

The account says—"His speech was plentifully seasoned with appropriate anecdote, biting sarcasm, high compliment, and bold denunciation. Whilst chief justice Marshall, B. W. Leigh, Mr. Macon, and other distinguished individuals, received the tribute of his high-wrought praise, Daniel Webster, [!!!!] and the editor of the Richmond Enquirer, were completely "rowed up Salt river."

"His health was still so feeble as to compel him to address the company from his seat. He concluded by paying a merited eulogy to the character and talents of B. W. Leigh, and offered the following toast, which was received with general applause:

"Benjamin Watkins Leigh, for the next president of the United States, and John Marshall, chief justice thereof."

VOL. XLIV—Sig. 12.

VERMONT. At the third trial, H. Everett, esq. has been re-elected a member of congress from Vermont—though there were three candidates. But, at a third trial, a plurality elects.

MASSACHUSETTS. Second attempts have been made in the Boston, Norfolk, and Essex districts to elect members of congress, without success in either, because of having three or more candidates.

CONNECTICUT. The annual income of the school fund of this state, now nearly is, and soon will be, one dollar per head for every child educated.

NEW YORK. A wonderful excitement prevails in this city on account of the location of the new custom house—and the president of the United States and secretary of the treasury are much harassed on the subject. The merchants insist that their convenience ought to be consulted!—but the property-holders, up-town, would have the site of the building a mile or so from the present chief seat of business. There have been many meetings and missions on this subject.

Some have proposed to offer the City Hall and Park to the United States!—but the other party, we believe, has not yet offered the Battery! The government, however, would only give 500,000 dollars for the City Hall and a large slice of the Park, and so that project was voted down. ¶ Sell the Park?!

The great Erie canal aqueduct over the Genesee river, at Rochester, is considered in danger of falling. The event, should it occur, would occasion the double loss of the expense of reconstruction and a suspension of the navigation of the canal.

THE ERIE CANAL. The first canal boat from Albany (the present season) arrived at Buffalo on the 27th April; and in the week ending May 1, there arrived at that port six steamboats, eight schooners, and ten sloops, laden with the products of the west.

LAKE ERIE. There are twelve steamboats on our side of this lake—some of which are large and beautiful, and one building; there are also many schooners. A trip to "Mackinaw," or the "pond" in which we might "souse Britain's island whole," is now—as nothing.

CANAL TOLLS, &c. The returns received at the comptroller's office show that the amount of tolls collected on all the canals of the state, from the 22d to the 30th of April, was ninety-three thousand and sixteen dollars: averaging $11,626 for each day. The receipts, notwithstanding the diminished rates of toll, have surpassed those for the same number of days after the opening of the canals, in any former year.

The first trip on the Mohawk and Hudson rail road yesterday morning, the engine brought over ten cars, with about 140 passengers—the largest number that has passed over at any one trip this season.

There was weighed at the Albany weighlock, on the 3d inst. 2,110,882 lbs. merchandise, exclusive of 19 empty boats, the heaviest day's freight ever weighed at that lock.

[Albany Argus.]

LAKE ERIE DAMMED BY ICE. We learn that this unprecedented event has actually occurred, and that the mouth of the Niagara river between Fort Erie and Buffalo, is literally jammed or wedged with ice which has floated down the lake; and that the waters of the lake have, in consequence, risen several feet, while the waters of the river have, from the same cause, fallen so low that numerous rocks and islands, whose faces have never before seen the light of heaven, have made their appearance in the river. The low grounds about Buffalo are stated to be inundated, and much damage has been done to property in consequence. In confirmation of the above, we have just heard that the waters of the Chippewa creek, are lowered many feet; the Adelaide steamer is lying "high and dry," and the mills of Clark and Street have no water to keep them in operation.

[York Courier.]

NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA. We see it stated that the distance between these cities, by a straight line, is about 74 miles; as travelled by the Camden and Amboy rail-road and steamboats 94 miles; as by the Trenton rail road and steamboats only 84½ miles. The latter is now making, or will soon be commenced and rapidly finished.

NEW JERSEY. It is estimated that the water power of the Delaware river, at Trenton, as improved by a company, is equal to that of from 300 to 500 horses. It is a capital location—if manufactures are permitted to prosper, communicating both with Philadelphia and New York, by water-carriage, and in a healthy and fertile neighborhood.

PHILADELPHIA. Stocks valued at 500,000 dollars are about to be set aside to improve the eastern front of this city, according to the will of the late Stephen Girard.

The various donations received by the committee for the relief of the Cape de Verd sufferers, amounted to $5,236 20.

The present amount of subscriptions received for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire at Cumberland, Md. is between 2,500 and 3,000 dollars.

THE PHILADELPHIA EXCHANGE is in such a state of forward preparation that we are informed the post office will be established there about the first of June. The apartments allotted to the office are in the basement story, on the Dock street flank of the building; and are preparing with the lobbies adjoining the business room. The room is 74 by 35 feet, containing three compartments, which are severally appropriated for the postmaster and his clerks.

The approaches to the post office are by three different portals, with wide and spacious lobbies leading from east to west—and which are to be flagged with marble laid on the arches of the basement story.

A coffee room or restaurant will be established on the Third street front of the building, communicating with the western lobby of the post office by means of two large folding doors.

[Phil. Cen.]

RICHMOND. From the Whig. The foundation of an immense flour mill, is now being laid by Mr. P. J. Chevalle, adjoining his lumber house at the foot of the Basin, to replace the Gallego mills, lately destroyed by fire; and it is contemplated also to erect a cotton factory immediately below it, the machinery to be propelled by the same water that will be required for the flour mill—the fall being over thirty feet, after the water leaves the latter. We shall thus have the unseemly ravine, which has hitherto been a nuisance, converted to a useful purpose, and the farmers will lose only for one season the market for over 200,000 bushels of wheat, which were ground by the late, and will be by the new mill.

GEORGIA. A convention is sitting in this state to reduce and equalize the state representation. Mr. Wayne has been chosen president—for Mr. Wayne 151, William H. Crawford 88, scattering 9. The political character of the body may be gathered from this election. It is against nullification—and so forth.

ALABAMA. We have the first report to the stockholders of the Tusculum rail road, now making. It is to extend round the Muscle Shoal Falls of Tennessee (of 142 feet) and is in length 45 miles. From thence there is an uninterrupted water navigation to New Orleans—about 2,200 miles. The work seems to be going on with both prudence and spirit.

SOUTHERN DISTRESS. Choice cotton. We have before us (says the Mobile Register) samples of general Chambers' cotton, which brought the extraordinary price of 12½c. It was selected from his crop, and in point of color, cleanliness, staple and handling, (as it is termed by growers), is equal to any we remember to have seen. The price paid for this beautiful cotton should serve as an encouragement to the planters to bestow due attention on preparing their crops for market. Choice cottons like these will always command buyers, at rates sufficiently above the market to repay any expense in its preparation.

What a comment upon nullification! Surely the good people of Alabama could not wish better times. They will yet bless their stars, and eschew the Palmetto.

[N. Y. Com. Adv.]

THE MAIL. Ninety-nine persons in a hundred, when they speak, or hear others speak, of the mail, think it only a bag the size of a school boy's satchel, made to carry letters from one place to another. How they would stare to see three leathern portmanteaus and twelve canvass bags, each of which might contain two or three bushels, and be told that was the mail—Uncle Sam's satchel. They would not believe it. Yet such is the fact at New York, and proportionably so at other cities. The mail that left New York for the south on the 3d instant, carried letters, newspapers, &c. amounting in weight to more than a ton and a half, and it was called a light day at the office.

[Boston Transcript.]

THE MAILS. From the Mobile Advertiser of April 17. The failure of all the mails must plead our excuse for the barrenness of our columns to-day.

We have no news from New York later than the 28th ultimo, being 19 days—5 mails due. From Charleston, our latest dates are to the 2d instant.

No eastern mail arrived this day—five due!!

Up to the time of our sheet going to press, there were no less than five daily mails due from New Orleans!!!! a distance (we believe) of not more than 150 miles, and but thirty miles of that distance land carriage, the rest good steamboat navigation.

TRANSPORTATION. The Cleveland paper says—The carrying trade between Philadelphia and Pittsburgh has been somewhat reduced the present season. All heavy country produce is carried from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia at 75 cents per 100 lbs. which reduces the transportation of flour to about $1 63 per barrel. This is probably the lowest price of transporting produce from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia, and is a higher price than is paid for the transportation of flour from the Scioto to New York, by way of lake Erie.

Only ten years ago flour could be transported from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia at a cheaper rate than it could be brought from Chillicothe to Cleveland, 600 miles distant from New York.

THE FAR WEST. Goods have been received at St. Louis in 15 days after they left Baltimore—fifteen days! This operation will yet be performed in about half the time, the rail road to the Ohio being finished.

BRITISH "FREE TRADE" EXPORTATIONS. It is positively stated in the New York papers, that the parish officers of Middlesex and Surry, having resolved to rid themselves of small thieves, vagrants, and paupers, as much as possible, have taken up several ships at London for the purpose of spewing them into the cities of the United States. New York and Baltimore have been most favored with such cargoes of miserable beings, but it is now said that Boston and Providence will be chiefly honored with present exportations. We hope that there is authority in the corporations of those cities to send back these British "wares," or to tax them so heavily that they must be entered for exportation, only, like coarse British cotton goods. We are happy to believe that there is not cruelty and rascality enough in any public officers of the United States, to export cargoes of old and worn-out negroes to England; but, and except on that account, we should like to ascertain, by experiment, another proof of what British "free trade" is, by casting a few thousands of such "surplus population" into London.

BRITISH TAXES. House of commons. Mr. Robinson rose to make a motion to the following effect: "that a select committee be appointed to consider and revise our existing taxation, with a view to the repeal of those hurthens which pressed most heavily upon productive industry, and to substitute an equitable tax on property in lieu thereof." As this motion has been for the present lost, and as we are most sadly pressed for space, we shall despatch the debate as briefly as possible, as we have no doubt that the necessity for a property tax will very soon be forced upon ministers by the irresistible press of circumstances. Mr. Robinson maintained at considerable length, that the taxes, as now imposed, were of ruinously unequal operation; that the working classes could no longer bear them; and that their continuation would be of the most disastrous consequence to the best interests of the nation. The increase of the poor rates, the progress of crime, and the reductions in the savings' bank deposits, prove how grievously the working classes had been affected. He therefore urged on the house, before the financial statements were brought forward, to express its opinion, not as to the reduction of taxation, but as to the expediency of ascertaining whether it could not be differently and less injuriously imposed by means of a property tax. Mr. Warburton seconded the motion. After considerable discussion, the government not acceding to the motion, wishing to have the opportunity of making the financial statement, and not desiring to be pledged as to the tax named, the motion was negatived on a division. The numbers were 155 ayes, and 221 noes.

[London paper.]

[The statement of Mr. Robinson shews how England "squeezes the orange"—and the export of paupers to the United States shews how the skin is presented to us.]

LUNATICS IN ENGLAND. By a return recently made to parliament, it appears that the total number of lunatics under the care of the lord chancellor is 393. The annual amount allowed for their care and maintenance is £134,999 17s. 2d. and the estimate of the rents and profits of their estates, real and personal, £243,413 2s. 3d.

[What a vast amount of wealth is thus vested—the aggregate revenue or profits of the estates of 393 persons is about 1,200,000 dollars—or an average of 3,000 dollars each.]

NEW BISHOPS. Letters from Rome announce that the pope has appointed the right reverend Dr. Purcell (now president of the college of Mount St. Mary's, Emmittsburgh, Maryland, to the vacant bishopric of Cincinnati, and the right reverend Frederick Rese (late vicar-apostolic of the diocese of Cincinnati) to the new see of Detroit in the Michigan territory.

REFORM. We have just received a letter from an old correspondent, saying, that he would "to-morrow" be removed from a little office which he held, because he had refused a present support to a certain individual for the NEXT presidency of the United States! This is looking a-head—"with a vengeance!"

DELAWARE BREAKWATER. We learn from the Philadelphia Commercial Herald, that upwards of 130,000 tons of stone have been contracted for, to be delivered at the Delaware breakwater during the present season. The whole length of the foundation on which deposits of stone had been made at the close of last autumn, was 1,833 feet (something more than a third of a mile), of which 1,419 feet had been raised 3½ feet above the level of low water, and 474 feet to its destined height. The ice breaker had been enlarged during the season to an extent of 575 feet in length by 60 in breadth, and 151 feet had been brought up nearly to the height contemplated. The expenditures upon this work, for several years past, have amounted to full $200,000 per annum. The whole cost was estimated by the commissioners at $2,216,870. The amount hitherto expended is not far from $1,000,000. Two or three years more will be required, in order to carry the work to its completion. When finished according to the original plan, it will afford a harbor sufficiently capacious for the anchorage of upwards of 60 vessels. "The water surface will comprise an area of one mile square, having a depth at low water of from 3 to 6 fathoms, between the pitch of the cape and the western extremity of the ice-breaker. This space will be completely secured from all gales from the north-east and north-west, these being the only points of attack from which there has been a necessity in the plan of the work to secure and fortify." There is but one breakwater in the world which can claim a comparison with it, viz: that at Plymouth, England, the length of which is about a mile. Its cost was upwards of £1,000,000 sterling, and the quantity of stone employed in its construction, about 2,000,000 tons.

MISSOURI LEAD MINES. Official information has been received by the superintendent of the United States' lead mines, at Galena, that the lead mines on the west bank of the Mississippi, recently ceded by the Sac and Fox Indians, will be opened for lease on the first day of June next.

A writer in the Galenian states that new and valuable discoveries of lead ore have been made upon the east bank of the Mississippi river, between the Platte and Grant rivers, in Iowa county, M. T. The ore is said to be of the best quality, found in large bodies, and over an extensive tract of the country. Among the most valuable discoveries is a horizontal cave, the entrance of which is about 150 feet above the level of the river. It is from two to four feet wide, and from six to nine feet high. From this cave, about 400,000 pounds of lead ore have been taken with little labor, and the operation was still continued. The land is of the best quality, and covered with timber. A town, called Van Buren, (which name has also been given to the mines and cave adjacent), has been laid out, and that part of the country is rapidly increasing in population. [St. Louis Rep.]

CONVENTION OF FREE PERSONS OF COLOR. Delegates of color have been selected from most of the states in the union, to assemble next month in Philadelphia. Their avowed object is to devise means to elevate the character and improve the condition of the colored population in this country, and to fix upon a suitable place whither they may emigrate, and where they will no longer endure the depressing inferiority to which, so long as they dwell among the whites, they must always be subjected. It is understood that the delegates are generally, if not altogether, opposed to the colonization society—averse to going to Liberia—and that they have it in contemplation to plant a colony in the Texas.

These prejudices entertained by them against removing to Liberia, have been created and fostered, as is well known, by the deluded advocates of immediate emancipation. Misguided fanatics often occasion more mischief than avowed infidels, for their honesty of purpose may sometimes give them influence, when the personal character of the latter might prove an antidote to the perversity of their doctrines. We cannot but regard these persons as the greatest foes to the best interests of the African race. Their number, however, is few, and though the noise they make is great, their influence is small. Yet if it can be clearly shown that a settlement in the Texas would answer the purposes of the blacks, we would not lay a straw in their path. We are quite certain, however, that they will find obstacles in their way, much more difficult to overcome than a settlement in Liberia. [N. Y. Com.]

LABEL CASE. New York court of sessions—the people versus Edwin Crosswell, [editor of the Albany Argus]. This cause being called on, Mr. Hoyt, in behalf of the defendant, presented the following paper to the court and moved that it be filed:

Edwin Crosswell ads. the people, &c.—In reference to the publications charged in the indictment, Mr. Crosswell, the defendant, says that the articles were published on the strength of expressions said to have been made by Mr. Blunt, and repeated to Mr. Crosswell by responsible persons, and which Mr. Crosswell at the time believed to be correct. He however afterwards became satisfied that the information on which the articles were founded was erroneous, and so stated in his paper. Mr. Crosswell is advised that in law these publications are libellous; and as he is desirous to exonerate Mr. Blunt in the fullest manner from the imputations contained therein, he requests permission to withdraw his former plea of not guilty, and in lieu thereof he freely admits the publications charged, and repeats that he is satisfied that they were erroneous in point of fact, and unjust towards Mr. Blunt.

Mr. Blunt then rose and stated that he had not brought the prosecution from any personal feeling, but solely for convincing the conductors of the public press that private character was protected by the laws of the land. So far as he was personally concerned, he was entirely satisfied by the submission of the defendant, and hoped the court would acquiesce in the motion which the district attorney would make. Mr. Hoffman then moved that a nolle prosequi be entered, and the same was ordered accordingly.

MUSK IN CHOLERA. From the "New Monthly Magazine," published in London. "Among other matters resorted to by the faculty to stay the progress of this terrible disease, one has been published of so singular a character, that we do not hesitate to extract the statement into our columns. It is contained in a letter from Mr. Richard Laming, of No. 48 Finsbury square, a district in which the ravages of the plague have been very great. Mr. Laming says—

"I have lately employed musk in several cases of cholera with a success so uniform and decisive, as to make its introduction desirable, without loss of time to the notice of the whole profession, &c.

"The salutary influence of the first dose of musk will be found to become manifest by greatly mitigating, in a very few minutes, and in many cases, by effectually removing the cramps, the purging and the vomiting. My plan has been to give at once fifteen grains, rubbed in a draught with a lump of sugar and a wine glass full of cold water; and I am justified in reporting that this first step, if taken promptly, will scarcely ever fail to arrest the progress of the disease, as to leave the patient to easy and ordinary convalescence.

"So evident is the action of musk in cholera, that the practitioner will experience no difficulty in determining whether he need repeat its exhibition, or whether, having subdued the immediate cause of the disease by the first dose, he should direct his attention to the removal of its consequences by the ordinary means."

BRIEF NOTICES.

Sam'l Sayre, esq. his wife and servant, were lately found murdered in their house near Morristown, New Jersey; and the house was also plundered. The circumstances belonging to this affair are horrible. One person, a French or Swiss laborer, who was lately hired to Mr. Sayre, was, with seeming certainty, the sole author of these proceedings. He had been taken, and some of the property stolen was found upon him.

The trial of the rev. Mr. Avery for the murder of a young girl, who is supposed to have been seduced by him, is going on at Newport, R. I. and excites a high degree of interest.

The secretary of the navy was at Pensacola on the 29th April, and, after inspecting the navy yard, &c. proceeded eastward.

A disease has broken out at New Orleans, which, if not the cholera, bears much of the character of that fearful disease—and had already caused many deaths.

There has been an affray, with fists and sticks and stones, between a party of Georgians and a party of Cherokees, near Scudder's in Forsyth county, Geo. in which there were many black eyes and some broken bones. The quarrel probably originated about the gold mines at that place.

The worthy veteran of the press, Joseph Gales, esq. of Raleigh, N. C. has retired from the editorship of the "Register," which will be continued by his son, Mr. W. R. Gales. Mr. G. sen. is about to remove to Washington. On the 11th inst. the citizens of Raleigh gave him a public dinner, at which gov. Swain presided. Among the guests was chief justice Marshall. The compliment so well deserved, was happily given.

It is now so arranged by the steamboat lines, that one continuous journey may be made from Philadelphia to Norfolk, in 31 hours.

Part of the cargo of a ship, which has cleared at Boston for Calcutta, consists of 200 tons of ice.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

It is said that the duke of Orleans was about to visit London. In the house of lords on the 1st of April, lord Suffield presented a petition from Oldham, for the "immediate and unconditional abolition of slavery in the West Indies;" and petitions from Southampton, Ennisceorthy, Londonderry and Newtown, for the immediate abolition of slavery. His lordship gave an explanation of the meaning he attached to the words, "immediate and unconditional."

Lord Ellenborough quoted Johnson's dictionary, and ascertained that "immediate" meant "instant," and that there was no such word in the English language as "unconditional," the word was "unconditionable."

After a few remarks from lord Suffield, Earl Grey expressed a hope, that as important business was pending, an immediate end might be put to this discussion, and that every noble lord would understand what he meant by "immediate." (Cheers and laughter.) His wish was that emancipation should be as speedily as it could be rendered safe.

A bill has passed the house of commons by a majority of 11, in which flogging in the army is abolished, except for open mutiny, thieving and drunkenness on guard.

The Irish church bill meets with a warm opposition. The priests are loath to give up their fat things, and the nobles and others the power of providing for their younger sons and other relatives.

The funds experienced a decline of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on news being received that a Russian army had passed the Pruthi.

The Irish enforcing bill finally passed on the 1st April, without much opposition—as modified in the house of commons. The Irish church bill is regarded as a remedial measure; and, if passed, is expected to "nullify" the operation of the first named bill, by quieting the Irish people. It may, for a moment—and such was the effect of the Roman Catholic relief bill. But the causes of distress in Ireland lie much deeper than in these things. Nor would a repeal of the union relieve them.

FRANCE.

A large squadron was assembling and fitting at Toulon, and to be held ready to sail at a moment's warning. Troops were also collecting at Toulon.

Joseph Bonaparte has contributed a rich decoration of the legion of honor, set in diamonds, which was worn by Napoleon during the campaign of Ansterlitz, &c. with 600 francs, for the relief of certain imprisoned patriots, a meeting concerning whom was to be held at Paris, over which "the illustrious friend of Washington" (Lafayette), was to preside.

Louis Bonaparte has made a contribution for the relief of M. Lafitte, in a very handsome manner. The subscription for M. L. amounted to upwards of 300,000 francs.

General Guilleminot is definitively nominated governor of Algiers.

TURKEY AND EGYPT.

Mehemet Ali has rejected the propositions made by France on the subject of the war between himself and the porte. This has created much sensation; and, being thought to render the intervention of Russia all but certain, is expected to produce a bad understanding between that power, on the one hand, and France and England on the other. Many things are stated which shew that the latter will not quietly permit the occupation of Turkey by Russia.

A report was current that a large body of Russians had already crossed the Danube—and the Russian (Black sea) fleet remained near Constantinople.

Smyrna was yet in quiet possession of the Egyptians, and their fleet was cruising before that port. Ibrahim's head quarters were at Koniah. Constantinople suffers much from the loss of a communication with Smyrna.

There was a report that the French ambassador at Constantinople was about to demand his passports.

PORTUGAL.

There were frequent skirmishes at Oporto between the troops of the contending brothers—but nothing of a decisive character is mentioned as having happened.

EAST INDIES.

A second great failure has taken place at Calcutta. The house of McIntosh & Co. are said to have stopped for three or four millions sterling.

PRUSSIA.

The king has lately made an important concession to his subjects. He has given permission to public functionaries of a very advanced age, to appear at court in pantaloons instead of state breeches!

GREECE.

This new kingdom has been divided into three principal sections, viz. the Morea, Continental Greece, and the Islands. Plapontas, one of the three commissioners sent to congratulate king Otho at the Bavarian court, has been rewarded by the appointment of governor of the first; Colloitti of the second; and Zami of the third. Colocotroni and his partizans, possessing republican opinions, have been put aside.

*By an arrival at Boston we have the following:

The new governor [Ibrahim's] met with no resistance in the exercise of his authority until the 5th March, when a courier arrived from Constantinople, bringing intelligence that the new French ambassador at that court had declared it to be the intention of France to join with Russia in support of the sultan's authority. In consequence of this information, the consuls of those powers refused to acknowledge the new governor of Smyrna, and were making preparations to take down the flag staffs, when the governor thought proper to resign his post to the former occupant under the sultan. Ibrahim's governor was seized and thrown into prison, until he should restore the sums taken from the treasury during his administration. Here seemed to end the Egyptian authority. Ibrahim's army remained encamped near Smyrna, but when he is made acquainted with the determination of the combined forces, he will probably desist from any further attempt to carry his designs against Smyrna and Constantinople into effect.

ONE DAY LATER.

Some changes have taken place in the British ministry—E. J. Stanley has been appointed secretary of state for the war department and the colonies, vice viscount Goderich, resigned; sir John Cam Hobhouse secretary of state, for Ireland; Mr. Ellice secretary at war; and viscount Goderich lord privy seal, vice the earl of Durham, resigned.

Many additional petitions had been received for the immediate abolition of negro slavery; and others to relieve dissenters from payments for the repair of churches, and "the means of carrying on worship in them, from which they derived no benefit."

The accounts from Holland are called "warlike." The whole of the Dutch army, it is said, were advancing to the frontiers. It would seem that the king had been encouraged by Russia and Prussia. It may be so—or, it may not be so!—as may be generally said of Dutch or Belgian news.

There was a report that 6,000 Russians had disembarked near Constantinople. (Doubted).

The (London) Albion says—We understand that orders have been given to equip, with the utmost dispatch, a fleet for the Mediterranean. It is now well understood at the admiralty, that the Russian ships are not disposed to leave Constantinople, even with a favorable wind.

The agents of Don Miguel have succeeded in raising a loan of £100,000 for him, in London.

The case of the duchess of Berri excites much attention in Paris—and reports of her illness and death have been circulated; but the day of deliverance is said to be close at hand! Four physicians were waiting upon her.

The British revenue for the quarter ending 5th April, shews a decrease of £92,420, as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year. The excise, which is called "the gauge of the people's comfort," fell short in £38,645.

The price of the stock of the bank of England had declined $\frac{8}{4}$ per cent. though the precise terms on which its charter would be renewed were yet unknown.

COBBETT AND PAINE.

The following which happened in the British house of commons on the 22nd March, we supposed had about as much effect on Mr. Cobbett's feelings, as the falling of a drop of water on a duck's back is annoying to him!

A number of petitions were presented for the better observance of the Sabbath, which Mr. Cobbett condemned as originating in pounds, shillings and pence feelings, and not in a respect for the gospel. In observing on one petition presented in favor of the emancipation of the Jews, the same hon. member said that the presenter of the petition (Mr. E. J. Stanley) had declared that the Jews were one of the most industrious classes of his majesty's subjects. Now, he would ask the hon. member whether he could produce a Jew who ever dug or went to plough, or made his own shoes or coat; or who ever did any thing except get money from the pockets of the people? Mr. E. J. Stanley, in reply, said that as the hon. member had once condemned Paine as a blasphemer, and yet afterwards assisted at his apotheosis, it was to be hoped that he (Mr. C.) would exhibit a similar change of opinion with regard to the Jews.

Mr. Cobbett denied that he had ever held up Mr. Paine as a blasphemer. He had always, however, drawn a distinction between Mr. Paine's political and religious opinions. With respect to his bringing Mr. Paine's bones to England, all he should say was, that in doing so he considered he was only doing his duty, out of the respect to his writings on the subject of paper money; which, if they had been attended to, and his advice followed, would have prevented the present difficulty of dealing with the currency.

Mr. E. J. Stanley said, that after what had fallen from the hon. member for Oldham, he must be allowed to justify himself by reading the very words of the publication of the hon. member himself: "In no part of the Age of Reason does Paine speak in terms of impious irreverence of God; he praises God, and calls upon his name, and that too, in a strain of eloquence the equal of which I have never heard in any sermon." Vol. 25, p. 725. "The Age of Reason is as despicable as its author. The wretch has all his life been employed in leading fools astray from their duty. His religion is of a piece with his politics, the one inculcates the right of revolting against government, the other against God." Vol. 3, p. 389. "Though Thomas Paine was no Christian, he was no blasphemer. He offers no indignity to God himself." Vol. 35, p. 735. "Paine was a cruel, treacherous and blaspheming ruffian; he was a traitor, and a traitor is the foulest fiend on earth." Vol. 4.

This little expose is so characteristic of Cobbett that we have transcribed it, although we have repeatedly published these and a hundred other equally palpable contradictions. There is a little book called the "Beauties of Cobbett, or blowing hot and cold," entirely filled with his assertions and contradictions, as palpable as that here exposed respecting Thomas Paine.

The speaker concluded, we presume, that Cobbett had received a regular floorer, and interfered to prevent Mr. Stanley pummeling a fallen man. The right hon. member, he said, had now answered the hon. member for Oldham, and it would be quite out of order for him to proceed.

And there is a general excess in the value exported in the year 1832, over 1831, of two millions of dollars. We use round numbers.

The value of the products of the sea has increased in the sum of (say) 650,000 dollars—in the latter year.

The value of the products of the forest has a little increased, and so has the value of the product of animals.

The value of vegetable food has decreased more than 5,500,000—but the value of cotton and tobacco has increased in the sum of 7,500,000 dollars.

Under the head of manufactures are included gold and silver coin. The general aggregate, in 1832, is about 800,000 less than in 1831; but in the sum for 1831 was included 2,058,474 dollars in gold and silver coin, and in 1832, only 1,410,941 dollars—or 650,000 less. So that the value of manufactures exported (in the common use of the word) was nearly the same in both years.

Now, if the export of domestic productions has any thing to do with the prosperity of particular sections of country, it will appear, that the cotton and tobacco planters have had no reason to complain of the tariff! They added 25 per cent. to the value of their exports—while the farming interest, or producers of bread-stuffs and meats, lost 33 per cent. on the value of their exports!

We do not build much on these facts! We know that they are “as a drop in the bucket” to the value of the internal commerce of the United States—things only of “moonshine;” but it may be that we shall hold a “talk” about them with “the forty-bale theory philosophers,” and others, who seem to think that all value is confined to imports and exports!—that a bale of cotton, sold at Boston, for four eagles, is not worth as much as another bale sold at Liverpool for the same weight of gold! and that, if the four eagles laid out in cotton, are made worth twelve eagles at Boston, it is better to pay twelve eagles for the cloth at Liverpool than its worth; though into the value, at Liverpool, not one cent’s worth of American bread or meat enters; whereas at Boston the home made cloth represents four eagles’ worth of our bread and meat, just as certainly as it represents four eagles worth of our raw cotton. Indeed, in almost every important instance, bread and meat are the materials of chief value, used in manufactures.

BLACK HAWK, &c.

From the Western Shield.

The editor of the “Western Shield” lately paid a visit to the “wolves of Missouri.” In his last he gives a portrait of Black Hawk, and the warriors that are now with him at Fortress Monroe. He saw them first at Jefferson Barracks, Missouri, and afterwards came passenger in the same boat with them. Speaking of the first impression which they made on his mind, he says:

“We were immediately struck with admiration at the gigantic and symmetrical figures of most of the warriors, who seemed, as they reclined in native ease and gracefulness, with their half naked bodies exposed to view, rather like statues from some master hand, than like beings of a race whom we had heard characterised as degenerate and debased. We extended our hands which they rose to grasp, and to our question “how d’ye do?” they responded in the same words, accompanying them with a hearty shake. After the salutations were over, we had leisure to observe more closely the appearances of these sons of nature; they were clad in leggings and moccasins of buckskin, and wore blankets which were thrown around them in the manner of the Roman toga, so as to leave their right arms bare; when reclining or lying down, they generally allowed their blankets to fall from them. The youngest among them were painted on their necks, with a bright vermilion color, and had their faces transversely streaked with alternate red and black stripes. From their bodies and from their faces and eyebrows, they pluck out the hair with the most assiduous care; they also shave, or pull it out from their heads, with the exception of a tuft of about three fingers width, extending from between the forehead and crown to the back of the head, this they sometimes plait into a queue on the crown, and cut the edges of it down to an inch in length, and plaster it with vermilion which keeps it erect and gives it the appearance of a cock’s comb. The time and great care bestowed by them at their toilet, would put the foppery of a civilized man completely to the blush; the point of a single hair emerging from their eyebrows, or the slightest pimple visible upon their face, awakens their anxious solicitude, and they proceed to eradicate, or erase it with all possible despatch.”

He says that the whole of them were truly interesting, and had “his (Jack the eldest son of Black Hawk) countenance not been wanting in that peculiar expression which emanates from a cultivated intellect and which education alone can give, we could have looked upon him as the living personification of our beau ideal of manly beauty.”

The article is too lengthy for insertion in our paper entire. The brief biographical sketch which he has given of each of those individuals, each of whom has become distinguished by their exploits last summer in the Indian war, although somewhat indefinite, will prove of some interest to those who are aware of, and are familiar with, the transactions of that bloody and unprofitable campaign; and from his intimacy and the length of time he was in their neighborhood and company, it is to be expected that he should know as much if not more, about their individual histories as most persons—and as, moreover, it is his vocation to “gather news from all nations,” upon all subjects, it is presumable at least that he did not neglect to “store well his mind” with the information thus fortunately thrown, as it were, in his way. We give one or two more extracts.

“Mack-a-tama-sie-ac-ac, or Black Hawk, is apparently 50 years of age, about 5 feet 8 or 9 inches high, with rather broad shoulders, he has a low retreating forehead, sharp nose, somewhat hooked, chin slightly receding, cheeks a little hollow, and eyes of a dark hazel color; his vision is impaired and he occasionally wears spectacles. The expression of his countenance is benevolent with a shade of sorrow in it. In his manner he is in general reserved and thoughtful, but sometimes appears cheerful and conversant with animation. He wears at his side the skin of the bird from which he is named, and uses its long feathers as a fan.

He is not an hereditary, but a warrior chief, who by superior prowess and skill has arisen to a power and influence over his nation, not exceeded by any other of his tribe. He was described to us by persons who have known him for years, as a man of amiable disposition, kind in heart, and of strict integrity. He is attended by his second son, Nase-suck, or the Thunder-cloud, who bears a strong resemblance to his brother Jack, both in feature and in form, but is far from being so handsome. O pec-kee-sheek, or the Prophet, is aged about 45, he is upwards of six feet high, remarkably stout built and rather inclining to fatness. He wears his hair long all over his head, and has mustaches on his upper lip, his face is fuller and his nose straighter than his companions, his forehead is low, and his eyes are sunken deep beneath his brows, which close over them in a continual frown. Ferocity is strongly marked in his countenance, mingled with an expression of wiliness and cunning, which when he smiles seems predominant. He carries with him a pipe a yard in length, the stem ornamented with the neck feathers of a duck, and heads and ribbons of various colors, in the centre is attached a fan of feathers, neatly wrought together.

Naa-Pope, or Broth, the brother of the Prophet, and some years his junior, resembles him in height and figure, though he is not so robust, and his face is more sharp; in wickedness of expression they are par nobile frater. We were informed that when Mr. Catlin, the artist, was about taking the portrait of Naa-Pope, he seized the ball and chain that were fastened to his leg, and raising them on high, exclaimed with a look of scorn, “make me so, and show me to the great father.” On Mr. C.’s refusing to paint him as he wished, he kept varying his countenance with grimaces, to prevent him from catching a likeness. Powee-sheek, or Strawberry, is the only Fox among them, the rest being all Sacs. He is the son of the chief Epanose; his parents dying while he was an infant, he was adopted by Naa-Pope; he is nineteen years of age, tall and slender, with a remarkably frank and good humored expression, he seems vain and very fond of dress; he wears, suspended from his neck by thongs, a kind of breast-plate made of leather, studded with brass; it is of an oval shape, a little larger than a man’s hand, and is the badge of his nobility, and of his bravery in battle.

Po-ma-hoe, or fast-swimming-fish, is a short, thick-set, good natured old brave, who bears his misfortunes with a philosophy worthy of the ancients."

INDIAN DISTURBANCES.

From the St. Louis Times, of April 13.

We regret that the public mind is again excited, by the unfounded reports concerning the Indians. There are some who wish to keep up an excitement on this subject, for the purpose of preventing the lead region from being overrun with miners. It is very probable that the present competition among the miners will be injurious to those concerned—and especially so, if it be increased. But we care more for the general interests of the country, than for the progress of a particular branch of industry. We think, however, that the truth will, in the long run, promote the public welfare to a far greater extent, than the circulation of error. If it be a fact that the Indians are determined to fight, preparations should be made for the defence of the frontiers. But if they are peaceably disposed; if their situation is such as to render it almost impossible for them to commence a war, why should emigration to the country be checked, and general prosperity retarded for the benefit of a few? It is at all times, possible to surmount little difficulties until they become of importance.

The president was informed, long before the war of last summer, that the Indians could be peaceably removed from the east to the west side of the Mississippi, for the sum of 6 or $8,000. He was told in the presence of a member of congress that the inquiry had been made by a person competent to judge, and that the fact of their willingness to go, had been ascertained. The secretary at war also was made acquainted with the same important truth. No attempt was made to investigate whether the president and secretary had been correctly informed. By the late appropriation bill six hundred and thirty thousand dollars were applied to the payment of the Illinois militia for serving against Black Hawk and his party! Here is economy! We pass by the other expenses direct and incidental, which were indeed heavy, and (in the spirit of those who cherish and foster, and aggravate private disturbances so as to create a war) we also pass by the great sacrifice of human life, and the cruelties practised upon those who have only weakness and ignorance with which to contend against power and knowledge. We pass by all this as nothing that the administration may have full scope to boast of its rigid economy and its extensive humanity.

We know that the principal Potawatomi chiefs, who control their nation, are anxious to cultivate all the relations of peace. We know that when they were hunting on grounds which belonged to them for that purpose, by treaty (if treaties may be regarded as good for any but the strong) they were forbidden thus to supply their perishing families with their ordinary food—and we know, that in order to continue friendly to the government, at the request of their chiefs they retired, and suffered much, having felt the universal scarcity of crops the previous season. We are persuaded that the Winnebagoes are, in every way, solicitous to live undisturbed without trespassing on the rights of others. The proofs are ample. As to the Sacs and Foxes, did not Keokuc and his principal men come down to St. Louis a few days ago, offering assurances of peace—pledging that neither Black Hawk nor any one else should trouble the whites? Keokuc is known for the observance of his word—his strict adherence at all times to the truth. Yet still we hear that the Sacs and Foxes, the Winnebagoes and Potawatomis are determined to fight! However, notwithstanding the above related facts, a war may be kindled, and a majority of the people may be made to believe that the United States is not the aggressing party!

LEGAL CASES.

CASE OF A RUNAWAY SLAVE. An important trial was recently held in the United States district court at Philadelphia, before judges Baldwin and Hopkinson, in which were involved some interesting questions touching runaway slaves. The case is reported in the Pennsylvania of Saturday.

It arose out of the seizure, in 1822, of a runaway slave in the state of Pennsylvania, by his owner from New Jersey, without a warrant. The owner took the runaway by force from his place of service, and had put him in a wagon, when the person in whose service the slave was at the time employed, with the assistance of his neighbors, assaulted the owner (Mr. C. Johnson) and his party, released the slave, and after having wounded Mr. J. seriously in the scuffle, took him and his friends prisoners to jail, and had him indicted for felony before the county court, at which he was tried and acquitted.

The present suit was brought under the act of congress by Mr. Johnson, against one Kindermine, with whom the runaway was residing, and who had been active in the attacks. The damages were laid at $10,000.

Judge Baldwin charged decidedly in favor of the plaintiff, and his remarks are quoted as "a striking commentary upon the recklessness of those who assert that the north is interfering with the peculiar property of the south." He expressly directed the jury "that a master has the right of arresting his slave, without a warrant, and carrying him before any competent tribunal, in order to prove his property; that he is not required to answer the questions of any one, except those of the legal magistrates, and that parol evidence is sufficient to show the validity of his claims in the absence of a bill of sale."

The jury found for the plaintiff—four thousand dollars damages.

CASE OF MR. M. M. NOAH. A case was recently decided in the vice chancellor's court, which may be of interest to those who buy and sell newspaper establishments. It was on an application of Mr. Noah, to cancel a bond which he had given not to publish a newspaper for eight years. In 1829, Noah sold to Webb and Tylee, the New York Enquirer, and entered into an obligation in a penal sum of $30,000, not to publish a paper in this city for eight years. In 1831, Tylee sold back his interest to Noah, who entered upon the same as joint proprietor; and, in 1832, Mr. Noah sold out his moiety to Mr. Webb, but did not renew the stipulations of the bond, and finally, Webb, to meet some embarrassments, assigns all his interest to trustees. Mr. Noah prayed that his bond may be cancelled, with a view of establishing a paper himself, and on the ground that, having purchased back the interest of Mr. Tylee, the bond became null and void. The vice chancellor, in a very learned opinion, admitted, that the parties had no redress at law, and could not recover on the bond, should Mr. Noah establish a paper; but he held that it was a delicate point for a court of equity to cancel an agreement without pressing causes, that did not exist in this case; and he was of opinion, that the parties had an equitable right in the bond, although the subsequent arrangement had deprived them of legal redress, and thought that the court could restrain Mr. Noah from publishing a paper, should he be so disposed.

The court was full, as the case was one of interest; and Mr. Noah, though flattering himself that he was somewhat of a "veteran editor," has discovered that he has still four years of his apprenticeship to complete.

[N. Y. Gaz.]

CASE OF A REWARD OFFERED FOR ABUSE! A curious suit was recently tried in one of the ward courts of New York, against a candidate for the office of alderman at the late election in that city. It was an action for services performed for eight days at five dollars a day, for writing electioneering handbills, songs, and abusive paragraphs, against the defendant's election. The plaintiff undertook to prove that the defendant made a contract to pay for being abused in this way, thinking it would benefit his election! There was no doubt that the candidate had expressed this opinion, but he denied the contract, and asserted the expressions to be merely jocular, and the jury found a verdict in his favor.

CHINA TRADE AND GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

From the Liverpool Times, of April 2.

The commercial monopoly of the East India company, after having existed upwards of two hundred years, is about to cease forever; and the political rule of that celebrated and most potent body over the extensive regions and populous nations which it has acquired, by the valor of its armies and the skill of its negotiators, is about to be confirmed and continued for an indefinite period of time. The trade, which is thus on the point of being opened, is one which will, in a few years, give occupation to hundreds of thousands of the British people—which will cover the seas of the most distant regions of the earth with our ships—open the markets of the most remote countries to our merchants—diffuse the products of British industry in regions where the British name is at present scarcely known—pour into our lap the wealth of the richest countries of the east—and unite, by the ties of mutual advantage, nations separated by trackless seas and the circumference of half the globe. The trade with the peninsula of India alone, though restricted to the mere out-skirts of that rich and populous empire by laws which prevent Europeans from trading with the interior, though embarrassed by the competition of a body of monopolists who have the power to injure others without the ability to benefit themselves, and though cramped and injured by the want of returns—a want originating entirely in the exclusion of the science and the enterprise of Europeans from the cultivation of a soil capable of producing, in the highest perfection, silk, sugar, rice, indigo, cotton, coffee, spices and every other article which tropical countries supply—this trade under all these disadvantages, has in a few years become worth many millions sterling to this country, requires many tons of shipping, and affords employment and support to tens of thousands of our most skilful and industrious workmen. What it will become, when Europeans are allowed to range through every province and district of India in search of markets—when the Ganges, the Indus, the Nerbuddah, the Godavery and the other great rivers are covered, like the rivers of North America, with steamboats—and when the products of that country have, from the use of the best modes of culture and manufacture, been made capable of competing with the finest products of the West Indies, the Brazils, and the United States, it is easy to foresee. If prosecuted with the same spirit with which every other trade has been prosecuted by the merchants of England, it will in a few years be one of the most important, if not the most important, of all the sources of our national wealth and greatness. Add to this the trade with China and islands of the Indian ocean, many of them larger than the most extensive countries of Europe, and some idea may then be formed of the importance of the interests at issue, and of the necessity of the people of England watching the progress of the measures which are about to be brought forward carefully, and guarding against any restrictions that will limit their utility. This trade, if rendered really free, will in a few days do more to improve the condition of this country than the repeal of millions of taxes; and now is the time for us to insist on having secured to us all the advantages which can possibly be derived from it. With regard to the political power which is about to be again confirmed to the East India company, it is of the most extensive kind. It is no less than placing in their hands the absolute and irresponsible control over the lives, liberties and fortunes of nearly a hundred millions of men. The dominion of the company was acquired with the sword, and established by bloodshed, robbery and injustice; let us take care that an authority so acquired is exercised in such a manner as will compensate the nations of India for what they have suffered, and will gradually, by affording protection to all, convert a government of force and power into one of right and justice.

The following are the great points in the memorandum, or paper of hints, submitted to the company by the government, as the basis on which the proposed arrangements are to be made all the rest being mere matter of detail—

- 1st. The cessation of the China monopoly.
- 2d. The financial affairs of the company.
- 3d. The future government of India.
- 4th. The right of settlement and residence in that country.
- 1st. The cessation of the China monopoly. The government proposes that the exclusive right of the company to trade with China shall cease at the expiration of their charter; that the tea trade shall be thrown entirely open, and that tea shall be imported into the outports as well as into London, under certain restrictions, which we trust will, on further consideration, be abandoned. The directors, as might have been expected, object to the opening of the only profitable branch of trade carried on by them. They assert that the profits of this trade are necessary to supply the deficiencies of the Indian revenue, and that if they had not possessed the monopoly of the tea trade, they would have been compelled, during the last few years, to add £17,000,000, to the territorial debt.

To this the government very reasonably reply, that it is rather too much to ask that the people of England should be compelled to pay for the deficiencies of the Indian revenue, and that as that revenue amounts to twenty-two millions a year, it ought to be sufficient. The directors rejoin by asserting that the £17,000,000 was paid out of the profits of trade, and therefore cannot be said to have been paid by the people of England. This would be true if these profits accrued in the ordinary course of trade; but as they arise from the circumstance of the company, which is without competitors, selling its teas about twice as dear as the merchants of America, Holland and Hamburg, and in that manner realizing monopoly profits at the expense of the people of England, it is not so. To the people of England it is exactly the same thing, whether they pay two or three millions directly towards the government of India, or two or three millions indirectly for the same purpose, in an exorbitant price for one of the most important necessities of life. They are equally deprived of their money in either case. As soon as the monopoly ceases, tea will sink in this country to about the same price as it fetches in New York and Hamburg, and the abolition of the monopoly will therefore at once open a new trade to the British merchant, and free the British public from a tax of two or three millions a year, which is now paid to the East India company as they say, to supply the deficiencies of the Indian revenue, but, as we suspect, to support a system of extravagance and mismanagement, which must cease with the cessation of the ways and means for carrying it on.

The second point is the financial affairs of the company. The government proposes to pay to the company an annuity of £610,000, which is ten and a half per cent. on its original capital, on condition of its surrendering all its territorial and commercial capital. This annuity is to be paid out of the revenue of India, so that it will bring no burden upon the people of this country. The proposed terms are very advantageous for the company. The proprietors will by them be secured in the possession of their present incomes, without risk or trouble to themselves. If the company should be so foolish as to refuse these terms, it will either have to carry on business without a monopoly, or to sell off its stock and divide the produce among the proprietors; in the former case it will be in the Gazette in a couple of years, for no trading company ever can compete successfully with the enterprise, activity and economy of private merchants; and in the latter the proprietors may think themselves fortunate if they obtain a third part of what government offers them, for their assets consisting principally in immense warehouses which no private merchant would purchase, and in warehouses in India, China and England, ill adapted for the use of private traders, could not be turned into money without very great loss. If the proprietors are wise, they will compel the directors to accept the terms offered by the government.

The third point of importance is the government of India, which is to remain in the hands of the company, if it accedes to the terms proposed. The directors make some demur, but will accept these terms if they can obtain no better, for though the opening of the China trade will diminish their patronage, they will still retain enough to make their directorships well worth having. If this arrangement is made, the government will escape the perils of another India bill. How the system will work for the natives, is, however, a very serious question. The government of the East India company is many degrees better than any government that the Hindoos ever possessed before, but it is still as absolute a despotism, as that of Russia or Spain, and the system of taxation is grievously oppressive. If, therefore, the government of India is committed to the directors, it will be the imperative duty of parliament to see that their authority is used in such a manner as will not only secure the natives in the enjoyment of the very few rights which they at present possess, but as will ultimately prepare them for the enjoyment of much more extensive ones.

The fourth point is the colonization of India. Europeans, according to the proposed arrangements, are to have the right of settling at Calcutta, Madras and Bombay, without restriction, "but their right of visiting the interior, or of residing there, and of acquiring or holding property, is to be subject to the restraints and regulations which the local government may impose." The local government will be under the direct influence of the court of directors, whose object has always been to prevent Europeans from visiting, trading or settling in the interior, and if this power is committed to them there will be no trade with the interior, no holding of property by Europeans, and no improvement in the moral or political condition of the inhabitants, or in the products of the soil. We trust that this part of the measure will be firmly resisted by the friends of India, and of England. The only method of improving the condition of the Hindoos, and of rendering India extensively useful to this country, is to allow British subjects to carry their knowledge of the arts of life into the interior and to permit them to apply them to the development of the vast resources of that country. If the colonization of India is to be restricted at the will of an irresponsible body, like the court of directors, deeply imbued with the spirit of monopoly and exclusion, there will either be no colonization at all, or none that will produce any benefit either to India or England.

As we shall have many opportunities of returning to this subject, we shall only repeat at present that it is one of the greatest importance, and that the prosperity of our own country, and the happiness of the oriental world, both depend on the manner in which it is settled.
